This announcement of the quality of our unconscious hosts was by no means calculated to diminish my apprehensions. I listened nervously enough to an animated debate which now ensued among the members of the gang as to the propriety of hurrying over the Mississippi to the nearest ferry, or of lying concealed for some days, until the first fury of the pursuers should be satisfied and public excitement cooled. The captain of the mule sex who took no part in the argument was the old woman, with whom I had heard unfavorably as Mr. Stone. He sat quiet, having finished his meal and resumed his pipe, and we could see through his respectable-looking, gray beard and his silvery wreaths from his soapstone meerschaum, inasmuch as he was on the other side of the fire. Mrs. Stone, his better half and an active part in council, urging a stay on the island, since the place had been "mighty scarcely" by hers and stampeding there for weeks, and her critters were worrited and worn out with it." It was plain, but this notable woman's character appeared little if at all changed by lawless companionship and wild life. In the midst of roving she was still the shrewd, hard-working housewife, and I could see many evidences of her thrift and careful habits. With her daughters it was different. The eldest was evidently melancholy and ill at ease. She was a small, pale, sad-eyed girl with a mousyllable to any remark or rough compliment, and her downcast eyes and colorless cheek told of regrets and heart-sickness that she did not share. The younger girl showed the same mental condition, but in a more degree. Her answers were short, but pert, and she occasionally exploded into a giggle at some jocular ally of the Massachusetts man. The German, who wore the wits of the assembly. But one glance from her sister's sad, dark eyes would check her spirit, and the subsided into gloom again. We guessed with considerable interest to a discussion which manifestly affected our fate, but over which we could exercise no influence whatever. We gathered from the talk that the party were located on the far off, which was assigned to the Stone family, but that the rest of the association had no business on the island save the boat on which it was concealed, and no coubles but these heaps of trash and browning grasses on which we had been lying during the night. The horses, we also learned, were hidden hard by, in a cache due where the scrub and cane thickened, which was ecretally masked from careless eyes by a sort of broad trap-door of osier work and sassafras boughs. Here it was customary to regard them every week all stolen from owners in Tennessee—until an opportunity occurred to run them across the river at or Greenville, in Missouri, where certain accomplices of the band resided, and whence they were sent to the South. Such was the arrangement found for California.

Very unwillingly did we thus acquire possession of the secrets of those desperate men, every fresh admission or unguarded word serving to increase our danger, and at last we heard with dismay the final award of Black Dave, the captain.

"We'll just stop. This business is good, and nobody knows of it [we trembled], and, as Mars Stone says, the gals are tired some, and we'd all be the better of a little rest. We'll just stop for a few days, and then shoulatable with the hosses and scurry for Bolivar."

There was a howl of assent, overtopped by the shrill voice of Mrs. Stone, who clamorously espoused her approval. I glanced at the General's face. It was white but firm; and the compressed lips and brightening eye told of a mind made up.

"It's a mighty pity, Sir, 'tis, but we must gulp it," he whispered; "we must give ourselves up, or a huge cask of water and the first favorable wind we were found cached than if we come out bold."

This was logical, but startling. I demurred for an instant, suggesting the possibility of our making our way out at the back of the island by cutting a hole with our knives in the comparatively thin roof. But our deliberations were unexpectedly cut short. "I go to this time [the captain] announced himself with exiting and reposing, but now a huge can of water and provisions and cooking and some fresh sprigs of mint were produced, and a cry was set up for whisky.

"Where do you keep the stray the store jars with Monongahela, Mars Stone?"

Mrs. Stone replied that the jars were "under the brush of the beds," and bade the Massachusetts man fetch them. He rose at once, took up a pine torch, lighted it, and agreeable, "Very good, Jeff Davistrain, rising to his feet, and we both stepped out into the lighted circle around the fire, under the bearer of the torch to drop the blazing brand in the surprise.

"Drop it all," yelled one of the gang, "the Philistines are on us!"

With wild shouts and curses the ruffians scrambled up and clutched their weapons.

"Hurroo, boys, it's only two spy varmints!" shouted Black Dave, who was quickest to his feet. "Hilt; "kim back, you down-East coward, you! And you, thank you for the Massachusetts man and the German were already in full retreat); they let but two, and without weapons."

When they were quieted by this last reassuring fact, the more timorous of the robbers became allured by moral restraint in their blood-thirsty fury. Pistols and bowie-knives menaced us on every side, and it was with some trouble that the Captain prevented our summary extermination. Black Dave, however, was firm. By his orders our wrists were tightly bound together with handkerchiefs, and we were placed in the centre of a circle of hostile faces and threatening revolvers, and bidden to confess.

"Speak up, ye skunks, who air ye?"

In answer to this query, the General gave a succinct and graphic account of the steamboat accident of escape and immersion, of our landing on the island, and of how we happened to fall asleep in the log-house and become the involuntary auditors of the robbers' council, though this point was rather lightly touched upon. A fellow of fierce incredulity answered this statement.

"Cut out the lyin' snake's tongue!" bawled one.

"Murder 'em both, the ugly spoken, slippery-skinned Yankee eels!" cried another, flourishing his glittering knife within an inch of my nose, while the Captain looked serious-looking of the gang took the side of mercy, and Mrs. Stone's dictum obviously carried great weight with it. Her loud tongue and the masculine energy of her character had made her a potentate in the association; while her husband, though slave of wit, was known to be a brave man and a first-rate judge of a horse. The end of this matter was that we were not killed, but that it was decided that we should be kept prisoners until the evacuation of the island. We were accordingly bound in a sort of undergroundcoagulate, where forage was stored, and within a few inches of the roof, in which the horses were concealed, and to which access was obtained by a trap-door of stout planking.

Our bonds were not tortuous, but not removed, and we were made to give our parole not to attempt to escape until the horse-thieves should quit the island. Mrs. Stone, to whose capricious gratitude we owed our lives, was not unkind to us in her rugged way, and the girls and daughters supplied us with food and blankets, and sometimes deigned to descend and converse with us, besides lending to each of us two well-thumbed books, which constituted the family library. In the course of these conversations the upward progress of the confederacy between the Stones, who seemed decent folks, and the other villains who composed the gang, was solved. Old Stone had been a well-to-do farmer in Illinois, illiterate, but respectable and honest in deed and thought. The eldest girl had been sent to fashionable boarding-school, and the price of his own farm in the purchase of a tempting bargain of landed property, with a total fire in the house, the loss of another hard fist, and the honest dupe, assisted by a few friends, packed up his effects, and had driven himself a beggar. Unhappily Mrs. Stone was a woman of strong will and a warped and one-sided judgment. She unreasonably declared that as she had robbed them of their earnings, the law was in their enemy, and that it was justifiable to wage blinded her; she was ashamed to live poor where she had been well to do, and in the cities of the South she was fully more picked up by negroes whose noble life was one war with society.

It was impossible to make Mrs. Stone comprehend that she was really a transgressor in sharing the perils and profits of wholesale plunder. She had got no property at all judges, governors, lawyers, and men of reputed honesty, as rogues, in league to plague the country, and she considered the work in which the horse-thieves were engaged as reprisals and warfare. Her husband, long used to obey this shrewd and energetic woman who had studied much dominion over him, only saw through his wife's eyes. At last the couple had come to the idea of buying land in Oregon or California, and getting cash on the square," when they should be rich enough. This, which has lured on more than a half reluctant criminal. The daughters, on the contrary, had a different view of the matter. Before they had picked up some instruction in a tolerable school in Chicago, saw nothing but misery and degradation in the companionship to which they were condemned. They pressed their lives in sighing over the old days, the innocence of their first love in Illinois, and never willingly exchanged a word with the outlaws.

"I tell you now what, Mr. Barham," said the General to me one day, "I'd like to give a lift out of the mire to them fresh girls, and I'll not be easy in my mind, be they ever so ungrateful, until the daughters driven out to come to want, or worse. I'm not rich, no more, I suspect, are you; but there's one dear to me in Syracuse, not yet in California, and between us we might buy'em a farm, and let 'em live honest, and repent when grace was borne upon 'em. A farm would be just heaven to 'em, and three thousand dollars would buy and stock it in a year."

I willingly agreed, and we quietly settled with Mary Stone, the eldest girl, that a joy at the time, that a certain sum should be lodged, two months hence, in a certain bank, in her name. She agreed that it was best to communicate this to her mother after the migration of the band. This was soon to occur. We had been prisoners for a fortnight, when one morning we were informed that a general flitting was at hand, and our release imminent.

With much satisfaction we contemplating the horses were led up from the cache, and embarked on board the flat-boats, which were to be towed across by two steamboats, while a third followed with the rest of the party. Dawn was just breaking, no steamers were in sight, and a column of filmy wood-smoke was on the horizon. Once on the Missouri bank, safety would be secured, since the depredations had been confined to Tennessee. We were allowed to come out of our prison, and found ourselves, blinking like owls in the daylight, on the margin of the turbid water. The first flat-boat, full of plunder, was pushed off, and contained only six cars. The two girls and their father were in the stern-sheets, but Mrs. Stone lingered, let the boat go without her. Dave might do so, as she said, "a mischief at parting." But the Captain was in good-humor. He patted us on the back, laughing heartily, and advised us to "stick to Broadway pavement and Philadelphy pork, and we got there."

The last horses were embarked, and the rowers of the breakfasts settled themselves on the benches and grasped their oars. "All aboard, quick, boys!"

"Stay," said Black Dave, looking round, "where's that Massachusetts bird?"

Nobody knew. One said he was in the first boat, but another denied this. He had been last him since the previous evening. Black Dave ground his teeth, and muttered a deep curse.

"He's deserted, the cur! To git the reward them Hogtlers offered!"

"He's stole the third broadhorn. It's gone!" cried a panting scout, running up. There was a movement of suspense, then a rush, and the remaining boat was so crowded that it was sunk gunwale deep in the water. The Captain, rifle in hand, stood in the stern-sheets.

"Pull all! I bear the dip of oars!"

The boat was the six cars into the water, and off went the heavily-laden boat, towing the flat with the horses.

The progress was necessarily slow. But a few yards had been gained before a loud outcry proved that the island was invaded. We were approaching on the shore, waving our hands to Mrs. Stone, who in the hurry of her flight fell into a smile, and who seemed heedless of the danger.

"Dat's him! Bang at 'em, boys—bang the villains air!" howled fifty voices, and a crowd of armed men in grey-flagged hunting-shirts or homespun suits, well armed, came at a run through the bushes. "Down!" cried Flint, throwing me to my knees and stooping himself, then in time to escape death, as the rifle-balls whizzed over us. We looked up. I saw Black Dave drop on his knees, fire his gun, rise again, stagger, and finally roll over into the river mortally wounded by the discharge. So saw one else was hit. Crouching low rope and crouching down as much as possible, the rowers managed to escape further harm, and, abandoning their plunder, reached the Missouri shore.

We were at first roughly handled, and were even in some danger of being promptly hanged or shot by order of Judge Lynch, when two witnesses to character came to our aid. One, on whom I looked with disgust, was the treacherous scoundrel who had betrayed the rest of the party, and the other, wonder of wonders, was—Ned Granger, who caught me in his arms and hugged me like a bear!

"Dear Ned, I thought you were dead."

"That was exactly what I thought of you, Barham, dear old boy, and of the General there. No, I was very little hurt, and was able to help the other unhappy passengers in care for those poor creatures who were scalded or torn by the explosion. Keep quiet, Sam; I like a hug, but it's a shocking business. But though unhurt, you see, I had lost my luggage and money in the crash, and this honest fellow came here to look after me these last weeks. So I came to help him to get back his riches—and, I am thinking when I should find an Island Number Ten."

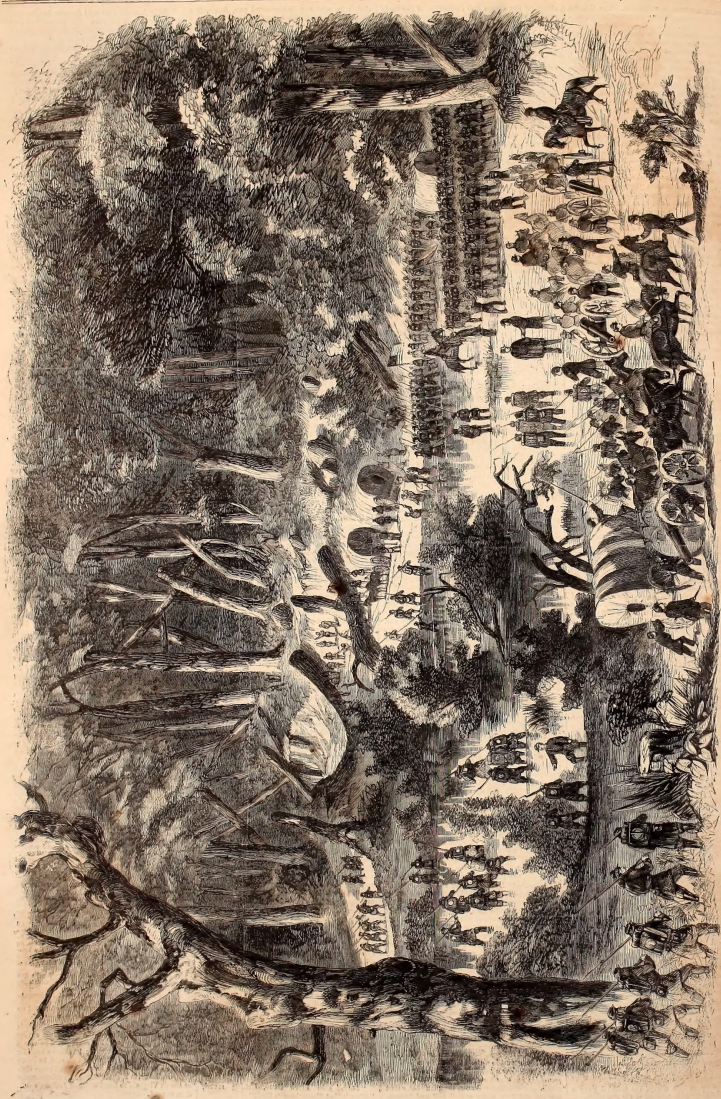
Flint and I kept our word with Mary Stone.

JEFF DAVIS'S COACHMAN.

We publish on page 365 a portrait of WILLIAM A. CRAWFORD, the COACHMAN of Jeff Davis, who recently eastered our lines at Fredericksburg. Jackson is an extremely intelligent man, reads and writes (as his letters elsewhere show), and is even in a manner which shows that he has been used to good society. He seems well posted in regard to the events of the past year, and to the condition of affairs at the South. He says that the negroes at Richmond and all throughout the South have foreseen the present state of things, and look anxiously for the ultimate triumph of the Union. He says that the rebels dare not trust the negroes with arms, and as to relying upon their fidelity, they are well aware that every negro in the South prays earnestly for the success of the Union armies. He adds that rumors of disaffection have taken place in slave-owners to conceal the news from the negroes, and to deceive them as to the purposes of the Northern men, but are generally well acquainted with the course of events. Jackson represents Davis as a man averse to the tremendous responsibility, as much disheartened and querulous; fond of complaining of the want of popular support, and very apprehensive that the Union men in Jackson dare came into our lines he made a statement to Harper's Weekly which has been published in all the papers. We subjoin the following summary:

The coachman overheard a conversation between Davis and Gen. Beauregard, in which Beauregard was telling Gen. Davis. Davis said he had sent General J. E. Anderson across North Carolina to raise the militia of the Nationals from Fredericksburg, and to delay them long enough for him to get away. Davis said he had ordered Anderson to leave, as the rebels had no confidence in the Union men. Davis said he had ordered Anderson away from the peninsula and from Richmond, because he had heard Anderson say that was they would all be caught. The coachman represents that Mrs. Davis "is the only confederacy man in the family," and "that if Mr Crawford was really taken she had no longer any business in the house." He said he was there; that it was a great pity they had ever attempted to assist Virginia; that the United States Government had not that she said to Mr. B. D. Jones, daughter of Colonel Wright, Fifth Regiment United States Cavalry, now of Subdivision, who was very anxious to get to Washington, that she (Mrs. Davis) was sorry that she had not been of any trouble, but to stay where she was, and when the Yankees came to protect her property.

Mrs. Davis declared that the old negroes who left their books, clothing, and pictures packed up ready to move were ungrateful. Mrs. Davis said that Governor Wise (a secession) and "that being Mr. Brown's father in a letter, he would all the Yankees were coming to Richmond, and the Yankees are looked for with much pleasure, more by the whites than even the colored people. Confederate notes will be worn when it can be avoided.



Mrs. Davis has been confined, when she offered a $10 Confederate note, which she did in payment for something purchased in Richmond.

Many of the Richmond people wish the Union troops to come that they are half starved out.

The bank and Government property are all packed up for removal to Danville, near the North Carolina line.

Jackson is a man of thirty years of age. He is or was owned in Richmond, but was hired out by the year by his owner. For some years he was a messenger in one of the courts; he drives a hack for a couple of years, and latterly, as we said, he drove the rebel President. He has a wife and three children, all slaves, in Richmond. He is a mulatto.

CHAPTER II.

CAPTAIN WRAGGE stopped nearly midway in the one little row of houses composing Rosemary Lane, and let himself and his guest in at the door of his lodgings with his own key. As they entered the passage a carpetbag woman, in a widow's cap, made her appearance with a candle. "My niece," said the captain, presenting Magdalen; "my niece on a visit to York. She has kindly consented to occupy your empty bedroom. Consider it let, if you please, to my niece —and be very particular in airing the sheets. Is Mrs. Wragge up stairs? Very good. You may lend me your candle. My dear girl, Mrs. Wragge's boudoir is on the first floor; Mrs. Wragge is visible. Allow me how to show you the way up."

As he ascended the stairs first the carecworn widow whispered piteously to Magdalen: "I hope you'll pay me, miss. Your uncle doesn't."

The captain threw open the door of the front room on the first floor, and disclosed a female figure, arrayed in a gown of tarnished amber-colored satin, seated solitary on a small chair, with dingy old gloves on its hands, with a tattered old book on its knees, and with one little bedroom candle by its side. The figure terminated at its upper extremity in a large, smooth, white round face like a moon, encased in a cap and green ribbons, and dimly irradiated by eyes of mild and faded blue, which looked straight forward into vacancy, and took not the slightest notice of Magdalen's appearance on the opening of the door.

"Mrs. Wragge!" cried the captain, shouting at her as if she was fast asleep.—"Mrs. Wragge!"

The lady of the faded blue eyes slowly rose to an apparently interminable height. When she had at last attained an upright position she lowered to a stature of two or three inches over six feet. Giants of both sexes are, by a wise dispensation of Providence, created for the most part gentle. If Mrs. Wragge and a lamb had been placed side by side, comparisons, under those circumstances, would have exposed the lamb as a rank impostor.

"You, dear?" inquired Mrs. Wragge, looking submissively down at her husband, whose head when he stood on tip-toe barely reached her shoulder.

"Miss Vanstone the younger," said the captain, presenting Magdalen on her right relative, whom I have met by a fortunate accident. Our guest for the night. Our guest?" reiterated the captain, thinking more, as if the bill had been still fast asleep, in spite of the plain testimony of her own eyes to the contrary, positively.

"Oh, indeed? Please, miss, will you sit down? I'm sorry—I really mean I'm sorry I have. Then I'm glad—" She stopped, and consulted her husband by a helpless look.

Glad, of course," echoed the captain.

"Glad, of course," echoed the giantess of the amber satin, more meekly than ever.

"Mrs. Wragge is not deaf," explained the captain. "She's only a little slow. Constitutionally torpid—if I may use the expression. I am merely loud with her (and I beg you will excuse me by being loud myself) as a physical stimulant to her ideas. Shout at her—and her mind comes up to time. Speak to her—and the drifts miles away from your meaning. Have I Wragge?"

Mrs. Wragge instantly acknowledged the stimulant. "Yes, dear?" she inquired, for the second time.

"Put your cap straight!" shouted her husband. "I beg ten thousand pardons," he resumed, again addressing himself to Magdalen, "the oak truth is, I am a marry to my own sense of order. All untidiness, all want of system and regularity, causes me the acutest irritation. My admiration is distracted, my composure is upset; I can't rest till things are set straight again. Externally speaking, Mrs. Wragge is to my infinite regret, the crookedest woman I ever met with. More to the right!" shouted the captain, as Mrs. Wragge, like a well-trained child, presented herself with her revised headdress for her husband's inspection.

Mrs. Wragge immediately pulled the cap to the left. Magdalen rose and set it right for her. The moon-face of the giantess brightened for the first time. She looked admiringly at Magdalen—looked and smiled. "Do you like dress, miss?" she asked suddenly, in a confidential whisper. "I do."

"Show Miss Vanstone her room," said the captain, looking as if the whole house belonged to him. "The spare-room, the landlady's spare room, on the third floor front. Offer Miss Vanstone all reasonable assistance with the toilet of which she may stand in need. She has no luggage with her. Supply the deficiency; and then come back and make tea."

Mrs. Wragge acknowledged the receipt of those lofty directions by a look of placid bewilderment, and led the way out of the room. Magdalen following her with a candle presented by the attentive captain. As soon as they were alone on the landing outside, Mrs. Wragge raised the tattered old book which she had been reading when Magdalen was first presented to her, and which she had never let out of her hand since, and slowly tapped herself on the forehead with it. "Oh, my poor head!" said the tall lady, in meek soliloquy; "it's Buzzing again worse than ever!"

"Buzzing?" repeated Magdalen, in the utmost astonishment.

Mrs. Wragge ascended the stairs without offering any explanation, stopped at one of the rooms on the second floor, and led the way in.

"This is not the third floor," said Magdalen. "This is not my room, surely?"

"Wait a bit," pleaded Mrs. Wragge. "Wait a bit, miss, before we go up any higher. I've got the Buzzing in my head worse than ever. Please wait for me till I'm a little better again."

"Shall I ask for help?" inquired Magdalen. "Shall I call the landlady?"

"Help?" echoed Mrs. Wragge. "Bless you I don't want help! I'm used to it. I've had the Buzzing in my head, off and on—how many years?" She stopped, reflected, lost herself, and suddenly tried a question in despair. "Have you ever been at Darch's Dining-Rooms in London?" she asked, with an appearance of the deepest interest.

"No," replied Magdalen, wondering at the strange inquiry.

"That's where the Buzzing in my head first began," said Mrs. Wragge, following the new clew with the deepest attention and anxiety. "I was employed to wait on the gentlemen at Darch's Dining-Rooms—I was. The gentlemen all came together; the gentlemen were all hungry together; the gentlemen all gave their orders together—" She stopped, and tapped her head again despondently with the tattered old book.

"And you had to keep all their orders in your memory, I presume, one from the other?" suggested Magdalen, helping her out. "And the trying to do that confused you?"

"That's it!" said Mrs. Wragge, becoming violently excited in a moment. "Boiled pork and greens and apple-pudding for Number One. Stewed beef and carrots and gooseberry tart for Number Two. Cold mutton, and quick dinner it will be, done, and plenty of fat, for Number Three. Cobbs and parsnips, two chops to follow, hot-and-hot, for I'll be the death of you, for Number Four. Five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten. Oysters and gooseberry tart—pease-pudding and plenty of fat—pork and beef and mutton, and eat 'em all, and quick about it—stout for one, and ale for t'other—and stale bread here, and new bread there—and this gentleman like cheese, and that gentleman down't—Matilda, Tilda, Tilda, fifty times over, till I didn't know my own name again—oh lord! oh lord!! oh lord!!! all together, all at the same time, all out of temper, all buzzing in my poor head like forty thousand million bees—don't tell the captain I've told the captain!" The unfortunate creature dropped the tattered old book, and beat both hands on her head with a look of blank terror fixed on the door.

"Hush! hush!" said Magdalen. "The captain hasn't heard you. I know what is the matter with your head now. Let me cool it."

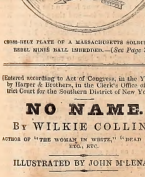
She dipped a towel in water, and pressed it on the hot and helpless head which Mrs. Wragge submitted to her with the docility of a sick child.

"Shall I put some hot water on your feet?" said the poor creature, feeling the relief of the coolness, and taking Magdalen's hand admiringly in her own. "How soft and white it is! I try to be a lady; I always keep my gloves on—but I can't get my hands like yours. I'm nicely dressed though, ain't I? I like dress; it's a comfort to me. I'm always happy when I'm looking at my things. I say—you won't be angry with me?—I should so like to try your bonnet on."

Magdalen answered her, with the ready compassion of the young. She stood smiling and nodding at herself in the glass, with the bonnet perched on the top of her head. "I had one, as pretty as this, once," she said—"only it was white, not black. I wore it when the captain married me."

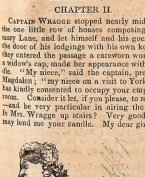
"Where did you meet with him?" asked Magdalen, putting the question as a chance means of increasing her scanty stock of information on the subject of Captain Wragge.

"At the Dining-Rooms," said Mrs. Wragge. "He was the hungriest and the loudest to wait upon of the lot of 'em. I made more mistakes with him than I did with all the rest of them put together. He used to swear—oh, didn't he use to swear! When he left off swearing at me, he married me. There was others wanted me besides him. Bless you, I had my pick. Why not? When you have a trifle of money left you, that you didn't expect, it that don't make a lady of you, what does? Let's a lady to have her pick! I had my tribe of money, and I had my pick, and I picked the captain—I did. He was the smartest and the shortest of them all. He took care of me and my money. I'm here, the money's gone. Don't you put that towel down on the table—he won't have that! Don't move his razors—don't please, or I shall forget which is which. I've got to remember which is which to-morrow morning. Bless you, the captain don't shave himself! He had me taught. I shave him. I do lift him, and cut his nails—he's awfully particular about his nails. So he is about his trowsers. And his shoes. And his newspaper in the morning. And his breakfasts, and lunches, and dinners, and teas—" She stopped, struck by a sudden recollection, looked about her, observed the tattered old book on the floor, and clasped her hands in despair. "I've lost the place!" she exclaimed, helplessly. "Oh, mercy, what will become of me! I've lost the place!"



"Never mind," said Magdalen; "I'll soon find the place for you again."

She picked up the book, looked into the pages, and found that the object of Mrs. Wragge's anxiety was nothing more important than an old-fashioned Treatise on the Art of Cookery, reduced under the usual heads of Fish, Flesh, and Fowl, and containing the customary series of recipes. Turning over the leaves, Magdalen came to one particular page, thickly studded with little drops of moisture, half dry. "Curious!" she said. "If this was any thing but a cookery-book I should say somebody had been crying over it."



"Somebody?" echoed Mrs. Wragge, with a stare of amazement. "It isn't somebody—it's Me. There's not a kindly thing in the place rare enough. Bless you, I'm used to crying over it! You'd cry too if you had to get the captain's dinners out of it. Ah, come now and sit down to this book the Buzzing in my head begins again. Who's to make it out? Sometimes I think I've got it, and it all goes away from me. Sometimes I think I haven't got it, and it all comes back in a heap. Look here! Here's what he's ordered for his breakfast to-morrow: 'Omelette with Herbs.' Best up two eggs with a little water or milk, and a pepper, cream, and parsley. Mince small.' There! mince small! How am I to mince small, when it's all mixed up and running? 'Put a piece of butter the size of your thumb into the frying-pan.' Look at my thumb and look at the frying-pan, whose size does man? 'Boil but not brown.' If it mustn't be brown what color must it be? She won't tell me; she expects me to know, and I don't. 'Pour in the omelette.' There I can do that. 'Allow it to set,' and when is that, the edge—when done, turn it over to double it.' Oh, the numbers of times I turned it over and doubled it in my head before you came in to-night! 'Keep it soft; put the dish on the frying-pan and turn it over.' Which am I to turn over—the omelette or the cold towel again, and tell me which, the dish or the frying-pan?"

"Put the dish on the frying-pan," said Magdalen, "and then turn the frying-pan over. That is what it means, I think."

"Thank you kindly," said Mrs. Wragge, "I want to get it into my head; please say it again."

"I SAY—YOU WON'T BE ANGRY WITH ME—I SHOULD SO LIKE TO TRY YOUR BONNET ON."

Magdalen said it again.

"And then turn the frying-pan over," repeated Mrs. Wragge, with a sudden burst of energy. "I've got it now! Oh, the loss of omelettes all frying together in my head, and all frying wrong. Much obliged, I'm sure. You've put me all right again; I'm only a little tired with talking. And then turn the frying-pan over. I'll turn the frying-pan, then turn the frying-pan over. It sounds like poetry, don't it?"

Her voice sank, and she drowsily closed her eyes. At the same moment the door of the room below opened, and the captain's multifarious bass notes deadened all stairs, charged with the customary stimulant to his wife's faculties.

"Mrs. Wragge!" cried the captain. "Mrs. Wragge!"

She started to her feet—that terrible summons. "Oh, what did he tell me to do?" she asked, distractedly. "Lots of things, and I've forgotten them all."

"Say you have done them when he asks you," suggested Magdalen. "They were things for me—things I don't want. I remember it all if is necessary. My room is the front room on the third floor. Go down stairs and say I am considering directly."

She took up the candle and pushed Mrs. Wragge out on the landing. "Say I'm considering directly," she whispered again—and went up stairs by herself to the third story.

The room was small, close, and very poorly furnished. In former days Miss Garth would have hesitated to offer such a room to one of the servants at Combe-Raven. But it was open; it gave her a few minutes alone; and it was endurable, even welcome, on that account. She locked herself in, and walked about uncertainly, till a woman's first impulse in a strange bedroom, to the rickety little table, and the dingy little looking-glass. She waited there for a moment, and then turned away again with weary contempt. "What does it matter?" she said to her self, the thought to herself, "Frank can't see me—what does it matter now?"

She laid aside her bank and bonnet and sat down to collect herself. But the events of the day had worn her out. The past, when she tried to remember it, only made her heart ache. The future, when she tried to penetrate it, was a black void. She rose again and began to pace uncurtained window, stood looking out, as if there were no hidden curiosity for her own desolation in the desolate night.

"Norah!" she said to herself, tenderly; "I wonder if Norah is thinking of me? If it is, it could be as patient as she is! If I could only forget the debt we owe to Mistress Vanstone!"

Her face darkened with a vindictive despair, and she paced the little cage of a room backward and forward softly. "Oh, if I could but get debts is paid!" Her thoughts veered back again to Frank. "Still at sea, poor fellow; further and further away from me: sailing farther from me day, sailing through the night. Oh, Frank, love me!"

Her eyes filled with tears. She dashed them away, made for the door, and laughed with a desperate levity as she unlocked it again.

"Any company is better than my own thoughts," she burst out recklessly, as she left the room. "I'm forgetting my ready-made relations—my half-witted aunt, and my uncle the pirate." She descended the stairs as she had risen, lingering on the first floor, and paused there in momentary hesitation. "How shall it call?" she asked herself. "Where is my blindfold journey taking me to now? Who knows and who cares?"

She entered the room.

Captain Wragge was presiding at the tea-tray, with the air of a prince in his own banqueting-hall. At one side of the table sat Mrs. Wragge watching her husband's eye like an animal waiting to be fed. At the other side was an empty chair, toward which the captain waved his persuasive hand when Magdalen came in. "Will he do you like your room?" he inquired; "I trust Mrs. Wragge has made herself useful? Will you take milk and sugar? Try the local bread, honor the York butter, test the freshness of a new and neighboring egg. I offer no apology for the pauper's meal, my dear girl, seasoned with a gentleman's welcome."

"Seasoned with salt, pepper, chives, and parsley," murmured Mrs. Wragge, catching instantly at a word in connection with cookery, and harnessing her head to the omelette for the rest of the evening.

"Sit straight at the table!" shouted the captain. "More to the left, more still—that will do. During your absence up stairs, my conscience had addressing himself to Magdalen, 'my mind has not been unemployed.' I was not only considering your position with a view exclusively to your own benefit. If you decide on being guided to-morrow by the result of my experience, that light is unreservedly at your services. You may naturally say, 'I know but little of you, captain, and that little is unfavorable.' Granted, on one condition—that you permit me to make myself out. My character quite familiar to you when tea is over. False shame is foreign to my nature. You see my wife, my house, my bread, my butter, and my eggs, all of which they are. See me, too, my dear girl, while you are about it."

When tea was over Mrs. Wragge, at a signal from her husband, retired to a corner of the room with the eternal cookery-book still in her hand. "Mince small," she whispered, confidentially, as she passed Magdalen. "That's a Tenzer, isn't it?"

"Down at heel again!" shouted the captain, pointing to his wife's heavy feet as they shuffled across the room. "The right shoe. Pull it up at heel, Mrs. Wragge—pull it up at heel! Pray allow me," he continued, offering his arm to Magdalen, and escorting her to a dirty little horse-hair sofa. "You want repose—after your long journey, you really want repose." He drew his chair to the sofa and surveyed her with a blend look of investigation—as if he had been her medical attendant, with a diagnosis on his mind.

"Very pleasant! very pleasant!" said the captain, when he had seen his guest comfortable on the sofa. "I feel quite in the bosom of my family. Shall we proceed to business—the subject of my rascally self? No! no! No apologies, no protestations, pray. Suppose we make the matter on your side—and depend on me not to mince it on mine. Now come to facts; pray come to facts. Who and what am I? Carry your mind back to our conversation on the Walls of this interesting city, and try to start once more from your point of view. I am a Rogue; and in that capacity (as I have already remarked) one of the most unlucky and possibly have met with. Now observe! There are many varieties of Rogue; but I am not my enemy to begin with. I am a Swindler."

His entire shamelessness was really superhuman. Not the vestige of a blush lighted the sallow monotony of his complexion; the smile wreathed his curly lips as pleasantly as ever; his part-collodged eyes looked at Magdalen with the self-enjoying frankness of a naturally harmless man. Had his wife been there Magdalen looked over his shoulder to the corner of the room in which she was sitting behind him. But the self-indulgent head of Mrs. Wragge was absorbed in her subject. She had advanced her imaginary cookery to the point at which the butter was to be thrown in—that vaguely-measured morsel of butter, the size of your thumb. Mrs. Wragge was in the contemplation of one of her own thumbs, and shook her head over it, as if it failed to please her.

"Don't be shocked," proceeded the captain; "don't be astonished. Swindler is nothing but a word of two letters, S, W, I, N, D, L, E, R,—ler: Swindler. Definition: A moral agriculturist; a man who cultivates the field of human sympathy. Let us call the agriculturist that cultivating man. Narrow-minded medicine, using unusual success to contemptible ends, me a Swindler. What of that? The same low tone of mind assails men in other professions in a similar manner—call them, for example, politicians —great generals butchers—and so on. It entirely upsets the question. Let us, to resume my point, I announce myself intelligibly as a Swindler. Now return the obligation, and adopt a frank line. Have you ever been employed in the exercise of my profession.—Shall I continue to put it bluntly?"

"Yes," said Magdalen; "and I'll tell you frankly afterward what I think of it."

The captain rose, and began, mentally assembled his entire army of words—horse, foot, artillery, and reserves; put himself at the head, and dashed impetuously into the general encroachments of society by a general charge.

"Now, observe," he began, "I am, in a purely object. Very good. Without complicating the question by asking how I come to be in that condition, I shall merely say that whether it is, or is not, the duty of a Christian community to help the helpless, it is the duty of a Swindler to shock me; and there is an end of it. If you say Yes, then I beg to ask, Why am I to blame for making a Christian community do what it ought? You may say, Is a careful man who has saved money bound to assist the first careless stranger who has saved none? Why, of course he is! And on what ground, pray? On Heavens! on the ground that he has got the money, to be sure. All the world over the man who has not got the thing obtains it, in one pretense or another, of the man who has—and in nine cases out of ten the pretense is a false one. What! your pockets are full, and your pockets are empty, and you refuse to help me? Sordid wretch! do you think I will allow you to violate the sacred relations of man to human nature. I won't allow you—I say distinctly, I won't allow you. These are your principles, my good agriculturist. Principles which admit of trickery? Certainly. Am I to blame if the field of human sympathy can be tilled? Are you to blame very? Consult my brother agriculturists in the mere farming interest—they will answer as I am asking? No! they must circumvent arid Nature exactly as I circumvent sordid Man. They must plow, and sow, and harrow, and hoe, and hum-draw, and drop-drain, and surface-drain, and all the rest of it. Why? Because the waste in the vast occupation of deep-draining mankind? Why am I to be persecuted for habitually exciting the human sympathies of one common nature? Infamous!—I can characterize it by no other word—infamous! It is Daddy's confidence in the future I should despair of humanity—but I have confidence in the future. I feel sure of getting my people to the end of the gone, as idea enlarge and enlightenment progresses, the abstract merits of the profession now called swindling will be recognized. The bad day comes don't drag me out of my grave and give me a public funeral; don't take advantage of my having no voice to raise in my own defense, and insult me by a national stone. No! the genial hour will arrive, and you will call in one masterly sentence on my epitaph. Here lies Wragge, Embalmed in the moral consciousness of his species: he plowed, sowed, and reaped his fellow-creatures; and enlightened posterity congratulates him on the uniform excellence of his crops."

He stopped; not from want of confidence, not from want of words—purely from want of breath. "I put it frankly, with a dash of humor," he said, pleasantly. "I don't like to be dull. Dr Weary and heart-sick as she was, suspicious of others, doubtful of herself, the extravagant impudence of Captain Wragge's defense of swindling touched Magdalen's natural sense of humor, and forced a smile to her lips. "Is the Yorkshire crop a particularly rich one just at present?" she inquired, meeting him, in her acutely feminine way, with his own weapons.

"A hit—a palpable hit!" said the captain, joyously exhib ing the tails of his threadbare shooting-jacket, as a practical commentary on Magdalen's remark. "My dear girl, here or elsewhere, the crop never fails; but one man reaps it, and another sows it. In the assistant of intelligent co-operation is. I regret to say, denied me. I have only got as common help in the chimney rank and file of my profession, who convict themselves, before recorders and magistrates, of the want of all efficiency—invariable stupidity in the exercise of their own vocation. Such as you see me, I stand—single-handed—the victim of successful self-dependence, the penalties of celebrity are beginning to attach to me. On my way from the North, I pause at this interesting city for the third time; I consult my Books for the customary information. Where is my audience; I find under the heading, 'Personal position in York,' the initials T. W. K., signifying Tom Will Known. I refer to my Books, and rotate to the surrounding neighborhood. The same initial remarks meet my eye. Leeds, T. W. K.; Scarborough, T. W. K.; Harrowgate, T. W. K., and so on. What is the inevitable consequence? I speak up to proceedings my resources evaporate; and my fair relative finds me at a crisis in my career."

"Stop!" cried Magdalen. "What books do you mean?"

"You shall see," replied the captain. "Trust me or not, as you like—I trust you implicitly. You shall see."

With those words he retired into the back room. While he was gone Magdalen stole another look at Mrs. Wragge. Was she entirely isolated from her husband's deluge of words? Perfectly self-isolated. She had advanced the imaginary omelette to the point of culinary progress; and she was now rehearsing the final operation of turning it over—with the palm of her hand, the frying-pan, the dish, and the cookery-book to impersonate the frying-pan. "I've got it," said Mrs. Wragge, addressing the fire-place at Magdalen. "First put the frying-pan on the dish, and then tumble both of them over."

Captain Wragge returned, carrying a neat black dispatch-box, adorned with a bright brass plate. "Mr. Wragge's Books," he said, as he plump little books, bound in commercial calf and vellum, and each fitted comfortably with its own little key.

"Mind!" said the moral agriculturist, "I take no credit to myself for this. It is my nature to be orderly, and orderly I am. I must have every thing down in black and white, or I should go mad. Here is the commencement of it!—Day-Book, Ledger, Book of Districts, Book of Letters, Book of Remarks, and so on. Kindly throw your eye over any one of them. I flatter myself there is no such thing as a blot or a care less entry in the whole list from end to end. Look at this room—is there a chair out of place? Not if I know it! Look at us. Am I dusty am I dirty? Am I in a perspiration? Is my head a speckless pauper, or am I not? Mind! I take no credit to myself: the management of the man, my dear girl—the nature of the man!"

He opened one of the books. Magdalen was the pages of figures and memorandums with which the accounts inside were all kept, but she could calculate the value of nothing. Advertising, the regularity in the rows of figures, the maintenance of exactness of the ruled lines in red and black ink, the obvious absence of blots, were her sources. Although Captain Wragge's inborn sense of fun was, in him, as it is in others, a sense inconsistently mechanical to exercise any elevated moral influence over his actions, it had produced the salutary effect on his habits which had reduced his rogueries as strictly to method and system as if they had been the commercial transactions of an honest man.

"In appearance, my system looks complicated?" proceeded the captain. "It is not; it is simplicity itself. I merely avoid the errors of inferior practitioners. That is to say, I never let a memory exist, and I never trust to eye-people—both fatal mistakes which the inferior practitioner perpetually commits. Take the case which means sometimes have generous impulses in connection with money—rich people, never. My name plow, and sow, and hum-draw, and hoe, and hum-drain, and drop-drain, and surface-drain, and all the rest of it. What is the result? Failure in the vast occupation of deep-draining mankind? Why am I to be persecuted for habitually exciting the human sympathies of one common nature? Infamous!—I can characterize it by no other word—infamous! It is Daddy's confidence in the future I should despair of humanity—but I have confidence in the future. That is to say, I never let a memory exist, and I never trust to eye-people—both fatal mistakes which the inferior practitioner perpetually commits. Take the case which means sometimes have generous impulses in connection with money—rich people, never. My name is Wragge, and I live at No. 10, Bond Street, property in half a dozen counties—those are the men who never forgive the genteel beggar for invading the sanctity of a servant's privacy, for the men who send for the mendicity officers. Those are the men who have no imagination! Who are the people who lose shillings and sixpences by sheer thoughtlessness? Servants and footmen. To whom shillings and sixpences are of consequence. Did you ever hear of Rochefoucault's saying? Rochefoucault's people live down a gutter-hole. Fourpence in Rothschild's pocket is safer than fourpence in the pocket of a gentleman who is ruined and starving in Sheldergate at this moment. Fortified by these considerations, and possessing the means of written information in my commercial library, I have ranged through the population for years past, and have gained my knowledge of men in the most cheering success. Here, in book Number One, are all my Districts mapped out, with the prevalent public feeling to appeals in each—Military District, Clerical District, Agricultural District; Et cætera, Et cætera. Here, in Number Two, are my cases that I plead; Family of an officer who fell at Waterloo; Wife of a poor curate stricken down by nervous debility; Widow of a grazier in difficulties forced to death by a mad bull; Et cætera, Et cætera. Here, in Number Three, are the people who have heard of the officer's family, the curate's wife, the grazier's widow, and the people who haven't; the people who have said Yes, and the people who have said No; the people to try again, the people with a fresh case to visit; the up, the people who are doubtful, the people beware of. Et cætera, Et cætera. Here, in Number Four, are my Adopted Handwritings of public characters; my testimonials to my own worth and integrity; my Business-Cards, specimens of the officer's family, the curate's wife, the grazier's widow, stained with tears, blotted with emotion; Et cætera, Et cætera. Here, in Numbers Five and Six, are my own personal Memoranda-Books, containing abridged and remunerative neighborhoods, on the profits of throwing a spray to catch a herring; also, my diary of each day's proceedings, my reflections and remarks, my testimonials to my own worth, my Cards such as the following, folding myself T. W. K. in this interesting city) and my gotings and incomings; wind and weather; pri vate affairs; private credit; Mrs. Wragge's temper health; fluctuations in the money market, our payments, prospects, and principles; Et cætera, Et cætera. So, my dear girl, the Swindler's Mind is open. So you are welcome to look. You know, before I met you, that I lived on my wits. Well! have I or have I not, shown you that I have wits to live on?"

"I have no doubt you have done yourself full justice," said Magdalen, quietly.

"I am not at all exhausted," continued the captain. "I can go on, if necessary, for the rest of the evening. Come! you have heard myself full justice, perhaps I may leave the remaining points to be developed by the pieces selves at future opportunities. For the present I withdraw myself from notice. Exit Wragge. Ask me to business to-morrow. Say then what effect I have produced on your own mind by what I have said to you. Say whether you trusted you with all his secrets in a Rogue who is bent on taking a mean advantage of a fair opportunity."

"I will wait a little," Magdalen rejoined, "before I answer those questions. I have been close to tea you told me you had been employed you mind for my benefit. May I ask how?"

"By an advertisement," said Wragge. "You shall have the net result of the whole mental process.

Said process ranges over the present and future governesses, the past governesses fixed, and of the lawyers who are helping them to find out their present prospects and their future probability, assuming the following form: The lawyer's clerk has given you up at Mr. Huxtable's, and has also, by this time, given up the other family inquiry at all the hotels. His last chance is, that you may come to see me. Now, my dear young lady, you don't send for it—and there the clerk is to-night (thanks to Captain Wragge and Rosemary Cottage) and there he will remain to-morrow. Well, with communicate that fact to his employers in London, and to my employers (don't be shocked!) will apply for help to my inquisitive sale. Allowing for inevitable delays, a professional eye, with all his wits about him, will reach Britain in York, if you attempt to communicate with Mr. Huxtable, before the end of the week. If, on the other hand, you leave the city before he comes (taking your departure by other means than the railway) you will be safe for a week. Those are my discamant as the clerk—you defy him to find a fresh trace of you. Those are the best shows of your present position. What do you think of it?"

"I think it has one defect," said Magdalen. "It ends in nothing."

"Pardon me," retorted the captain; "it ends in an encouragement for your safe departure, and in a plan for the entire gratification of your wishes on the subject of your future life. Both drawn from the resources of my own experience; and both waiting a word from you, to be poured forth unstintingly. Is that the end?"

"I think I know what that word is," replied Magdalen, looking him steadily in the face.

"Charmed to hear it, I am sure. You here only to say, 'Captain Wragge, take charge of me, and put my plans as you please.'"

"I will take to-night to consider your proposal," she said, rising from her chair hastily. "You shall have my answer to-morrow morning."

Captain Wragge looked a little disappointed. He had not expected the reservation on his side to be met so composedly by a woman who had to be met so composedly by a woman who had "no choice but to say yes or advance?" he remonstrated, in his most persuasive tones. "You have only to consider—"

"I have more to consider than you think for," she answered. "I have another object in view besides the object you name."

"May I ask—?"

"No," said Captain Wragge—you may not ask. Allow me to thank you for your hospitality, and to wish you good-night." And with that word, she left.

Once more the captain wisely adapted himself to the luxury with the ready self-control of an experienced man.

"Worn out, of course!" he said, sympathetically, to Magdalen's departing back. "Worn out—thought of it before. We will resume our conversation to-morrow. Permit me to give you a candle. Mrs. Wragge!"

Frustrated by mental exertion, Mrs. Wragge was pursuing the course of the omelette in dreams. Her head was twisted one way, and her body the other. She snored audibly. At intervals one of her hands raised itself in despair, shook an imaginary frying-pan, and then dropped again with a faint, hollow sound, like that in her lap. At the sound of her husband's voice she started to her feet, and confronted him with her mind fast asleep and her eyes wide open.

"Assist Miss Vanstone," said the captain. And the next time you forget yourself in your chair, fall asleep straight—don't annoy me by falling asleep crooked."

Mrs. Wragge opened her eyes a little wider, and looked at Magdalen in helpless amazement.

"Is the captain breakfasting by candlelight?" she inquired, meekly. "And haven't I done the crockets?"

Before her husband's corrective voice could apply a fresh stimulant Magdalen took her companionably by the arm, and led her out of the room.

"Another object besides the object I know of?" repeated Captain Wragge, when he was left by himself. "Here's a pretty piece of back-ground, after all! Is there mischief brewing in the dark that I don't bargain for?"

ESSAYS AND REMARKS.

BEAUTY.—Woman, because beauty is supposed to be mere, is often called the fair sex, but throughout nearly all nations the women are no more beautiful than the men, and most of the men are hideously ugly. In England there are more beautiful women than there are in France; but even there female beauty is so much the reverse of common that a woman herself, meaning to say that another is ugly, will term her ordinary, or, at that word is too generously phrased, crazy.

A beautiful girl, red and white, much resembles an opened peony in bloom; only apple-blossom has more delicate tints. At a venture, beauty, like the Grace-digger's name, "will not you tone your," permits of more or less moor; very likely not so many years' but its decay, though quite unnoticed, is steady. Love and beauty are in much connexion to a wife's fidelity, as a gun used to be to wife's defence; then, if ever so good, it was not of it were not, perhaps, half thankful for not using it. Men are always there for their beauty, and a girl able to get married by mere feminine attractions is one to be happier in marriage without beauty than she would be with it.

Beauty is chiefly a matter of limited roundness of form, and the expression of such in the right place. Or color in the wrong place is not beautiful—for instance, red at the end of the nose. White complexion, though a certain sign of a beautiful girl, is not always a beautiful woman. Beauty is not preserved by moderation in eating, not to say drinking, plenty of exercise, and the use of cold water, without any preparation, in which sense of which the best is yellow. Beauty of feature is kept longest by beauty of the heart. Our circulation has increased to 7500 copies, which were worked in three and a half hours on the Cottage Press of the Adams Press Co., 81 Park Row, New York, which is admirably circulated for the purpose. By turning a crank, as we happen it there, the form is inked, the paper fed, which gives the impression; out at the other end, and the typ-ical raised form is left in the chase ready for printing the crank, the operation is repeated. Our paper has now reached its ninth number, and the whole expense to that date (the printers refusing all compensation), has been as follows:

An Intensely Interesting Book

THE MASTER

BY MRS. MARY A. DENISON.

This is an entirely new, original, and novel story—different from any thing ever before published, and can not fail to instantly interest every class of readers.

Mrs. Denison is one of the few female authoresses who never fails to enchain the interest of her readers, and no one who commences the perusal of her book for purity and creation of purpose, impact to her productions of charm and fascination, will lay it down until finished.

It is a book of character as especially appeared. The characters are mostly ARTICAL PERSONS, and have been drawn from nature, and are given expression very nearly through thus pronounced forward.

The interest of the story is well preserved, and is sustained, and increases to the last page of the book.

The characters in the volume and the incidents are natural, and the style is easy, flowing, and often strikingly eloquent.

It is eminently a book worthy the large sale to which it can not fail to attain.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VI.—No. 285.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 14, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3 00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

THE FLAG-SHIP "HARTFORD" ATTACKED BY THE RAM "MANASSAS" AND A FIRE-RAFT IN THE MISSISSIPPI.—[See [illegible] 378.]

THE BALLAD OF THE CRESCENT CITY.

I.

In the City of the Crescent, by red Mississippi's water,
Dwells the haughty Creole matron with her daughters and her sisters.
Round her throng the rebel knighthood, flower of word and breed of creed,
Slightly redolent of julep, cocktail, cobbler, and the rest
Of those miscellaneous tipples that the Southern heart must needs have
To the mighty throats of prowess whose dread fly fronts we know so well.
Round the matron and her daughters ring chivalric voices bold:
"Not the meanest soul among them but is sworn to die or die!
"Never to the Yankee Vandal, foul and horrid thing of wood and steel,
Will they have their maids and matrons while a single arm can wield
Arm holds there, and Richmond will be safe!
Perish every Southern scorner! Death! They crave not less nor more!
Then each doctorate knight retires—to his favorite Quadroon!

II.

In the City of the Crescent, by red Mississippi's waves,
Rite the haughty Creole matron with her daughters and her slaves!
But her eye no longer flashes with the fire it held of late,
For, alas! the Yankee Vandals thunder at the city gate.
Proud old Mississippi's waters, booming her the dark levee,
Ride the gallant Northern war-ships, flouts the Banner of the Free!
While a calm-eyed Captain prates through a sea of scowling guns
To demand the full surrender of the city there and then.
Yet the haughty Creole lady's cursed sorrow lies not there:
"I'm not that the Yankee scandrils will pollute her sacred air;
Though her delicate fibres shudder doubtless at the dreadful thought
That her soft and fragrant breathings may by Yankee lips be caught:
Not the ruin of all darkindest—that which makes her heart dissolve—
Is, her knighthood have all "skedaddled," and have left her to her fate!
Yes, no strength of smash or julep, nor the cocktail's bitterest bait,
Kept those perjured warriors steady when they saw the Yankee fleet;
All their daguerreotypes vanished like a mist before the moon—

III.

In the City of the Crescent, by red Mississippi's waves,
Walks the haughty Creole matron with her daughters and her slaves;
Freedom's fire is flaming o'er her, Freedom's sons she hails as brothers,
And the olden scornful fire burns rekindled in her eyes.
How dare Freedom thus insult her? How dare wretch
Walk unto her to her hallowed by the toil-sweat of the slave?
"What! you call that flag your banner? You, Sir, brimming, bonnie, I mean!
That I, right up to your emblem! Let your chart's blood wash it clean!
Down you went your liveried jacket, bleeding brave that you are!
Lawkey, paid to rob and murder in a thin disguised war!"
Then with mercy's bending gesture, and with pity's tear-dew,
Northern brutes
As she thanks along the sidewalk with her daughters and her slaves!
Straight right the Northern soldiers, smiling, though they feel the stings
Of the foul and lustrivious taunts the Southern lady flings.
So she passes, while the venom from her fragrant mouth still slips
Like the loathsome toads and lizards from the enchanted maiden's lips,
And her spotless soul joys doubtless, salt her modest bosom heats,
That she so has sped the harlots in her city's public streets!

IV.

In the City of the Crescent, by red Mississippi's waves,
Walks the haughty Creole lady with her daughters and her slaves!
But her eye no longer flashes with its wonted fire of hate;
Her tongue is strangely silent now, and modest is her gait;
With quiet mien and bonnets she passes soldiers by,
Her eyes on our country's flag turns it slowly to the sky!
What wondrous glamour so hath changed the haughty lady's mind,
The cause of her rebellious heart hath she in errors seen?
Or has her pride been overcome that Yankees have met by Worthy of even a Creole's love? Is hers no longer free?
No! It is one of those who cannot bear the rebel soil;
On each sandhill she, circus, still breathes inward curse and skill
And as for love, save for her knight, no love her heart can stir;
Since ever a lady's engraved brick he swore to die for her;
For though he died not, but preferred another field to seek,
'Twas only, as she knows, because that judge was too weak!
'Twas none of them! A strange cause for change of mien and bel cha!

For spitting nose too often at the Banner of the Free,
And one too oft through her rose lips to hiss the Yankee tiou lions,
The harmless flag whose stars and stripes only—the CASAsconse!

THE PROGRESS OF THE WEEK.

WHEN we closed the last number of Harper's Weekly, the public mind had been rendered so anxious by the repulse of McClellan, and the alarm which it caused in Washington, that we deemed it necessary to assure our readers that all was not lost; that the entire militia of the North would not be wanted; and that, so far as we could judge, the rebels would not take Washington in the next day or two.

A week has elapsed, and the aspect of affairs is certainly more cheerful.

McClellan's army, after having fought two battles, is within four miles of Richmond. From the balloon in which the General directs the operations of his army he can see the trembling leaders of the rebellion gathering in knots on street-corners in their chosen capital, wringing their hands, and bewailing their destiny. There may be another battle before Richmond, or it may be evacuated as every other place has been which the rebels had said they would hold. But whether they fight or run, Richmond will be ours in a given number of days.

Corinth, the great strong-hold of Beauregard in the Southwest, has been found empty, and is abandoned. The original design of the rebels in falling back from Corinth was probably to gain a safer position in the heart of the Southern States—such as Chattanooga, Atlanta, or Montgomery—where they might be joined by such portions of the army in Virginia as remain organized after the fall of Richmond. But fate disconcerts many well-laid plans. Colonel Elliott has put a stop to the further flight of rebels by way of the Mobile and Ohio Road; and we hear from General Halleck's army that a large number of Beauregard's troops fled westward toward Grand Junction and Memphis. Where and how can Beauregard reunite his scattered regiments? May not the rebel army of the Southwest be completely demoralized, disorganized and disbanded—broken up into guerrilla bands and swamp rangers?

Finally, the news of Banks's reverses is now the scene of Union triumphs. Frémont has crossed the mountains from Franklin to Harrisonburg and engaged Jackson. Another Union army has reoccupied Front Royal, and driven back a rebel force with heavy loss. And Shields himself, strongly reinforced, is pushing up the valley from Martinsburg and Winchester. Unless Jackson has retreated as skilfully and as quickly as Banks, the army which so lately threw the North into a panic will very shortly be an army no more.

THE WORK OF RECONSTRUCTION.

BALTIMORE, Nashville, and New Orleans, are the points where the forces of the United States are experimenting on the reunion of the United States. For to restore the Union of 1860, we can do it throughout the South. If we can not succeed there, the bulk of the white people of the South will have to be exiled, or be rid of in some other way, in order to reconstruct the Union and secure the safety of the North.

We are happy to refer to Baltimore. The action of the citizens of that city will be thoroughly rebel as any city at the South. Our troops were assassinated in passing through its streets. The Mayor, Common Council, and the Police Director, united in a protest against the transit of Union soldiers through Baltimore for the protection of Washington. All classes were in sympathy with disloyalty—so much so that Mr. Cameron, the Secretary of War, desired to bang all the officials of the police on the tree in front of the War Department; and the best men of the North would have been glad to hear that the city had been shelled by the Union fleet—provided there had elapsed, during which we have held Baltimore and Maryland under strict military rule. We have garrisoned the city and the State with loyal troops. We have built forts with guns commanding the city. We have lodged mayors, councilors, and State Legislators in prison. We have suppressed disloyal newspapers. We have shut disloyal mouths. And while we have protected Maryland from being the seat of war, and it would have been if the rebel Marylanders had had their way—every foot of ground in the city and State to earn an honest living. The result of this policy is before us. Baltimore is now as violent on the side of Union as it was on the side of rebellion thirteen months ago. One of the best regiments in our service was recruited in Baltimore, and is now with Frémont in the Baltimore mob. In the terse language of the telegraphic reporter, "Everywhere Secessionists have been forced to bow crooked down by the people." But for the interference of our troops one of them would have been hanged the other day. A meeting of Methodists, believed to be united with treason, created such excitement among the people that the police had to interfere and disperse the meeting by a charge through back streets. There where, thirteen months ago, women calling themselves ladies made a point of hissing the Union troops in the street, thousands of loyal banners and waving handkerchiefs welcomed the march of the Seventh last week. And the manufactured article seems good of its kind.

In Nashville and New Orleans the experiment has not yet progressed so far. We have held Nashville two months, New Orleans one. The results, however, as far as they go, are satisfactory.

In Nashville troops have been enlisted for the Union army. Union meetings have been held, and the best people of the place have attended and indorsed Union resolutions. Confederate notes are uncurrent, and United States notes are eagerly taken. Cotton and other Southern produce have been exported, and are still coming forward. The rebel organs are silenced, and, for the first time since the slavery rebellion began, the people have a chance of ascertaining the facts. Residents say that they would unhesitatingly come forward and declare themselves for the Union but for the fear of the return of the rebels. As soon as they learn that Beauregard has fled toward the Gulf they will probably conclude that the chances of a restoration of the rebel tyranny are too slim to merit consideration. We may then expect to hear of a remarkable development of "original Unionism."

Under the vigorous administration of Major-General Butler, New Orleans is steadily returning into shape. General Butler has been more energetic and less conciliatory than General Dix and Governor Johnson: his iron hand has not been covered with a silken glove. We venture the prediction that his success will be all the more thorough and complete. The good people of Louisiana are already complaining that they have been victimized by the rebels. And no wonder. What could be more outrageous than the destruction of cotton and sugar, while hundreds of thousands of human beings are starving to death for want of the food which could only be purchased with this cotton and sugar? To bring the people of Louisiana entirely to their senses, nothing more is needed than a plain statement of this, and we are glad to see that General Butler has stated it. When one reads of the terrible drug sufferings of the people of the Gulf States—of whole families starving, and every rich man reduced to poverty—one is tempted to wonder that the civilization of the age forbids the infliction of the tortures of the Inquisition upon the miscreant authors of these atrocities. Nothing would require more than Davis, Beauregard, and Lovell should exploit their crimes on the rack or at the stake. Meanwhile, the quiet, steady, and just, the exemplary punishment of traitors by General Butler, is gradually developing a Union sentiment at New Orleans as the policy did at Baltimore.

In order to create a Union sentiment at the South, we must satisfy the people of that section that we are stronger than they, and that we are thoroughly in earnest in our purpose of preserving the old of United States undivided. We must then show them that if they persevere in rebellion they can not escape hunger and misery; that they can not escape bankruptcy, anarchy or rights of any kind; that it is a mere question of time how soon they will be hunted like wild beasts; that there is no fear whatever that the negroes have not been armed for insurrection; whereas, on the other hand, if they return to their allegiance they will be received into the Union with the same rights as the people of the North, and will be assisted by a generous Government to recover from their chaos and start afresh in a new and wholesome career of industry. When this is done, the work of reconstruction will be more than half achieved.

THE LOUNGER.

THE JEWEL IN THE TOAD'S HEAD.

SOME weeks since an order was suddenly issued by the Secretary of War for all the troops in Washington to be ready for an immediate movement. The response was perfect. The Mix cavalry, for instance, were in the saddle with forage and two days' rations within a quarter of an hour. The forces were thoroughly informed that the object of the order was to prove their condition, and that it was found to be entirely satisfactory.

The move was a rapid and masterly retreat down the Shenandoah Valley was an equally safe, but still more effective, march and reinforce of the whole country, and the response was equally perfect. It seems almost worth while, saving the suffering of our brave troops, that the alarm should have occurred, for it has revealed to ourselves our continued strength and to the rebels the full of Sumter. revealed their existence. It was a public surprise, but not a panic. There was great indignation, but no fear. The issue of the soul-shocking consternation that immediately, but only temporarily, succeeded the dark day at Bull Run. The Stock market, that most sensitive indicator of panic, varied very slightly; and the regiments marched gayly, not sullenly, to the front, as in the hour of consciousness National peril a year ago.

The retreat has had the valuable effect of showing to the rebels and treacherous sympathizers, and to the most truculent and ferocious of the rebels, that the task they undertook is summoned to achieve it will accomplish, without dismay, without fatigue, without faltering, and at whatever cost of time, and blood and money. The patriotic Vallandigham, and Jeff Davis who wishes only to be let alone, will therefore shed and groan as they heard the murmur of joyful and instant readiness all over the loyal part of the land. All the abettors of intervention who try to paralyze patriotism by calling it abolitionism, must have gazed in dire dismay upon Joseph Johnston tail of a year undone in a moment. Just as they imagined to stagger the country into consenting to its own destruction, by showing how expensive it is to suppress a barbarous rebellion, they see that the country would gladly double its expenditure, if it were necessary, for its salvation. The Southern rebels are fond of citing classical incidents and examples. Let them understand, then, that Sisyphus and Tantalus were idle and contented gentlemen compared with their friends at the North; and that the ladies who hold their aprons in store would have emptied the ocean than the allies of rebels in and

Was it Napoleon who stamped his foot and legions of armed men sprang from the ground? No, it was not; for Napoleon by the most remorseless conscription drew soldiers to his army: So Davis and Floyd, and Cobb scrape the country to swell their starved and sickened ranks of rebellion; and one whisper that more men are wanted brings thousands willing, eager, and rejoiced, to march, to fight, and to fall, if it must be, for our country—our great, generous, and glorious mother.

THE FEROCITY OF THE REBELLION.

THE cruel and inevitable necessities, treachery, and crimes of the rebels every day accumulate the horror. "The Louisiana was set on fire and sent down on the rebels while Captain Farragut, following up a capitulation for the surrender of the forts, a flag of truce flying at the time," says Commodore Porter, of the New Orleans. They cut off heads of our dead at Manassas; they boiled the bodies to get the bones separated. They hung our brave brothers with their faces down; they swung their hearts as trophies upon their housetops at Fredericksburg; Tennessee, they drew bayonets and his heroic troop of Maryland with a white flag, then murdered the black and mutilated them; they bayoneted the wounded in the Virginia valley; they blew their heads off with the muzzles of their guns held close; they hung old men and young men in Tennessee guilty of loving their country, making the victim kneel beneath the gallows while they strangled his son, and then with fiendish oaths hung the father beside him; they suspended women and gray haired ladies, and, when the trains as they passed, while women waven handkerchiefs from the windows of the cars; they shot into our ambulances carrying the wounded and dying; women from the Winchester windows fired pistols at our retreating troops; they poisoned wells and cakes; they planted torpedoes at Yorktown and Hilton Head to blow up our soldiers. This is the record of seasons—years of murder, of assassination, of hell!" said Parson Brownlow, and he told the truth.

This is that chivalric, refined, proud people, who are striking gallantly for their liberty against the ruthless Northern hordes who have lost all love of power in the North. This is that gentlemanly, courteous, sensitive people, who can not associate with Yankee tinkers and peddlers. This is the "master race," as De Bow calls it, dealing with the "inferior race" of the North. This is the story of their crimes against God and man is only heard by us as yet in tragic whispers. Dishonor and infamy are very kind. Lincoln and his people could not emulate; superstition, ignorance, and fanaticism could not do anything but have bred and sustained this rebellion, and these are the qualities that slavery breeds. That every rebel is inhuman no one would say. That every rebel is intelligence, no generosity, no honor among the rebels is not asserted. But these are the qualities which of the movement is one of utter ferocity, hate, ignorance, and barbarism is as palpable as its cause is lameness and blindness. The rebel who murdered who would not rather hear that his soldier son was shot dead than that he had fallen wounded into the hands of foes. The rebel who would be horrified to the tender mercies of Nena Sahib as to theirs.

Why, then, do we not treat these rebels as fellow-citizens? For the same reason that the city of New York does not recognize the independence of all its neighbors and scoundrels. Because the trouble and expense of letting them go as enemies are a thousand times greater than that of suppressing, holding, and subduing them into decent citizens. Because if a limb is diseased it is wiser to cure it than to cut it off.

In the rebels we are dealing with blind enemies, with fiends whose very natures mistaken. The Union men in the rebel section are, of course, our friends; but they are not mistaken. Jeff Davis is not our mistaken friend. Nor are Beauregard, nor Mason, nor Slidell, nor Cobb, nor Pierre Soulé. They are more our remorseless enemies than any Englishman or Frenchman who, in the event of war with England or France. The rank and file of the rebel armies are indeed misled, because these leaders by careful falsehood have misled them. But this multitude are none the less our bitter enemies. The very ignorance by which the leaders play makes their followers ferocious in the hate.

Among the whites in the rebel section there are but these three classes: friends, and intelligent and ignorant enemies. The first need political and necessary measure for their relief can alienate. It is not so with the rebellion as among that it will dismay Brownlow or the brave Bedingty of New Orleans? "You needn't hold courts to try such men," said Brownlow, speaking of a Union man there (not Brownlow) to a friend of the Lounger. "there won't be any trailers if you say they'll be executed." It, then, our friends in the rebel section can not be readily alienated, seizure of property is an exceptional, but very rare not heat iron already white hot. The question can not be tortured into one of conciliation; it is simply a question of conquest and police. It will be decided by superior force, and then settled by superior force. The foreign paper says that it doesn't understand how a republic can retain a half dozen millions of unwilling citizens. It has only to wait, and it will learn.

MODERATION.

MR. B. F. THOMAS, of Massachusetts, formerly a distinguished judge in that State, is the present representative in Congress from John Quincy Adams's district. He is a man of unblemished character, and of great accomplishment and ability; and he represents the Whig party splendidly. He was nominated upon the appointment to Congress of his predecessor, Charles Francis Adams, and by virtue of the great majority in that district the fall of an eminent Republican who was supposed to be the choice of the party for the succession; but the point was not pressed, and Mr. Thomas was nominated as a thoroughly loyal Union man, but moderate and conservative—of which qualifications the sufficient guarantee was the urgent support he received from Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, a gentleman chiefly known in his State by his conspicuous services in enforcing, as United States Commissioner, the Fugitive Slave Law.

Mr. Thomas has been an eminent leader of the moderate party in Congress, except in the Trent affair, in which he took a strong anti-English position, and not in the least conciliatory. But his learning, his discretion, his candor, and his intellectual ability, have justly given great weight to his words. On the 10th of April he spoke upon the Confiscation and Emancipation bills, opposing both, but with clearness and good temper. Yet in this speech, which has been regarded as so signal a triumph for the reaction, Mr. Thomas plainly states the right and duty of the Government to require all persons to arm in its defense. Those who loosely say that he favors slavery at the expense of Union have not read his words. It is with him simply a question of time, not of right or power.

Slaves in the military and naval service of the rebels, he says, may be freed.

"The Government may refuse to return a slave to a master who has been engaged in the rebellion, or suffered the slave to be employed in it."

"It may require the services of all persons subject to its jurisdiction by residing upon its territory, when the exigency arises, to aid in executing the laws, in repressing insurrection, or repelling invasion....Nothing but the direst extremity would excuse the use of a power fraught with so great perils to both races." And he thinks we shall triumph without it.

"There is one other exigency in which the relation of master and slave must give way to military exigency. If the Commander of a military district shall find that the slaves within it, by the strength they give to their rebellious masters—by bearing arms, or doing other military service, or acting as the servants of those who do—obstruct his efforts to subdue the rebellion, he may deprive the enemy of this force, and may remove the obstruction by giving freedom to the slaves."

As the slaves build the fortifications from which our friends are slaughtered by the rebels, as they are the servants of the rebels every where, as their labor and presence immensely obstruct our efforts to reduce the rebellion, it would seem that this exigency mentioned by Mr. Thomas had very nearly arrived. One thing at least is clear, the "great perils" to the white race resulting from employing black men to fight for the Union could not possibly be more awful than those the white race already suffers from rebels fighting against the Union. The barbarism of the slaves, whatever it be, can not be worse than that of the mass of the poor whites who compose the rebel army; and in this war, now lasting more than a year, Mr. Thomas has yet to find a solitary instance of cruelty from a slave to his master, even when every circumstance has favored. The history of the infamous wrong of slavery in this country shows that it dehumanizes the master a hundred-fold more than the subject race; nor has it ever been found that free black soldiers, organized and disciplined, have been peculiarly ferocious. Slaves rising in insurrection to save their lives and seize their liberty by destroying their masters are a fearful foe; for their vengeance is proportioned to their wrongs. But slaves freed and regularly drilled are among the best soldiers, as Washington found in the Revolution when he enlisted a regiment of slaves in Rhode Island, freed for the purpose, who were conspicuous for their gallantry, bravery, and military skill at the battle upon Quaker Hill near Newport. The black regiment "distinguished itself by deeds of desperate valor," says Arnold in his History of Rhode Island. Senator Ten Eyck, of New Jersey, says that the Jersey boys would not fight by the side of soldiers of another color. Let us hope that they deserve a higher praise than their Senator gives them; and that Jerseymen do not disdain allies who were honest and brave enough for Washington, and Greene, and Varnum, and the Rhode Island boys of '78.

Yet one thing may be freely conceded to Mr. Thomas. It is impossible to act in a matter of this kind faster than the great public opinion of the country approves, and in that perception is the profound wisdom of Mr. Lincoln. But that public opinion, on the other hand, may ripen too slowly to save the country. When the nation is willing to use every loyal hand it can command it may be too late. Therefore in this emergency the duty of a legislator is twofold; he should endeavor to make the country approve what he thinks ought to be done, and when he is sure of that approval he should vote to do it. The impatient should remember that in this country law merely, as the Fugitive Slave Law shows, will not control a settled public sentiment. The penalty may be paid, but the law will be seldom executed. A law to be just and valid must express a conviction, not an emotion.

AT NEW ORLEANS.

When Major-General Butler arrived at New Orleans the rebels caught a Tartar. He understands perfectly well that the way to develop National sentiment in that city is to show that the nation is supremely powerful. He knows that nothing is done until that is done. Genuine patriotic sentiment is doubtless nearly extinct there, while, as a trading city, it will willingly yield its allegiance to the force that proves its superiority. If there be any decided Union feeling in that city it is certainly remarkably modest. We do not deny that it may be there, and that it is awaiting results before it shows itself. It may be that it does not feel the National grasp to be so secure that it can dare to slip from the Confederate embrace. Let us be perfectly willing to wait and see if this be so. But meanwhile General Butler has to keep order, and repossess and hold the property of the United States, and he carries altogether too many guns for the gentry who oppose him.

His brisk orders will not be misunderstood. They clear "secesh" air like lightning. They say exactly what they mean, and are utterly iconoclastic. "The Second Washington" who heads this great and glorious war for the defense of the right of holding other people in slavery is called by the peremptory Butler "one Jefferson Davis." The work expended upon fortifications near the Mint by the Confederate authorities was "idly and inanely wasted." The Mayor of the city complains of an order which he says imperils the peace of the city, so that he will not answer for it; the reply is another order suspending him from his functions and committing him to Fort Jackson. He apologizes and withdraws the letter, and is continued at his post. Then he returns with friends and insists upon withdrawing the apology. The General says, "Very well, you may withdraw it; but we have been playing long enough"—and sends him and friends to Fort Jackson.

This is the method which will apprise the rebellious gentry of New Orleans and the rebel region that this Government is fully in earnest; that the loss and suffering brought upon it by this causeless and ferocious insurrection have put it into no mood to be trifled with; that it has taken up arms to touch no person, no property, no right, which ought not to be touched to secure the restoration of its supremacy, but that when it does touch it will be as with lightning; and that it means to hold every city it occupies with the military hand until its citizens give proof of their willingness to be loyal. Meanwhile, of course, mere severity is not force—a fact which General Butler shows that he fully understands.

BREECH-LOADING RIFLE.

"You will find," said an officer of Berdan's Sharp-shooters to the Lounger, "that this is not a fancy regiment." The whole country now gratefully confesses it. For they are good men with good weapons. Floyd did what he could to steal all our fire-arms—and he can do more in that way than any other American. But not even Floyd could steal our wits. The Yankee will make a gun if he hasn't one; and if he has one he will make a better. He is kinsman of the doughty warrior of whom the song says,

"And when his legs were shot away,
He fought upon his stumps."

In fact, one of the great collateral interests of the war has been its effect upon improvement in weapons, projectiles, and defenses. The principle of fixed ammunition, or water-proof cartridge, is now about as sure to supersede the old style as that iron-clad ships will replace the old wooden walls of our navy. In like manner the whole question of coast defenses is opened by the Monitor's exploits.

Among the improvements in weapons, experts agree that there is nothing better than Ballard's breech-loading rifle. It is very simple and very sure. The usual difficulties of construction and management in such arms have been thoughtfully avoided in this. Most weapons of the kind, for instance, separate the barrel from the breech, of course weakening the whole. Ballard's rifle has no such objection. It is, moreover, light, made well, and of the best materials, and is in every respect warranted. It is fitted, also, for the copper water-proof cartridge.

Soldier or sportsman looking for a rifle will naturally remember Ballard's.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

The Last Fashionable Vice.—Enameling is already on the spread. We suppose the Rachels of this superficial accomplishment will soon copy the example of the photographers in the cheap neighborhoods, and place touters at their doors, whose business it will be to waylay ladies as they go by, and to tempt them with the insinuating inquiry of, "Please, Mum, will you have your face enameled?"

The reward of villains is various; some of them are hung, others cropped and branded—others elected to office.

A large, ferocious dog, finding his way into a dry-goods store filled with lady customers, created considerable alarm; when a raw-looking case remarked that if they'd give him what he wanted likely the dog would leave. What could a dog want in a dry-goods store? Why, he wanted mus'lin, of course.

A magistrate of Chicago proposes to marry couples at one dollar a piece, if they will form clubs of twelve, and all get "fixed" at the same time."

A man with a slight attack of fever and ague is "no great shakes any how."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, May 27, in the Senate, a resolution was offered and adopted inquiring of the Secretary of War how many officers and men of the army are now confined in the District of Columbia Penitentiary, to what regiments they belong, and by what authority they were committed. The Tax bill was taken up and several amendments adopted. Without transacting any other business the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a message was received from President Lincoln, of which we give an analysis below. Read and referred. The House then took up, in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the establishment of a soldiers' hospital in the District of Columbia: the Committee rose without taking a vote on the bill. A motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the confiscation of the slaves of rebels was defeated on the previous day. Pending the motion the House adjourned.

On Wednesday, May 28, in the Senate, the Vice-President presented a message from the President, in reply to the resolution of inquiry in reference to certain arrests in Kentucky, in which the President states that it is not deemed compatible with the public interests to give the information asked at present. The special message from the President, sent into the House on the previous day, was ordered by the Senate to be printed. The Tax bill was then taken up and considered for some time, when, on motion, the Senate went into executive session. The executive session lasted but for a short time, after which the consideration of the Tax bill was resumed, and a long discussion on the question of taxing slaves as property took place, pending a decision on which the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the motion pending at the adjournment on the previous day, to reconsider the vote by which the bill to give freedom to the slaves of rebels was defeated, was, after considerable discussion, postponed. The House then went into Committee on the Whole on the Senate bill to collect Taxes in the insurrectionary districts, which was passed by a vote of 97 yeas to 17 nays. A resolution was adopted calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for a statement of the public debt, and the annual interest thereof. A bill was introduced, and referred to the Military Committee, in reference to limiting the number of volunteers to be mustered into the military service, and prohibiting the enlistment of contrabands.

On Thursday, May 29, in the Senate, Senator Willey called up the memorial of the loyal Legislature of Virginia, asking for a division of the State, and spoke in favor of it. The memorial was referred to the Territories' Committee. The Senate then continued the consideration of the Tax bill, and the proposed amendment to lay no tax on slaves in States which have adopted the President's system of gradual emancipation was rejected. An amendment was offered to make the tax on slaves two dollars each, instead of five, as proposed, which, after considerable discussion, was adopted by 28 yeas to 10 nays. The amendment of Senator Simmons, proposing to levy the tax on fewer articles, was then considered, and it was rejected by 14 yeas to 22 nays. The Senate then held an executive session, at the conclusion of which an adjournment took place.——In the House, the bill for the more effectual suppression of the African slave-trade, reported from the Judiciary Committee, was passed by a vote of 63 against 45.

On Friday, May 30, in the Senate, resolutions were offered that the Secretary of War communicate to the Senate a copy of General Hooker's official report of the battle of Williamsburg; that the Secretary of the Interior furnish a copy of the correspondence with the War Department respecting the imprisonment of soldiers in the District penitentiary, together with a copy of the District Attorney's opinion thereon. After some discussion upon the Agricultural College bill, the Tax bill was taken up and debated until the hour of adjournment.——There was no session of the House of Representatives.

On Saturday, May 31, in the Senate, Senator Wilson introduced a bill to enable slaves to establish their right to freedom, under the act of August 6, 1861. A resolution for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the official conduct of Adjutant-General Thomas was offered and laid over. The bill giving compensation to the crew of the gun-boat Varuna was passed. The memorial for the admission of Western Virginia as a separate State was considered, but no final action on it was taken. The House bill to allow California three representatives was passed. The bil to legalize all the President's acceptances of volunteers was taken up and considered for some time, some amendments being proposed; but a vote on the subject was not reached at the hour of one o'clock, the time for taking up the Tax bill, when the consideration of that subject was resumed, which, without any definite result, continued till the adjournment.——The House of Representatives was not in session.

On Monday, June 2, in the Senate, petitions were presented in favor of a sufficient enlargement of the canals of this State to fit them for being navigated by gun-boats. A resolution was offered calling on the Secretary of War for copies of the instructions furnished to Governor Johnson, of Tennessee, and Governor Stanley, of North Carolina. The bill providing for the collection of direct taxes in the rebellious States was returned from the House with amendments, and all the amendments excepting one were adopted. The discussion of the Tax bill was resumed. Different amendments were acted on, when the bill was reported complete, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a resolution similar to that offered in the Senate, calling for copies of the instructions to the Provisional Governors of Tennessee and North Carolina, was adopted. Bills were introduced for the organization of the Territory of Lanawa; to prohibit the reduction of free persons to slavery; for the emancipation of Robert Smalls and the other colored men who recently brought the rebel steamer Planter out of Charleston harbor and delivered her to the United States naval forces, and making additional appropriations for the postal service, all of which were referred to the appropriate committees. The Senate bill for the appointment of diplomatic agents to Hayti and Liberia was introduced and discussed till the adjournment, without any decision on it being arrived at.

A MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The President sent an important message to Congress on 27th, explaining the measures taken by the Government at the commencement of the rebellion for the protection of the Union and the Constitution. He recounts the history of the chartering of vessels and providing transportation and supplies then adopted, and assumes to himself the responsibility to answer for the honesty of the Administration and the agents they employed. He states that he consulted his entire Cabinet in the emergency, and met a hearty support from them. He says that he is not aware of a single dollar of the public funds intrusted to unofficial persons having been either lost or wasted, and he entirely exonerates Mr. Cameron from the censure implied in the House resolution of the 30th ult. If censure be due, Mr. Lincoln thinks that he himself, and all the heads of the departments should share it with the late Secretary of War.

BATTLE ON THE CHICKAHOMINY.

The following dispatch was received at the War Department on 1st from Field of Battle, June 1—12 M.

We have had a desperate battle, in which the corps of Generals Sumner, Heintzleman, and Keyes have been engaged against greatly superior numbers.

Yesterday at one o'clock the enemy, taking advantage of a terrible storm which had flooded the valley of the Chickahominy, attacked our troops on the right flank.

General Casey's division, which was in the first line, gave way unaccountably and disunitedly. This caused a temporary confusion, during which the guns and baggage were lost; but Generals Heintzleman and Kearney most gallantly brought up their troops, which checked the enemy.

At the same time, however, we succeeded, by great exertion, in bringing across Generals Sedgwick and Richardson's divisions, who drove back the enemy at the point of the bayonet, covering the ground with his dead.

This morning the enemy attempted to renew the conflict, but was every where repulsed.

We have taken many prisoners, among whom is General Pettigrew and Colonel Long.

Our loss is heavy, but that of the enemy must be enormous.

With the exception of General Casey's division, the men behaved splendidly.

Several fine bayonet charges have been made. The Second Excelsior regiment made two to-day.

George B. M'Clellan,
Major-General Commanding.

THE BATTLE AT HANOVER COURT HOUSE.

The official report of the battle at Hanover Court House was received at the War Department from General M'Clellan on 28th, from which it appears that it was a pretty serious affair, resulting in a complete rout of the enemy. The rebel loss in killed and wounded is set down at one thousand, and our loss at three hundred and seventy-nine killed, wounded, and missing, of whom fifty-three were killed. One hundred of the enemy's dead were buried on the field by our men. Five hundred were taken prisoners, and more were coming in. The rebels in this action were mostly from Georgia and North Carolina.

THE EVACUATION OF CORINTH.

The evacuation of Corinth by the rebel army under General Beauregard was announced officially by General Halleck, in a dispatch received at the War Department on 30th ult. The Thirty-ninth Ohio regiment, the advance-guard of General Pope's brigade, entered the city at a few minutes before seven o'clock on 30th, and planted the Union flag on the dome of the court-house. The enemy had abandoned the place previously. The last display of resistance they made was in responding to the batteries of General Pope on the morning of 29th.

WHAT GENERAL HALLECK SAYS.

Major-General Halleck telegraphs:

Head-quarters, Camp near Corinth, May 31, 1862.

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

The enemy's position and works in front of Corinth were exceedingly strong. He can not occupy a stronger position in his flight. This morning he destroyed an immense amount of public and private property, stores, provisions, wagons, tents, etc. For miles out of the town the roads are filled with arms, haversacks, etc., thrown away by his fleeing troops. A large number of prisoners and deserters have been captured, estimated by General Pope at 2000. General Beauregard evidently distrusts his army, or he would have defended so strong a position. His troops are generally much discouraged and demoralized. In all the engagements for the last few days their resistance has been slight.

H. W. Halleck,
Major-General Commanding.

A BRILLIANT AFFAIR IN THE SOUTHWEST.

The following was received at the War Department on 2d:

Halleck's Head-quarters,
Department of the Mississippi,
Camp near Corinth, June 1, 1862.

To Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

The following dispatch has been received from General Pope:

To H. W. Halleck, Major-General Commanding:

It gives me pleasure to report the brilliant success of the expedition sent out on the 28th of May, under Colonel Elliott. With the Second Iowa cavalry, after forced marches, day and night, through a very difficult country, and obstructed by the enemy, he finally succeeded in reaching the Mobile and Ohio Railroad at Booneville at two o'clock P.M. on the 30th.

He destroyed the track in many places, both south and north of the town, blew up one culvert, destroyed the switch and track, burned up the dépôt and locomotives, and a train of twenty-six cars loaded with supplies of every kind, destroyed ten thousand stand of small-arms, three pieces of artillery, and a great quantity of clothing and ammunition, and paroled two thousand prisoners, which he could not keep with his cavalry. The enemy had heard of his movements, and had a train of box cars and flat cars, with flying artillery and five thousand infantry, running up and down the road, to prevent him from reaching it. The whole road was lined with pickets for several days. Colonel Elliott's command subsisted on meat alone, such as they could find in the country.

For daring and dispatch this expedition has been distinguished in the highest degree, and entitles Colonel Elliott and his command to high distinction. Its results will be embarrassing to the enemy, and contribute greatly to their loss and demoralization. He reports the road full of small parties of the retreating enemy, scattering in all directions.

John Pope, Major-General.

RECAPTURE OF LITTLE ROCK.

Refugees who have just arrived at Cairo state that Little Rock, the capital of Arkansas, is in possession of our troops. The Governor and the members of the Legislature had fled to parts unknown.

FRONT ROYAL RETAKEN.

A brigade of our troops, with four companies of the Rhode Island cavalry in advance, under Major Nelson, entered Front Royal on Friday morning and drove the enemy, consisting of the Eighth Louisiana, four companies of the Twelfth Georgia, and a body of cavalry, out of the town, and now occupy it. Our advance was so rapid that the enemy was surprised, and was therefore not enabled to burn the bridges across the Shenandoah. A dispatch from General Banks himself states that the Fifth New York cavalry, Colonel De Forest commanding, entered Martinsburg on 30th, and passed several miles beyond, where they encountered the enemy's cavalry, captured several prisoners, a wagon, several muskets, ammunition, and an American flag. Thus it appears that a large portion of the ground lost by the recent attack of the rebels upon the reduced forces of General Banks has been recovered.

FREMONT IN THE FIELD.

The following dispatches are published:

Fremont's Head-quarters,
Near Strasburg, June 1, 1862.

General Frémont, with a strong column, left Franklin on Sunday, 25th ult., and by rapid forced marches has crossed the Shenandoah mountain ranges, marching nearly one hundred miles over difficult roads, with little means of transportation, and no supplies in the country.

This morning, five miles from Strasburg, he overtook General Jackson in full retreat with his whole force, on the road from Winchester to Strasburg.

Colonel Cluserut, commanding the advance brigade, came upon the enemy, strongly posted with artillery, which opened as soon as the head of his column approached.

General Frémont rapidly brought his main column up, and formed in line of battle.

General Jackson declined to fight, and, while holding Cluserut in check with a portion of his troops, withdrew his main forces and continued his retreat.

In the skirmish five of the Eighth Virginia and two of the Sixtieth Ohio regiments were wounded.

The enemy's loss is unknown. Twenty-five prisoners were taken by our cavalry.

Lieutenant-Colonel Downey, of the Third regiment Potomac Home Brigade, in a skirmish on Thursday morning, drove a large party of Ashby's cavalry through Wardensville, killing two and wounding three.

General Fremont's Head-quarters,
Strasburg, June 2, 1862.

General Frémont's advance brigade, under Colonel Cluserut, occupied Strasburg last night without resistance.

Jackson is rapidly retreating before our forces.

A midnight reconnoissance three miles beyond Strasburg came upon a rope barricade and ambush of Jackson's rear-guard, and retired successfully with the loss of only three wounded.

Colonel Figgelmencil, of General Frémont's staff, with only fifteen men, brilliantly charged and put to flight a body of cavalry, commanded by Ashby in person.

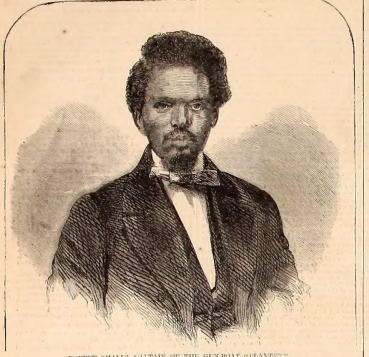
GENERAL HUNTER APPROACHING CHARLESTON.

The Charleston papers of the 21st inst. state that four of our vessels had shelled three Islands in the harbor on the day previous—namely, Coles, Kiawah, and Goat Islands—and that the rebels had retired after burning their quarters. Coles Island is situated at a distance of between twelve and fifteen miles from the city of Charleston.

GENERAL BUTLER AT NEW ORLEANS.

General Butler has suppressed the New Orleans Delta and the Bee for advocating the destruction of produce. He has arrested several British subjects for giving aid to the rebels. He has seized a large quantity of specie belonging to the rebels from the office of the Consul for the Netherlands; has stopped the circulation of "Confederate" paper money, and has distributed among the suffering poor the provisions intended for the support of the rebel soldiers. And more: he has taken the wife of General Beauregard—who was found to be in New Orleans—under his care and protection, just as General M'Clellan has done the wife of the rebel General Lee, in the neighborhood of Richmond.

GUERRILLAS IN TENNESSEE.



Trouble is breaking out in Western Tennessee, and a considerable force of rebels is said to be at Trenton, ready to march on Union City and Hickman. Union men from Weakley and Obion counties were flocking to Hickman for protection. Four or five hundred rebel cavalry are stationed near the mouth of Obion River, awaiting the draining of the swamp in that region to plant a battery to prevent the passage of our transports on the Mississippi.

PRIZES TAKEN BY OUR CRUISERS.

The prize steamer Patras, recently captured while attempting to run into Charleston harbor, has arrived here. The vessel and her cargo are valued at $300,000. In addition to this the blockading squadron have already captured the following steamers: The Circassian (British), Bermuda (British), Swan, Labuan (British, since restored), Magnolia, Florida, Ella Warley, Stettin (British), Calhoun, Lewis, Wallace, Fox, and the rebel gun-boat Planter, run out of Charleston by loyal contrabands. The aggregate value of these vessels is over $5,000,000.

PERSONAL.

Major-General Dix left Baltimore by steamer on 31st for Fortress Monroe to relieve General Wool from his command at that post. General Wool, it is said, will take the place of General Dix at Baltimore.

ROBERT SMALLS, CAPTAIN OF THE GUN-BOAT "PLANTER."

THE GUN-BOAT "PLANTER," RUN OUT OF CHARLESTON, S. C., BY ROBERT SMALLS, MAY, 1862.

THE STEAMER "PLANTER" AND HER CAPTOR.

We publish herewith an engraving of the steamer Planter, lately run out of Charleston by her negro crew, and a portrait of her captain, ROBERT SMALLS—both from photographs sent us by our correspondent at Hilton Head. The following, from the Herald correspondence, will explain the transaction:

One of the most daring and heroic adventures since the war commenced was undertaken and successfully accomplished by 8 party of negroes in Charleston on Monday night last. Nine colored men, comprising the pilot, engineers, and crew of the rebel gun-boat Planter, took the vessel under their exclusive control, and, passing Sumter and forts in Charleston harbor, hoisted a white flag, run out to the blockading squadron, and thence to Port Royal, via St. Helena Sound and Broad River, reaching the flagship Wabash shortly after ten o'clock last evening.

The following are the names of the black men who performed this gallant and perilous service: Robert Smalls, pilot; John Smalls and Alfred Grady, engineers; Abram Jackson, Gabriel Turner, William Morrison, Samuel Chisholm, Jack Wilson, and David Jones. They brought with them the wife and three children of the pilot, and the wife, child, and sister of the first engineer, John Smalls. The balance of the party were without families.

The Planter is a high-pressure, side-wheel steamer, one hundred and forty feet in length, and about fifty feet beam, and draws about five feet of water. She was built in Charleston, was formerly used as a cotton-boat, and is capable of carrying about 1400 bales. On the organization of the Confederate navy she was transformed into a gun-boat, and was the most valuable war vessel the Confederates had at Charleston. Her armament consisted of one 32-pound rifle gun forward, and a 24-pound howitzer aft. Besides, she had on board when she came into the harbor one seven-inch rifled gun, one eight-inch Columbiad, one eight-inch howitzer, one long 32-pound gun, and two hundred rounds of ammunition, which had been consigned to Fort Ripley, and which she would have been delivered at that destination on Tuesday had not the designs of the rebel authorities been frustrated. She was commanded by Captain Relyy, of the Confederate navy—all the other employees of the vessel, excepting the first and second mates, being persons of color.

Robert Smalls, with whom I had a brief interview at General Benham's head-quarters this morning, is an intelligent negro, born in Charleston, and employed for many years as a pilot in and about that harbor. He entered upon his duties on board the Planter some six weeks since, and, as he told me, adopted the idea of running the vessel to sea from a plan which one of his companions perpetrated. He immediately cautioned the crew against alluding to the matter in any way on board the boat, but asked them, if they wanted to talk it up in other surroundings, to meet at his house, where they would devise and determine upon a plan to place themselves under the protection of the Stars and Stripes instead of the Stars and Bars. Various plans were proposed, but finally the whole management of the escape was left to the discretion and sagacity of Robert, his companions promising to obey him implicitly. Accordingly, one night last week, when for three days he had kept the provisions of the party secreted in the hold, awaiting an opportunity to slip away. At length, on Monday evening, the white officers of the vessel went on shore to spend the night, intending to start on the following morning for Fort Ripley, and to be absent from the city for some days. The females of the contrabands were notified and came stealthily on board. At about three o'clock the free were all under the hatches, and the vessel steamed quietly away down the harbor. The tide was against her, and Fort Sumter was not reached till broad daylight. However, the boat passed directly under its walls, giving the usual signal—two long puffs and a jerk at the whistle-cord—as she passed the sentinel.

Once out of range of the rebel guns the white flag was raised, and the Planter steamed directly for the blockading steamer Augusta. Captain Parrott, of the latter vessel, as you may imagine, received them cordially, hoisted their tropet, placed Acting-Master Watson, of his ship, in charge of the Planter, and sent the Confederate gun-boat and crew forward to Commodore Dupont. The former will be kept at Hilton Head, and the latter, with their families will make suitable provision for them. The crew will be taken care of by Commodore Dupont.

The Planter is just such a vessel as is needed to navigate the shallow waters between Hilton Head and the adjacent islands, and will prove almost invaluable to the Government. It is proposed, I hear, by the Commodore, to recommend an appropriation of $20,000 as a reward to the plucky Africans who have distinguished themselves by this gallant exercise—$2000 to be given to the pilot, and the remainder to be divided among his companions.

Our correspondent sends us a drawing of an infernal machine, drawn by one of the negro hands of the Planter named Morrison. This chattel, Morrison, gives the following account of himself:

"I belonged to Emile Pelschigon; by trade a tinsmith and plumber. He lived all his life in Charleston; was colonel of the first regiment of the Fourth Brigade State militia in Mexico, and, previous to the 20th of last month (1862), a wife and two children in Montgomery, Alabama, from whom he expects to see when the war is over. I can read him how he learned to read and write. Answer: 'I stole it in the night, Sir.'"

OUR BLACK FRIENDS DOWN SOUTH.

We give herewith a couple of pictures of the only allies we have thus far met among the Southerners. Their skin appears, from our artist's sketches, to be black; but their hearts are not nearly as black as those of the white men who dug up the skeletons of our dead at Manassas, and made ornaments of their bones for their sweet-hearts at home. One of our pictures represents a scene on Hilton Head Island, where we have at present several thousand negroes. General Hunter has wisely converted the adult males into soldiers, for the purpose of garrisoning the Southern forts in the unhealthy season at the South; the females are used as washer-women; the children are being educated, so as to form a useful nucleus hereafter for a free black people at the South. Our picture shows the feeding of these negro pickaninnies. Poor little creatures! they are realizing for the first time that they are human beings, and not of the same class in animated nature as dogs and hogs.

Our other picture illustrates a scene which we are told is very common in the States through which our armies have penetrated. The negro woman, hearing of the army's approach, runs out to meet it, and cries: "Oh! I so so glad you is come. Massa says he wish you was in de bottom ob de sea; but you ain't in de bottom ob de sea, you is h'yar, and oh! I so so glad to see yer."

These poor creatures realize plainly enough that we are their friends, and they have never let slip an opportunity of showing us that their friendship is worth having.

THE "HARTFORD" IN THE MISSISSIPPI.

On page 369 we present a picture of the flag-ship Hartford in the Mississippi, running the gauntlet of Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and attacked simultaneously by a fire-raft and a ram—the Manassas. She was set on fire and narrowly escaped destruction. The following account of the transaction will explain it:

In the midst of this awful scene down came a tremendous fire-raft, and the Ram shoved her under our port quarter. The flames caught our rigging and side, and for a moment it seemed we must fall a prey to the ravages of fire. A fire was also burning on the berth-deck. The fire hose was on hand, and we soon subdued the flames, and gave the Ram a dose of rifle shell. She, however, came up for us again, but some other vessel tackled her and she hauled off. During this stage of affairs we grounded, and our fate seemed sealed; but our men worked like bravels, and the engineers soon got the ship astern and afloat. It defies the powers of my brain to describe the scene at this time. The river and its banks were one sheet of flame, and the messengers of death were moving with lightning swiftness in all directions. Steadily we plied shell and grape, interspersed with shrapnel. Jehvidon began to quake; her boats were fast being riddled by well-directed broadsides, and they who were able made for the shore to run them on, so that they could save their lives. Some were on fire and others were sinking. Our boys were cheering with a hearty good-will; and well they might, for we had almost won the day, and we were nearly past the forts. Our ship had been on fire three times, and she was riddled from stem to stern. The cabin was completely gutted, the starboard steerage all torn up, and the armory all knocked into "pi." My clothing was strewn about decks, and I was obliged to pick it up piece by piece. The manuscript of the bombardment came near destruction by a rifle shell, which tore up my room and killed one man.

After being under a terrific fire for one hour and twenty minutes we were past the forts, badly cut up; a shot hole through mainmast, two in stern, and several through up. I frankly confess I am unable to describe the scene. Words are powerless to convey a description of it. Language fails. Whether it was smoke, shot, and bring fired at, dust and shell whistling like locomotive demons around, above, before, and in the rear of you; flames from fireworks encircling you, splinters flying in all directions, and shells bursting overhead! Can you imagine this scene? If you can, it is more than I can describe as I would wish to.

BAKER.

Thou lion-fronted, royal man!
Thou of the swerveless lightning glance,
Whose thunderous eloquence outran,
O'erlapped, the minds it did entrance;
Oh man! made regal by thy might
The many-chorded soul to smite!

The lowly path was not for thee.
Thy mental stature towered above
The wondering eyes upraised to see
The man whose tone and glance could move
A people's heart to love or hate;
Whose touch could guide it like a fate.

The glory of his life was set
Unto a measure high and grand;
The lofty anthem lingers yet
In haunting echoes through the land;
And, greeted with a triumph tone,
He stood, a conqueror—alone!

He fell—and, lo! a mighty wail,
A cry, sublime in grief and strength,
Proclaimed the giant lying pale.
His mighty power undone at length;
And for that wondrous man and strong
Went up a nation's funeral song!

For him a high applauding tone
Shall linger in the halls of Time.
Even as he stood—he fell—alone
A warrior in a strife sublime.
A nation raised his burial stone—
He will not sleep unsung, unknown.

OUR TROOPS MARCHING DOWN INTO THE TRENCHES BEFORE RICHMOND.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.]

MY CONTRIBUTION.

I HAD actually subscribed five hundred dollars! Not in all the history of my grivings was there a parallel to this. Five hundred dollars! I looked at the filled-up check, after cutting it free from its blank companion with fond, reluctant eyes ere passing it to my hands; yet was I not the generous fog giver that his invitation implied. My heart was in the cause of national honour and national safety; and in sacrificing something for my country I was but discharging a patriotic duty. This was my contribution to a fund our citizens were raising for hospital and sanitary needs. If double the sum had been required of me, double would have been given.

"So much for my country!" I said in my thought, with a feeling of self-approval. I felt that I was a better and truer man for the act. "If every one would do as well according to circumstances." There came a slight chill to my enthusiasm, consequent on the thought that I was doing so much more, according to my ability, than other people. I had seen the subscription paper. It bore the record of no larger contribution than mine. Two citizens only had put down their names for five hundred dollars.

"I have given equally," I said within myself, "Mr. Harland should have made his contribution a thousand dollars instead of five hundred; and Grant should at least have come in for a thousand."

Five, or dollar, he is quite as well off as I am. Then, as for Tompkins, I can't see how he hit the courage to write down only fifty. It was the act of a dozen poorer men who gave each their hundred. But we have a set of patriots to do this, and know where to place them. Love of country is a fine thing to talk about, but when sacrifice is asked, how rarely do we find soul and flesh equal to it!

It is the most natural thing in the world to let speech betray our thoughts. As I moved about among friends and acquaintances, I was conscious here and a sentence there revealed the secret of my self-approval; and I could see in the diminished attention of what was going on in my mind—how I considered my contribution to the war fund, taking mean into account, as the largest given by any man in the town.

For me, five hundred dollars was a large sum to give away. Tens, twenties, and an occasional fifty, under the pressure of public calls for church or charitable needs, had passed out from my hands in fully-loosened purse-strings, that drew back again with increasing tightness as the sum diminished; but giving after this liberal and exhausting style was altogether a new experience. I felt something poorer on account thereof, and more conscious of economies. When I paid a thousand dollars for a pair of horses impressible like this one, and which I got even when one of them got injured by a fall, and I parted with him for one hundred and fifty dollars. Here was a loss of four hundred and fifty dollars; but in face of it nothing so like a sense of poverty touched me as in face of my contribution to the hospital and sanitary fund. I was not fool poorer for the three hundred dollars expended in pregnancy and sickness of my wife, though the money paid therefor was a sunk investment, every dollar; nor for the six or seven hundred paid for summer-baths, gentlemanly clothes, and fancy work about my grounds and dwelling. All this, long for my own gratification, I would admit. The expense was calculated, and taken as a thing of course. But this five-hundred-dollar gift to our country in the time of pressing need, freely as it was bestowed, left with me a sense of exhaustion, as though I weakened by an effort greater than my strength.

No wonder, such being the case, that I talked rather much on this one subject of my gift. Others, speaking of the war, and the necessity of supporting the Government to the full extent of our means, I referred, in saying "our part," to the various contributions in men and money which the people in our particular locality had made, and especially to the late subscription, which footed up three thousand dollars. Three thousand dollars, of which I had given a sixth part. I could not help this remembrance.

"Yes, and nobly," he answered, with a glow of enthusiasm not often seen blooming his quiet face. "Our people have done nobly, not keeping back their most precious things."

"Three thousand dollars is a liberal sum," I said.

"Yes." His voice dropped the latter.

"And of that sum two men gave a third part." It passed for utterance, and I was not required to let it forth.

Mr. Preston did not answer. "And you were one of them?" No; but said, in a voice that still fell lower and lower, until it expressed a sentiment of reverence, "There is one to whom much will be given more than these two men a hundred-fold. But the gift is not down on any subscription paper."

More precious than silver and gold! Yes, there are things more precious than silver and gold; and I understood Mr. Preston to refer to human life and human love. Shame touched me, and I stood silent and rebuked.

"Come," he said; "walk with me into the next street, only a little way. It is well that we should applaud those questions of sacrifice and patriotism all their leanings. The danger is, perhaps, that we magnify our own burdens and our own loyalty, and in doing so fail to award the honor that is due to others."

I did not answer, but in silence went with Mr. Preston into the next street. It was one in which the poor dwelt. Small houses, a few neat, and with tasteful shrubbery about the doors, but most of them miserably neglected and forlorn, stood on each side for a distance of three or four squares. My visits to this part of the town were of rare occurrence. It was not pleasant to gaze upon, and so to be avoided. All looked poor and mean now as my eyes ranged along the street, and I questioned with myself as to whether I was going, and to what end.

"The widow with three children," he said, "is poorer than those who, of their abundance, poured gold and silver into the treasury." My conscience made the silence with these words as we paused at the door of a small one story and a half cottage, around which every thing was clean and in order, but plain and poor. His knock was not loud, but low and respectful. I did not answer to the name given me on entering, but had some expectancy. A child of ten years opened the door, and looked up into our faces curiously. I saw that she recognized Mr. Preston, but no smile lit up her young face.

"How is your mother to-day?" was asked.

"Not very well. Won't you walk in?"

"Yes, thank you, my dear," and we stepped to inquire about your mother. Is she able to sit up?"

Yes, Sir. She sat up 'most all day yesterday, and says she feels stronger. And she's up again to-day. Won't you come in? Maybe she'd like to see you."

"Not this morning; I'll call round again. Say that Mr. Preston called. I'm glad she's better. Good-by!"

"Good-by, Sir!" I felt the low, almost choking flutter of the child's voice away down in my heart; my eyes were dim as I turned away. What did it mean?

"She has given most of all," said my companion as we walked away.

"What has she given?"

"Her husband."

"He is in the army?"

"He is dead."

"What! Dead!"

"Killed in battle."

"Dead still, in battle?"

"Yes. Three weeks ago the news came. He rests with the brave at Fort Donelson."

"Who and what was he?" I asked, rallying myself, for I felt an overpowering sense of weakness.

"A sober, industrious mechanic; a good husband and a good father. I saw his wife on the day after his name with the regiment that went from here six months ago. The parting had tried her severely; but she was brave with it all, and full of a noble heroism. 'I have given my husband,' said will do his duty,' she said to me: 'and the country must help me to keep my little ones.' I came to him weekly and in tears, as some wives did to their husbands, and held him back when his heart was impatient to go. But I left her with a smile. Men die at home of sickness as well as in battle. I trust in God." Her eyes were full of tears as she spoke, and her voice betrayed the fear and suffering that were in her heart. Ah, Sir, neither you nor I will ever fully comprehend the heroism of the wife endured in parting from a good husband, on whose strong arm she had leaned for many years—the wife and the children.

We walked on again, silent for some moments. He was sad, and I was humbled and perplexed.

"I say half-extorted, because there was really more of the spirit of doing to be seen of men than genuine patriotism in the act. I felt the unfairness of distribution of this poor woman! I had signed a check for five hundred dollars, and with it the full consciousness of the draft that check followed. I did not feel my comforts diminishing; I did not relinquish a single pleasure; I did not even make sacrifice except love of money. But she gave her husband! Ah, Sir, I understood you well. He was the support of herself and her children, had said, when his country called, Go!' And the sacrifice had been complete!

"The blow must have been terrible," I said. "Four weeks ago! That is a long time."

"She staggered and fell," was replied. "For a week the struggle between life and death was almost evenly balanced. Then the reaction came, and the poor crushed heart began to gather up its rent fibres, and to string its quivering nerves for new efforts and new pains. She has a little farm on which she had leased for so many years was broken, and neighbors and friends helped her. Then she faltered and staggered with uncertain steps at first! For hours she would sit and weep. But slowly strength came, and with it a consideration for the child's words, 'She sat up most all day yesterday, and sewed part of the time.' Her needle-work has been laid upon her, and she must walk henceforth with stooping shoulders and weary feet. Her own hands must earn the food with which her children are to be fed, and the garments with which they are to be clothed. Her toil and pain must be more than twice doubled; and with them are the widow's loneliness and the widow's sorrow. What are they worshipped with gold and silver to this? Ah, Sir, there is no room for complaint or boasting. With us the sacrifice is a sore and a bitter one. It is hardest with those who are least thought of, and who get least of public sympathy."

"We must do something for that woman," said I. "Her case touches me deeply."

"Your possessions and mine would look more than half false values when the calamity as the dismemberment of our country to fall," was answered. "Our enemies are in arms against us, and we must oppose man with man in fierce battle. While they fight and die we are at home, and in their blood and suffering we find safety. In there hours is there justice, is there humanity in forgetting this poor widow, and leaving the widows and orphans of our dead soldiers to bear unaided their burdens of want and sorrow? I think not. Yes, assuredly we must do something for her. She has given a brave her all, and if she have no more henceforth in our abundance then are we not guiltless in the sight of Heaven."

How small seemed all the contributions I had made, and of which I was so self-gratulant! My cheeks were hot with shame. Not since have I referred to that last subscription in any conversation, nor has a word about the coming burden of taxes escaped my lips. I would blush at complaint now. Burdens! They who seem to have the largest share feel their pressure lightest. It is the poor, the humble, the too often despised and neglected who bear the heavy troubles will fall. Let us see to it then we not in forgetfulness of what we owe them. That we do not let widows and orphans cast in all their living as the price of our patriotism.

A SEERESS AT FAULT.

"WILL you come out with me to-night?" said Dr. Clay. "There is a seeress come to Chasingles. I am going to have a look at her."

Dr. Clay was a college friend of mine, then about five-and-twenty. I was "on leave" from my professional avocations in London, and had gone down to spend a few days at Chasingles, where he had recently begun to practise, hoping to forget, if possible, the existence of the printer's devil. It was my second night there, and a wet one: I had not much myself to do—a cigar and a book, which I was not going to review, and therefore could enjoy for its unadulterated merits, inasmuch as to a reviewer even a good book is a burden, and the better the book, not unfrequently, the heavier the burden. From such unmerited misery I was loth to be roused even by Dr. Clay, though he was a delightful companion, as young physicians with private ability usually are. So I answered indignantly:

"Nonsense. You do not mean to say that you intend to get wet through and spend half-a-crown in order to see a humbugging female baby played. Stay here, and I will show you half a dozen, quite as good, with a pack of cards."

"I don't believe in Dr. Clay" (I was fain to interest in conjuring tricks till I know how they are done. Now, though I grant you that some of these clairvoyant, mesmeristic, table-turners, and modern magicians of all kinds are the veriest quacks alive, and their jugglery is as transparent as the liquefaction of St. Januarius's blood, I have seen things shown and done by my friend, which, if you can explain them, you may make a reputation and a fortune. I have seen excision of the tissues performed on a living subject without remaining perfectly unconscious the while. Not only did she not scream or speak, but the face was in no way altered. I have seen more than one case of life preserved by a mysterious warning given in the form of waking to person or to a vivacious notion of impending danger, and I once was witness to a most extraordinary case of clairvoyance (so called), where the subject was unconscious on my mind, from the perfect impossibility of any trick of collusion—but I digress. I will tell you what I suspected who watched the dreamer's face. And the most extraordinary part of the matter is," he added, "that, reflectively, I have since seen the face from beginning to end."

"That," said I, "appears to me the most natural and intelligible result. It will be the same to-night. Do stay quietly by the fire."

"No, I really must go," answered Clay, quietly. "I can not miss even a chance of getting at some fact which may help to confirm or destroy the watery belief I have formed on the subject of clairvoyance. So I am going to get wet, and spend three shillings, and probably come back—"

So I put down my book and went out, when the rain speedily deprived me of my cigar. We got drenched, and the Seeress proved to be a quack as I in my impatience had predicted. Dr. Clay had two questions answered, one by a yes or no only, and one to be specially ascertained, viz., "What is my friend's age?" and "What letters have come for me since I left London?" Both were answered glibly, and both wrong. The Seeress talked visions of a letter from a friend named Dr. Clay that two letters had come for him—both from ladies—whereas one or two of the little audience imagined, for Dr. Clay is a general favorite, but not exactly a "lady's man," still less a lady's doctor. He got up and walked out, and I with him.

"Well?" I said.

"This is the third mere imposture I have seen to-night," answered Dr. Clay, quietly. "I will go further yet ten such than miss one opportunity of witnessing a case of real clairvoyance."

In three days Dr. Clay's friend arrived, skeptically, "for my credulity goes no further than a firm belief in a handful of sovereigns," unwashed face, and incessant craving for 'copy.'"

When you have heard my first experience on the subject, Mr. Vane," he said, "I think you will see that question in a somewhat different tone. Will you come round to my lodgings in the city, and any messages for me? and then we will smoke a pipe at your rooms, and you shall hear the history."

There was no time for the latter, for the old farmer, queerly spabbed and oddly expressed; but we fretted that we think it necessary to go eight miles into the country that night to attend to an attack of gout, to we adjourned to my rooms, where, amidst exhalations of smoke, I heard the following tale:

It was (said the Doctor) about four years ago. I had just passed my first examination, and one or two answers to which questions fortunate enough to attract the attention of old Vane, among whose other peculiarities is a strong penchant towards the investigation of mysteries. He took some notice of me, and I ventured to ask him some questions about a clairvoyant who had created a good deal of considerable curiosity. She was a young and very pretty girl; the mesmerist who had discovered her faculty was a gentleman—which few of them are—a man of means, highly considered in his profession, and a naturalist. Vane answered me, and promised me an introduction to her. I asked him what his experience of her art had been—whether it was a reality or a sham, and whether it seemed capable of being applied to any practical use.

"It is no sham," he said. "The girl herself does not know that she possesses these powers. Arnold never allows clairvoyance to be named in her presence when she is awake. He himself is above suspicion. As to any practical result, it is very doubtful. Hitherto, Elizabeth has never told us any thing previously unknown. She answers correctly regarding things certainly unknown to her, and places she has never seen; but when the answer, except reluctantly and uncertainly, my questions concerning what I myself know also are knowledge. She has told me the exact place of every article in my study, and even the contents of my table drawers, though she never entered my house—nor did Arnold—and we were six hours away from it at the time. She broke down entirely in trying to tell us what was at that moment going on in the House of Commons, in the Times printing-office, and in the Minister Park, three easier to guess, and at least as easy to know, one would think. But you shall see her yourself."

A few days after this a friend of my brother Cleveland by name, returned from a tour he had taken for the benefit of his health in Elizabeth's company. We had not heard from Edward for some ten days or more, and it happened that I dined with the Clevelands that day. Then, hearing that Cleveland had returned unexpectedly, I sought him out, as I inquired where my brother was. He started, and seemed uncomfortable, and then answered:

"We did not agree very well: I was in a hurry, and he preferred to travel slowly; so he left me at the Lapichore, and I came home at once through France."

The answer and Cleveland's manner were a little peculiar. Why did Edward "leave" him, rather than he Edward, seeing that it was he who wished to travel fast? And why did he seem agitated or seeing me? But I was not observant enough at the time to be disturbed. Cleveland had behaved ill, and driven Edward away. I knew this, although I was now ashamed of himself. For he had the reputation of being quarrelsome in the extreme, and was considered by his friends to be peculiarly susceptible to an extraordinary degree. Edward, than whom he more kindly and generous man never lived, had always taken his part; had affirmed that Cleveland was a man of genius, and thoroughly good at heart, and had chosen him for his friend by surprise, as his companion, in the hope that travel, change of scene, and rest from anxiety and worry would bring him better health and spirits. Certainly the experiment had been a complete failure. Cleveland was not ill, but he was in a state between his habitual restlessness greater than ever; the unmistakable expression of nervous suffering as to health, and the gloom of a man in debt. My brother myself, never steady for an instant in their pace, had never meeting mine. His left hand, constantly trembling, was occupied with a paperknife; his right fumbled continually at the book while talking to me, and he was flushed. I was touched by his evident illness, and turned from a subject which I perceived to be painful. I talked about the college examinations; told him of my success; and finally of the clairvoyance, for who of us of that evening I had forgotten the account of admission.

"Let me go with you," he said, sharply and suddenly.

"With pleasure," said I. "Only we have little time to lose. I must be back in London at 11, as I am twenty minutes after six, and you have your table to make."

He, though dressed with faultless neatness when he appeared out of doors, Cleveland always spent his days in his dressing-gown and slippers, as he had feet thrust into a pair of worked slippers, his arms and throat bare, his short curled hair combed but not brushed, his face, and he was conscious of it, a sort of sack of red flannel, falling in the knees, and with the pockets full of the dirty clay of his muscular arms. It certainly seemed as if some time would be needed to transform this strange figure into a man of fashion. But it was done in five minutes. He turned the key in the table-drawer in which he had been writing, went into his bedroom, and returned in an incredibly short time in plain black evening-dress, his red hands nervously drawing on a pair of white kid gloves. I, who never wear a "tail-coat" if can help it, was almost ashamed of my attire. He helped it, was almost ashamed of my attire. He helped me, started, however, at the urn, he walking at a pace with which I could scarcely keep up. The afternoon had only been warm enough to call for rain into which we were ushered as a dark one.

"Bring a light, please," said Cleveland, abruptly, after we had entered the servants' hall. I remained in the entrance-hall till the light appeared, and then followed him into the parlour. "I hate darkness," he observed, impatiently. "I always think of death."

The door was opened; we were admitted to the operating-room, where we sat in semicircle, and received with the politeness peculiar to which the patient sat, already in a deep mesmeric sleep. Mr. Arnold stood behind her. She looked scarcely beautiful. A mass of hair, of a dull red, did not attractively fragile. I felt sure, as I saw her, that she was not healthy, and that she required the nervous mentor of her murder. He did not think, of course, that he was injuring her; I did, and I think that he was injuring her. Arnold appeared into the unrefined and uncomprehended state of the nervous system which is peculiar to the subjects of mesmerism, and which I can neither describe nor explain. Mr. Arnold gave permission to me to ask a question, and I requested to be told what was the cause of my having left Chasingles. I left it only remember the three last. After all the letters had been read, I requested to the suitability of the guests, Vane inquired:

"What is there on the table in my study to-day?"

The girl paused a moment—said:

"I have been there before.... Oh!" with a shudder of disgust; "it is a hand—a woman's hand—oh, horrible, horrible!"

Vane whispered across Cleveland, who sat between us:

"She never was there; but she described it all perfectly last time I saw her. To-day I brought a specimen, preserved in spirits, of frightful disease of the hand. She would see, if she saw it, know it for a woman's."

Cleveland's turn was next. He was very pale, and his ungloved right hand was clasped on his heart. The glove had fallen to the ground, and he was absently twisting it with the tasteless motion of his foot.

"How shall I die?" was his question, in a deep, tremulous, husky tone that made us all start with sudden horror.

His effort on the seeress was still more marked. She sprang into a sitting posture, and trembled from head to foot, seeming unable to speak. The question was repeated.

"I—don't—know," she slowly replied: then suddenly, "Oh no, no, no!" the last word rising to a shriek.

Cleveland's face was ghastly beyond description or conception. There was a pause: Mr. Arnold exerted himself to calm the girl, and presently called on me for a final question.

"What has become of my brother?"

A moment's hesitating silence—a strange look of surprise, information, horror unspeakable, succeeding one another on her pale, delicate face; and then a fearful, unearthly scream, which froze the very blood in our veins. I never knew before what "spiritual terror" meant. Assuredly I would rather meet any bodily danger than hear that scream and see that face again. Even Arnold was appalled, or I think he would have interposed before the answer came in words: at first low, tremulous, uncertain; then clear, rapid, agitated, while the girl's whole frame quivered with terrible excitement.

"I see—a mountain of snow, a precipice on one side, a narrow road winding along the edge. Down, down—at the bottom of that precipice, in a dry bed of a stream—there is a body covered with blood—oh, horrible! I can not bear to look. It has been thrown there—thrown down from the road. Wait a moment and I will tell you how. There are two men—they come out of a house, and they are walking up the snow-mountain, along the road, close to the edge of the precipice. One of them turns—he will not go on—he will go back. The other laughs at him: he speaks—I do not hear what they say—he speaks kindly to him. But the pale man is angry; he strikes his friend—oh, God! he has flung him over the precipice; he has murdered him!"

I was horror-struck; I could not rouse myself to think or speak. The girl's look and tone carried conviction, as strong as if the scene she described in these broken sentences had been actually passing before her eyes. Vane's voice it was I heard next:

"What is the murderer like?"

"He is tall, strong, pale—" She sprang suddenly from her seat. "He is HERE!" she screamed, and, laying her hand on Cleveland's shoulder, she exclaimed, with a shriek which rang through the room, "THOU ART THE MAN!"

I need not attempt to portray the scene that followed. Indeed, I could scarcely see or hear. I only knew that Cleveland had sprung from his seat, dashed aside the arms that were stretched out to seize him, and was gone. The girl had fallen back upon her couch in violent convulsions; and the mesmerist, himself trembling in every limb, was trying to awaken her from the unnatural sleep which had been visited with so fearful a vision.

Vane got me out of the room, I do not recollect how; and when I became fully conscious of what was passing we were on our way to Cleveland's lodgings. Arrived there, Vane inquired if he was in, and was answered, "Yes, Sir; he is just gone up stairs. We were quite frightened about him, he looked so ill." We ran up to the sitting-room, which was on the first floor. The table-drawer was open: in it my eye caught sight of some papers tied in a bundle and directed in Cleveland's bold but irregular hand to me. Beside these was the silver-mounted ivory butt of a small pistol. Cleveland's hat and gloves lay on the table; the owner was not there. My hand was on the latch of the bedroom door, and I had just become aware that it was locked, when the report of a pistol rang in my ear. I felt as if it had been fired close to my head. In another moment Vane sprang at the door, burst it open with his weight, and we entered the bedroom.

Cleveland lay on the bed, his white shirt-front soaked with blood. The still smoking pistol—fellow to that left in the drawer—had fallen from his right hand, which hung by his side. Vane tore open his dress, and we saw a small hole, just above the heart, in the scorched vest and shirt, from which the blood had sprung over the clothes. Life was already extinct, of course.

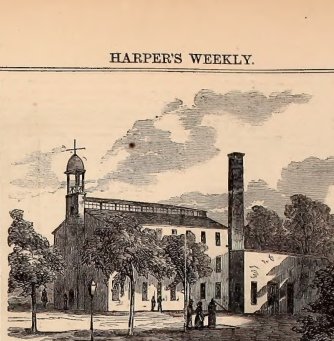
The papers directed to me were produced at the inquest. They contained an account, incoherent but circumstantial, of the murder of my unhappy brother, committed, said the writer, in a moment of passion, utterly unpremeditated, and bitterly repented. The paper closed with some strange and incomprehensible passages, expressive of gratitude and affection for the murdered man. Vane's evidence induced the jury to return a verdict of insanity, and Cleveland's remains received Christian burial.

It was not till the third night after his death that I was able to sleep. Then my slumber was deep and profound; and it was with difficulty that my landlady roused me at nine the next morning to receive "a large foreign letter, which she thought might—might be of consequence." I jumped out of bed mechanically, and received it at the door.

Good Heaven! it was Edward's handwriting—bore, too, a post-mark only five days old. It must have been posted after his death by some one who had taken possession of his papers. I tore it open. More astonishing still, it bore date the same day on which it was posted. A passage in which Cleveland's name occurred at once attracted my eye. It ran as follows:

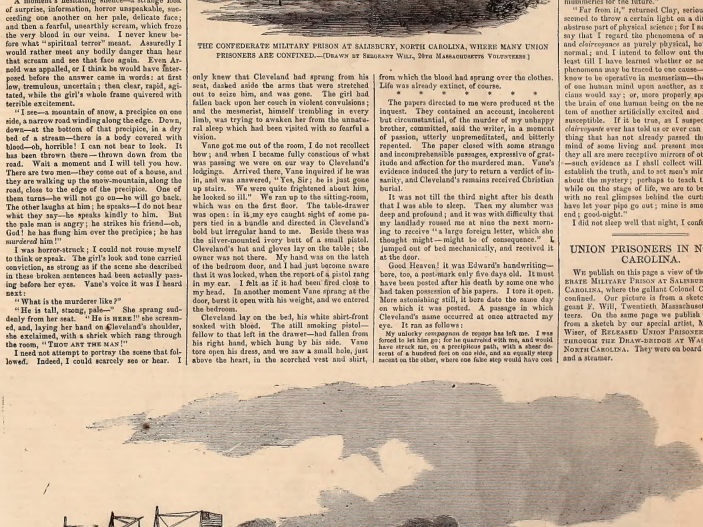
"My unlucky companion de voyage has left me. I was forced to let him go; for he quarreled with me, and would have struck me, on a precipitous path, with a sheer descent of a hundred feet on one side, and an equally steep ascent on the other, where one false step would have cost one or both of us our lives. He had been moody and restless all morning, and finally, as we reached the most dangerous part of the road, stopped, refused to go any further, and declared that he must immediately return to England. I was surprised, and, when I noticed the expression of his eyes, a little alarmed. I tried, however, to laugh him out of his sudden fancy, but had no success: he grew angry, and, when I persisted, struck at me with his alpenstock. I warded the blow; and he instantly turned, and ran down the hill as if the furies pursued him. I waited till he was out of sight, and then continued my journey. I have left him all the food. But he had been so rapid in his movements; had paid the bill, and was gone an hour before I arrived, not to follow him, for no vehicle or horse was to be left in the place. If he gets safe back to England, my dear fellow, please to look after him; for—though you must keep it to yourself, or only hint it to Dr. Vane—I am firmly convinced that Cleveland is, if not will be, INSANE!

INSANE! here was the solution of the terrible mystery. Edward was safe and well; and the whole story of the murder was the creation of a diseased brain, of which all who heard it had been the dupes, and of which the deluded author was the wretched victim. The words of the clairvoyante, coinciding as it did with the story previously written out by the self-imagined murderer, was a mere reflection of his delusion, which hastened his end before Edward's return could dispel the horrible fancy. The event gave me such a shock to Arnold that he never ventured to practice the art again.



"And has it not had the same effect on you?" I inquired. "I should have thought it would have caused you to shrink from all such mysteries and mummeries for the future."

"Far from it," returned Clay, seriously. "It seemed to throw a certain light on a difficult and abstruse part of physical science; for I need hardly say that I regard the phenomena of mesmerism and clairvoyance as purely physical, however abnormal; and, if I intend to follow out the clew, at least till I have learned whether or no all these phenomena may be traced to one cause—which we know to be operative in mesmerism—the influence of one human mind upon another, as metaphysicians would say: or, more properly speaking, of the brain of one human being on the nervous system of another artificially excited and peculiarly susceptible. If it be true, as I suspect, that no clairvoyant ever has told us or ever can tell us any thing that has not already passed through the mind of some living and present mortal—that they all are mere receptive mirrors of other minds—such evidence as I shall collect will go far to establish the truth, and to set men's minds at rest about the mystery; perhaps to teach them that, while on the stage of life, we are to be indulged with no real glimpses behind the curtain. You have let your pipe go out; mine is smoked to an end; good-night."



I did not sleep well that night, I confess.

UNION PRISONERS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

We publish on this page a view of the CONFEDERATE MILITARY PRISON AT SALISBURY, NORTH CAROLINA, where the gallant Colonel Corcoran is confined. Our picture is from a sketch by Sergeant F. Will, Twentieth Massachusetts Volunteers. On the same page we publish a picture, from a sketch by our special artist, Mr. Angelo Wiser, of RELEASED UNION PRISONERS COMING THROUGH THE DRAW-BRIDGE AT WASHINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA. They were on board two scows and a steamer.

NEWS FROM THE WAR.

One of our most ingenious artists, Mr. Winslow Homer, has portrayed in the picture which we publish on pages 376 and 377 the thrilling effect of the News from the War. There is news that is exciting and triumphant: news of battles fought and won; of forts stormed in the teeth of rebel cannon; of brilliant charges with the bayonet, or fierce avalanches of cavalry; of daring reconnoissances and hair-breadth escapes: news which fires the heart and makes the eye glisten and the cheek redden with patriotic ardor. And there is news of defeat; of slaughter and massacre; of gallant Northern boys left to become the prey of Southern ghouls, who will convert their skulls into trophies, and whose daughters and wives will not blush to wear ornaments made of their bones; news which makes the cheek blanch, and nerves the brave man's heart to further encounters, and warns the wise man that the time for half-measures has passed. News of the war! We all live on it. Few of us but would prefer our newspaper in those times to our breakfast. To some it comes as the brilliant radiance of sunlight after a gloomy morning, announcing that one who is near and dear to us has fulfilled the hopes of his friends, and has won fame and promotion and a place in history. To many tender hearts news of the war, be it of victory or defeat, merely means the death or wounding of some dear soldier. How little they think, whose lovers or brothers are reported in the fatal list of killed and wounded, of the triumphs or the perils of the Union cause! Little she recks, whose face is buried in her handkerchief in an agony of anguish, of the utter discomfiture of the rebels! Her discomfiture is more complete and more abiding than theirs. And then there is the news of Union victories, conveyed through trumpet-tongued rumor, to gallant Unionists in prison in the South, to cheer their dreary days; to wounded men in hospital and in sorrow, whose pains seem less acute, and whose blood courses more freely as they realize that the cause in which they suffered has received new lustre; to soldiers in the camp, who hear, with half-suppressed jealousy, of glories they did not share, and who vow, as they listen to the news, that when their time comes, they too will make themselves heard of. The only thing which thrills every heart nowadays is the News of the War. Mr. Homer, we think, has done justice to his subject.

THE DESERTER.

"Come here a moment, please."

We had only a glimmer of light in the hospital, for the cots were nearly all empty. Most of our wounded had been sent home; but the moon was full, and poured its white stream of radiance right down on the face of the man who had spoken to me.

"What is it you want?" I asked.

"I don't like to be alone. I feel rather strangely."

"You are excited; what is the matter?"

The thin, keen features of the man wore an eager, restless expression; his black eyes shone fiercely.

"I'm a deserter, you know. This wound troubles me a little. You don't think I deserted from cupidity, do you?"

"Really I know nothing about it. You are not well to-night; I shall give you something quieting so that you may sleep."

"No, no, just stay here a moment. Don't leave me."

He looked so eager that I sat down on his cot, felt his pulse again, rearranged his bandages, and placed his pillow more comfortably.

"Your touch is gentle as a woman's," he said, gratefully, sighing as he spoke. I sat still a little while, then rose to order his medicine, but he grasped me by the hand and drew me down again by him.

"This moonlight reminds me of the night I came near losing my sword-arm. I was lieutenant in a Louisiana regiment. We had a pretty hard brush with your fellows, and I found myself face to face with the toughest subject you ever saw. Twice I thought myself gone: our cartridges were out, and with a great shout of 'Liberty and Union!' the Yankee came at me with his sabre, cutting a gash in my arm that laid me low. Fortunately they had to fly just then, or I should have been in the other world. When I came to my senses, I was all alone with just such a glare of moonlight in my eyes as shines to-night. I was very weak and consuming with thirst, and not especially thankful to my brave comrades for thus leaving me in the lurch. You must know that I joined the army without a spark of love for secession: not a jot of principle in the matter—purely from the love of adventure, and with my French blood tingling at the thought of 'la gloire.' I have had different teaching since; so you need not be hasty in thinking me very contemptible. Glory has been the dream of my life."

Pale, wasted as he was, the young lieutenant's face had a strange fascination in it. Now his eyes gleamed again, his proud mouth was tremulous with feeling that, of course, was yet incomprehensible to me. I tried to make him be silent; but so intense was his desire to speak that I found it best to listen calmly—best for more reasons than one: life was low in the chalice, perhaps my listening might sweeten its last few drops.

"Yes, glory has been a bright dream ever since I could listen to old stories of my ancestors in other lands, where our name was a proud one, a name I have tried to keep with honor. Well, I woke in the moonlight with a dim sense of concern for my generous friends who had left me to fate, and a very urgent desire to get water; so I managed to crawl through the woods, sometimes rising to my feet only to fall again, though I had tied my handkerchief round my arm to stop the bleeding. I recollected passing a farm-house before the fray, and as well as I could made my way for it. I was fortunate; though alarmed, the occupants were accustomed to danger and kindly took me in. For some time I was very ill: during my illness our regiment was ordered off; indeed the Federals had gained possession of that part of the country. No one molested me; for the family was a poor Union one, who had been robbed of nearly all their valuables, but who, notwithstanding our ill-treatment, did not make known my refuge. I need not tell you how kind they were, how patient and careful; there was only an elderly woman, a boy of fourteen, and a young woman in the family. From the time I first opened my eyes after the delirium of fever, until—no matter for time—but kindness and tenderest care from both, but principally the younger woman, greeted me. I can see her great, dark, sad eyes looking now at me. 'Dieu!' how beautiful, how tender, how full of love. Love, did I say? adoration! What a life was hers! Poor Nina, poor Nina! She was the daughter of one of the most influential, proudest merchants in New Orleans—her mother a quadroon slave. The father died one day of apoplexy without adjusting his 'property,' leaving Nina a slave. Too proud, too good, too beautiful. She fled, for her mother had already named her price—three thousand dollars. I gnash my teeth with rage at our cursed institution—she taught me what I was fighting to perpetuate. She, poor Nina, not even then safe from pursuers. I can not express to you how gentle and tender was her care of me. I can only tell you that it inspired the deepest love." The invalid raised himself on one arm, flashing darker, deeper than ever were his black eyes—a noble brow, white and thin to spirituality—the proud lips quivering again with pain and passion. Again I tried unavailingly to soothe him—he must have felt the strong tide of life ebbing, but it seemed only to nerve him on to speaking.

"I had left in New Orleans rare beauties, my own cousins—proud, elegant women; I have frittered time away over soulless creatures; I have believed myself in love with these moths, glittering, gaudy, vain beings; but never had I loved truly till I saw Nina. You do not know what it cost me to confess this even to myself. I, who had dreamed of glory all my life—I, who had proudest of blood in my veins—I to love a woman tainted with African lineage! I feel wild—the room swims—hush, you must listen! Nina's voice was rich with melody, but it became torture. Her gentle, healing touch distracted me, her light footfall, her winning womanliness and modesty all jarred. I was nearly mad, and because I loved her—loved her whose price was three thousand dollars!

"I can see the room where I lay day after day battling dire thoughts—wan and weak, weaker than now, for to-night I am strong. My wound would not heal, for my brain was on fire. So lying there on the nice white pillows, fanned or read to by that beautiful, sad, passionate woman, who, even in her nice sense of beauty and order, in her loving desire to please, in her longing to amuse or change the current of my unhappy thoughts, betrayed the same emotion which was galling me. She wreathed flowers dextrously; she cooked the most delicate birds for my fastidious appetite; she sang softly low-toned ballads, rich and sweet, in old French words. And I, cold, mute, passive, listened with ears intent to hear, eyes aching to drink in her loveliness; for she was lovely—yes, though worth only three thousand dollars!

"I will stop soon; you are kind to be patient. I was dreaming one night of past scenes—of my beautiful, fashionable cousins; but their faces became suddenly dark and vicious as imps; their voices taunting, mocking me with my love of glory, my hopes of fame; for it seemed as if Nina had told them of my love for her, and in their impishness it became a matter of rare sport to jeer and mock me with my sudden fall from greatness, from ancestral pride. I suppose I spoke aloud in my dreams, for as I woke a pale face, whose dark eyes were floating with tears, vanished like a vision before me. So I knew that Nina had heard all. The next day I was left all alone. Oh, how long it was! how wearily impatient I became for my kind nurse, my tender friend! The day wore away, and evening came. In the long, tranquil twilight I watched the stars as a sick man will, longing for Nina. She came at last, slowly, feebly, as if very tired, very weary and depressed. For the first time I drew her close to me, her unresisting head down on my bosom, and told her that I loved her better than life, better than fame, better than any human being in the wide, wide world. She was very still; only her soft breath on my cheek, only the beating of her heart close to mine told me that she heard. Again I spoke, more intensely, more impatiently, told her all my struggles; my whole heart poured itself out, and still she knelt at my side in silence.

"'Speak, Nina!' I said; 'only say one word.'

"'I would die for you—I would die; but I can not live and be yours,' was her only reply.

"'But, Nina, you must. Have I not given up all? am I not willing to resign a claim which the world acknowledges—good birth—?' I was going on when she passionately exclaimed,

"'I can not bear it—stop! I can not be beneath even you! I have no tame woman's heart; I have the fire of the South burning, leaping in my veins!' She rose quickly, standing beside me in her beautiful indignation, pride and love struggling together as they had done with me. Her words came wildly fast and almost incoherent. She spoke of her white father bitterly, witheringly; of her slave mother with unmixed contempt; of the world in disdain, almost cursing her Creator. She was in a passion of wild grief; of utter, unsubdued anguish. I tried to allay her sorrow, assuring her of my love. Gradually she calmed down; tears came to her relief. She caressed me as if I had been a little child she had unwittingly injured—all harshness, all reproach ceased to issue from her lips. It was like the hushing of a storm, the gentle rain after flashing electricity and gusts of furious wind.

"I recalled my childish lessons, long forgotten—of humility, of a Heavenly Father's love and mercy, spite of seeming disfavor.

"Poor Nina, how quietly she listened!

"It was late when she bade me good-night, but I thought her happier when we parted.

"I do not know how long I had slept when I was wakened by strange outcries, scuffling noises, remonstrance, rough replies, and, as I staggered weakly to the door, a sharp report. Two men rushed quickly past out of the house, leaving all silent within, excepting a low sound which I knew to be Nina's voice. I called, and presently the elder woman came, very much excited and alarmed, saying that the men were slave-catchers in search of Nina, whom, by their going so hastily away, she feared was injured. The boy came also quaking into my room, where they at last brought my poor Nina. She was indeed wounded, mortally—whether by her own hand I could scarcely determine, though I think it must have been in self-defense.

"She opened her beautiful eyes only once upon me, then closed them with the same tired, weary expression I had noticed in the evening. We watched her through the night, but human aid could not avail. She was gone before morning—to where she could not be sold for three thousand dollars!

"Dieu! do you wonder I deserted? Do you wonder I want to live to meet those wretches? Glory has been my dream—now vengeance has its place!"

"Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord," was my answer, as the deserter's grasp tightened. His pale face glowed suddenly, his proud lips quivered, a convulsive smile played over his fine features—the broad band of moonlight still shimmered over the little cot. The soldier had joined the ranks above.

MAY FLOWERS.

It had been the stupidest evening. A little singing, a little dancing, and a little talking. Singing! Fancy a great guy of a girl making mouths over that divine song of tender sorrow—"Den lieben langen Tag." Actually roaring it out in a hoarse, strident voice—those mournful, melancholy periods! It makes me shiver to think of it now.

And the dancing! Somebody thrumming on a piano the "Leduc Lancers," in a limping, hap-hazard kind of manner; and the choicest partner in the room a youth who performed remarkable bows, and said, "Yaas, chawming!"

That youth—I can see him now! He wore his hair parted in the middle, affected the English drawl, and knew the latest fashion before it was an hour old. You wouldn't be likely to have your heart

> "Whirled by the whirlings of the waltz,
> The fine magnetic manliness," in dancing with this specimen. No, I should think not.

But the talking! Talking? Twaddle! A graceless gossip, with now and then a suggestion of slander—just a breath of the malaria.

Don't you know how it's done? A mention of some name, ominous silences, uplifting of eyebrows, compression of lips, and the poison is at work as surely as if a Babel of tongues had proclaimed it.

Why do nine-tenths of the women of our day cry out against Mr. Thackeray? Why do they declare his pictures of society are false and cynical? Because nine-tenths of the women recognize how fearfully and wonderfully they are made by these sharp strokes of Mr. Thackeray's pencil; and the likeness frightens and shames them; so they hide their faces, and cry, "It is false!"

They are not brave enough, not honest enough, not simple enough, many of them, to take the truth and let it teach them better manners, better taste, and more Christian charity. They are afraid of themselves, they are afraid of each other, and they are afraid of Mr. Thackeray.

But I am not going to enter into a discussion of this matter now. I only wanted to give you an idea of the social state that evening; and— Well, to go on, as I said, a little singing, a little dancing, and a little talking; and I had tried all three, and found the yield of amusement and satisfaction dry and barren.

I had just finished a waltz with Tommy Meyrun, the little dandy, and was standing in the embrasure of a bay-window, leaning against the lowered sash with a dull, angry, bored feeling, out of patience with myself and all the world, specially little Tommy, when whiff! white violets and fern leaves—that was the odor. And then such a rush of recollections came!

Don't you understand that? Perfumes, you know, are associations sometimes. You remember what Holmes says in the Autocrat: "Memory, imagination, old sentiments, and associations are more readily reached through the sense of smell than by almost any other channel."

His specialty was marigolds and the yellow everlasting. Mine was the odor of white violets and young fern leaves.

I think if I were asleep, and any one should place a handful of these on my pillow, that I should either awaken at once with the never-forgotten fragrance thrilling my heart, or else my soul would wander off into a dream—and no dream, perhaps, but a vision, who can tell?—of a spring day long past, when a girl, half a child, a girl not yet fifteen, standing by the brink of a river, lost in her vague sweet fancies, suddenly finds herself covered and crowned by May's fresh dainties—white violets and the feathery plumes of the fern. Shaken down in loose bunches, the delicate sprays and slips settled in her hair, her arms, and dropped into her breast. Before a start of surprise can come, she meets a face smiling at her in the smooth water of the river—a boy's face, arch, mischievous, and manly. And a gay frolic ensues. The flowers serve as missiles, and rain harmlessly about, flung by the vigorous young hands.

That was all. The day went, and years went. The boy goes out into the world, and sees a dozen faces, fairer to him perhaps, which erases the girl face of that day from his memory, it may be altogether. And the girl, as years flowed on, ceased to think of the boy-lover, or admirer—it was hardly a passion. A score of friends—maybe lovers, maybe admirers—had taken his place. But an odor of white violets and fern leaves breathes up from woods and dells, and straightway the most curious sense of loss and desolation pierces and thrills. A flash, and the picture comes: the spring day, the smooth flowing river, and the young faces meeting there. This was my experience over and over again. This was my experience now, standing there in the window embrasure, leaning against the lowered sash.

A curious sense of loss and desolation. That was the oddest part of it. Why should I feel that invariably with the remembrance? No doubt you will think I am very missyish and sentimental when I tell you my fancy about it. If regret was in it, it was not for the time, nor the emotions of the time, but rather for the promise of splendid manhood and the possibilities lying in that promise. Possibilities and realizations which had never— Ah, well! I was standing by the window there, you know, when all this came again with that whiff of violets and fern leaves. But whence came the violets and ferns?

I looked out into the May night. No, never in that trim lawny garden space. I did not think of looking within. Within! Where, drooping in the button-hole of Tommy Meyrun's faultless coat, or withering in the bosom of one of those chattering magpies?

Violets here! So I kept my eyes down and mused. Whiff—again—nearer, sweeter. A shadow between me and the lights beyond. I glanced up.

Marmaduke Evan.

"How do you do, Duke?" and I put my hand out to meet his.

"How do you do, Daphne?"

My name was Margaret, but he had an odd fancy of calling me Daphne. And there in his left hand, swinging idly at his side, hung the fern feathers and a bunch of white violets. He lifted them to view.

"I've been Maying, you see."

"Yes; how lovely!" and I eyed them wistfully.

He surveyed my dress a moment, then held out his flowers.

I knew he had a peculiar sense of fitness. What you would call artistic.

"They quite suit you," he said; "will you wear them?"

My dress was all white—a vapory muslin with soft puffs of lace half covering the material—and not an ornament nor a suggestion of ribbon.

While I fastened them at my bosom he went on talking about them.

"I have a fancy for this odd combination of tree and flower," he said, musingly. "They have a peculiar charm for me."

I looked up curiously, half disappointedly too, I believe. A sense of invasion, as if it had been my exclusive right and privilege to have associations connected with these odors. But he did not answer the look—he gave no explanation; instead, kept on:

"There must have been a spell upon me to bring these here to-night. You were no doubt waiting for them;" and he smiled half dreamily, half archly, at his own words.

"I know the combination well," I remarked, as I mused over the slender pointed lances, striking against my white dress its pale green blades.

"That is rather odd," he returned, apparently surprised.

"Odd—why?" and I was surprised.

What mutual mystery were we running darkly against through this foliage of flowers.

"Why? Well, it's a singular combination; don't you think so? Violets and ferns?"

"I don't know—is it? How did the fancy come to you?" I questioned.

"Oh, it is a simple accident of association. I had a cousin who was fond of them. A splendid good fellow, always in the woods, and knew every thing about nature. You should have heard him talk. He had multitudes of stories of trees and plants; associations of course followed, and this was one. Yes, a splendid good fellow. I always think of what one of his friends said of him, the only perfect bit of inscription I ever heard applied to such a soul. 'His heart lies so close to Nature that he feels every throb she gives, and so his life has become regulated by her sweet and pure pulsations.'"

"A flower soul," I said.

"Yes, just. Perfectly manly, yet as delicate and sensitive as a woman in his tastes and habits."

A full, sweet breath came wafting up then from the violets, and I thrilled again with my sense of loss.

Perfectly manly, yet as delicate and sensitive as a delicate woman in his habits and tastes. That was what I had lost. That was the possibility of my boy-lover—I like the word "lover" for its earnestness. That was what he might have been if he had lived, I felt sure.

But coming back from the past to the present, I asked:

"And this cousin, where is he now?"

"Where is he? Oh, dead long ago—three years or more."

The extreme regret, the yearning meaning of this, told more than any thing what he was to him—"dead long ago—three years or more." That three years was an age to him; very long indeed in separation. And do you believe actually that I felt bereft too? "Dead, both dead! The type was rare. We shall not be likely to see their like again," I mused over to myself.

I wanted to know more of this cousin but did not care to cross into his shadow again.

There is something about Duke Evan that makes it difficult to follow up a subject when once he gets silent and thoughtful. Not so much the preoccupation stays you as an assertion of reserve, quite unexpected and positive. Unexpected, because Duke Evan is ordinarily the most insouciant person—toasted easy and indifferent, and pleasant-tempered. A wit too, and altogether delightful. So you see this trait of reserve in the midst of such a one surprised you. I had never felt very near selfishness myself, I was closely acquainted, though not called such other Duke and Daphne from the first, and the first two years or so. But who felt near to Duke Evan? Easy and indifferent, and pleasant-tempered, there was a glittering thread of sensibility running through all. He didn't like to show silent dreams which drew little invisible lines between himself and his companions.

I imagined the cause of this one, the hero-cousin of the flower association, and I looked at the statuesque Daphne and thought, "Ah, that's why she wants your life in dreams—why not make a hero of yourself? Plenty of material—youth, health, and tolerable looks." But I was not to be drawn in the dull routine of elegant leisure. Wit filtered out in the frightening manner society by satire and ridicule only. Manly muscle and robust health employed for easeful personal pleasures merely."

But I was not thought of then.

Day after day, week after week, month after month, and still I held my tongue. Daphne had a reservation of regard which I had not felt before. From that night of the violet remembrance Duke Evan and I had grown together more cordially. We were friends—friends, that was all. So the time went on. The wood, of course, was cleared, and the fine evening gave it a warmer name, gave us to each other; but it did not change our relation. Duke Evan was the same as ever—easy friend, my brother—not the man of resolute aims who should rule my life. Idle, purposeless, he drifted with the tide held to the splendid possibility of manhood, which I had conceived, which alone would fill my heart, content me. I thought then no one knew Duke Evan so well as I. I who had discovered, or to whom accident, circumstance, had discovered the deep, hidden nature under the careless exterior, underlying the careless exterior. A breath of violets, a touch of the hand—I was sure about it. Yes, I knew him well, and I liked him much, all the time deploring the purposeless life. But it was a pleasant friendship.

"You'll marry him yet," my Aunt Deane said, in her wise, provoking way.

I laughed.

"You don't know Duke Evan and me," I returned.

"I know Duke Evan is just the man for you," she retorted, "and you'll find it out some day. I forgive it you in this. But that's just the way you girls go playing with happiness. You don't know it is there or it straight before you. Now, I fancy some marvelous destiny when a fair face outlies at your feet. You know the verse:

"Oh, why should we change by foreign sighing
For the far-off unattained and dim,
While the joys all around us are lying
Often up to love, perpetual hymn?

Remember, I say, what you are fancying in the wonderful distance is here at your feet."

I laughed at the idea of Duke Evan's lying at my feet; a man to whom I had been almost as even in the words of gallantry or sentiment. A thoroughly good friend, nothing more nor less; and I told her so. Daphne and he had become such friends as

"The very man for you. Your ideal hero."

My Aunt Deane mildly chorded this suggestion this presumptuous assertion.

My hero! was he like Duke Evan? And before my mental eyes there arose a vague dream of possibilities. I did not tell it to my aunt, she would have called me foolish.

And it was that very night that I talked over this matter of heroes with Duke Evan himself, which gave me the key to his character. Which was here.

He had come in dressed for a party, handsome, idle, elegant, ennui. And sitting there, drawing on a pair of maize-colored gloves, he suddenly asks,

"Daphne, Jessie, what is love?"

I gave a gaze of surprise. I didn't know what he meant.

"Reading for?" I said, puzzled.

"Yes.

"For still within her deep she lies,
The sealed heart, the sealed eyes,
And love, love is the spell to raise,
To find her locked in silence dumb."[1]

Oh, I knew now. Perhaps to some persons, to most persons, this would have been an answer to this, or at least no serious answer; but Duke and I were such good friends, you know, I could say my thing to him. So I said now, laughing a little and coloring, "I'm waiting for my hero, Duke."

"For your hero! Why, you have him. What is he like, Daphne? A fairy prince?"

"Don't get satirical, Duke, with me," I retorted.

"Satirical, Margaret? I'm in serious, solemn earnest. Is love a fairy prince? Answer it."

He always called me "Margaret" when he wished to be particularly grave.

"Well," I began, musingly, thinking not so much of my words as my fancies, "he is no fairy prince, but a true and simple soul—a man to rely upon."

A moment after and I was sorry that I had spoken of myself, and I blushed like a hot-proof spun his peculiar weakness. And I thought I saw a look of pain in his face, but I could not be sure, and I was ashamed for some time, then he said, slowly,

"I to conquer fate! Do you think that an easy thing to do, Daphne?"

"Not easy, perhaps, but a necessity to some nature," I felt constrained to answer.

"But when one sees nothing fit to conquer. A man must hide his time, you know," he said wistfully.

"Yes, but often in the hiding he loses it altogether," I answered, with, I am afraid, more vexation than I should have felt.

For some time he did not speak. I raised my eyes and I had it was looking back amidst the cushions of the couch, whistling softly one of the Strauss waltzes. By-and-by he spoke, as if he had been speculating on the matter:

"Margaret, you should have married my cousin. You would have found your hero then."

"And lost him," I concluded.

"And lost him—for a while—yes. Perhaps it would have saved him, though. His flung his life away on the Alps there. A splendid good fellow, but never content—never at rest. Your admiration for achievement must have been satisfied in him. The heroism that never lies idle, that throws on its explorations—and yet always athirst! If he had lived the world would have been richer for his experience."

A soft sigh escaped him, the mournful wistfulness returned to his face, and he rose to go, buttoning the maize-colored gloves with that weary air he had worn now and then, which is so melancholy and painful.

This was the man whom my Aunt Deane had prophesied I should marry! You see how much better I understood the matter. How much better I understood Duke Evan than she did.

Not many days after this he came in with the announcement, "Daphne, I'm going to Europe."

"No!"

"Yes!" And he laughed at my amaze.

"When?"

He then received my passage for the next steamer. She sails on Monday."

This was Thursday.

I was conscious of a sharp thrill—a thrill of regret. I should miss this pleasant friend.

"I'm sorry you're going, for my own sake, Duke," I said.

"Are you?" he asked, with his rare, wistful expression.

"Yes, I shall miss you; and the violets, Duke. Who will remember my violets next May?"

"Oh, perhaps next May will find me here again. Perhaps never—and many a time; the world will have a vacancy that I can fill. I seem to be of little use now. Good-by?" holding out his hand.

"But I shall see you again?" I exclaimed.

"No, I must go to the city to-night; my arrangements will probably detain me there until I leave."

"How very sudden!" I broke in.

"No, not very. I have been contemplating the journey for some time."

"And no confidence of it until now."

"No; that is my way, Daphne. I never talk of action until I am ready to act.

"Well, then I am ready for me to learn in Duke Evan, after all. Here was a quality I had never suspected.

But he smiled, holding out his hand.

"Good-by!" and I put my own within it.

The next moment he had stooped over me and touched my cheek with his lips. "You would have been my cousin, you know," he said, with a little sad smile, a recollection which touched me strangely; and in another second he was gone.

This was the last time—the November of 1860. In the winter that followed I missed him more than I can tell—missed his pleasant talk, his gracious manner, his light and airy humor. Always kindly, always kindly and considerate.

The war had begun, and during thought of another nature too. War brooded in the atmosphere, and fluttered its dark wings with boding, invisible threatenings over the land. And as battle after battle preached, and the crisis drew nearer, it was fine to hear the brave, hot words men spoke here in the North; to feel that, spite of the party faction that had raged, there was a splendid majority of loyal hearts!

In the midst of this enthusiasm I fancied the wistful, half-static stand, the easy, smiling outlook, which Duke Evan had taken upon himself. I knew his way.

But in the time I had heard nothing from him; no one had heard any thing from him. That was his way too. I wondered when he would come back, and where. Perhaps; perhaps never! It was getting into May now rapidly, and I should miss my May flowers.

May—and throughout the North rang the notes of preparation! The "blood-red blossom of war" had burst into full bloom and flower!

All alone one night I sat waiting and watching for the boy who was to bring me some violets, sick of arms, the call of the bugle, and the long, low roll of the drum came distinctly to me on the sweet May wind.

Waiting and watching!

Then a step, a ring, a step grated on the walk. "The news-boy!"

I ran to the door, out upon the steps, to be met by a man in a long cloak and shuffler. I turned, startled, disappointed. I wanted the paper, and who was this? It was too dark to distinguish.

"Daphne!"

"Oh! is it you, Duke?" and I gave him both my hands in the joy of all about the past.

"What were you rushing out here for," he said, "like a child, bareheaded in black," touching my dark dress. "You look uncanny;" and he laughed lightly in his old manner, as if he had gone back to his accustomed ease.

Going in with me, under the gas-light he stopped and said, smiling, "I have come back to bring your May flowers, Daphne;" and he held out the well-remembered combination—the violet and fern.

"Have you kept their spell?" I took them, I scented the well-known odor, but the association came not as vividly as before. Instead, a sense of pleasure in the present hour alone possessed me. I was glad to get my friend again, and I told him so.

"Then you have missed me, Daphne?" he asked.

"Yes, and it is pleasant to welcome you home."

"But, Daphne, I have only come to say good-by again."

I glanced up surprised.

"Where now?"

He wheeled a chair for me near the wood-fire that sparkled on the hearth, and came and sat beside me.

"Margaret," he began, earnestly, "when I went away I said to you, 'Perhaps next May will find me here again.' Perhaps some need may arise—the world may have a vacancy that I can fill.' The need has arisen. There is a vacancy. I have found my place, Margaret."

I started. "What is it? You don't mean—Where are you going?" I uttered, confusedly.

"I am going to put myself in the ranks of those who are called to save the country from utter ruin and dissolution," he answered.

I was silent with surprise. This is not what I had expected. I thought I knew him so well!

"It is a solemn need which has arisen," he went on. "I think God that I have lived to serve in it. If I may live to see the old flag floating freely once more, and the nation purged of its sin, I shall feel that life has not been in vain." He, on the contrary, I go to meet death, I am sure that it is not a useless sacrifice."

I looked upon the earnest, thoughtful face as these words were uttered.

A flash went over me. A mist rolled from my mental vision.

A dull cudgeon we sat there talking gravely and quietly of his purpose. When he rose to go he took from his breast-pocket a little package, saying,

"Margaret, I have to leave this in your charge. If I come back, I shall reclaim it; if not, I wish you to keep it."

He unfolded the wrappings—a miniature likeness in water-colors of a fine manly face met my gaze, and lying against it a tiny bunch of pressed leaves and flowers. What? Yes, the violet sent Eva. And I saw now the connection between the face. It was shaded and disguised now by a full, flowing beard, but—

"Who is it?" I asked, quickly.

"The cousin I have told you of."

"And his name?"

"His name? Did I never tell you? Lorrimer, Max Lorrimer."

I sat down stupefied.

"And these flowers?"

"He had a passion for them, and these were of his own cultivation in Switzerland. He sent them pressed as you see them."

"Did you know I was here—I thought he died in boyhood; I heard so," I said, in a dream. My companion looked at me amazed.

"You thought—how did you ever know?"

I told him what I knew.

"So," he said, his eyes fixed with that old wistful expression, "I think you would have been my little cousin in reality, Margaret, if Fate had been kinder to me. But I am glad I have found my cousin's betrothed-mate, who used to remind him of a white violet. I am glad to know that the violet love one day, he found her standing by the river's brink, and crowned her with the very flowers. How strange that I, who have had so little share in this love mystery all this time! And you will never find your hero now, Daphne."

I looked at him. A hero! What makes a hero? I thought. An image of simple courage and unconsciousness without a shadow of envy to a successful companion. A soul that, while comprehending and feeling fine, could calmly face the present emergency with a deep and solemn sense of duty. Did not this make a hero?

And there flashed over my mind the words:

"Oh, why thus longing, why forever sighing
For the far-off unattained and dim,
While the beautiful, all around thee lying,
Offers its low, perpetual hymn?"

As I looked up his eyes, Duke Evan's eyes, met mine.

The old wistful expression. What if my aunt was right—what if he—

"No, Margaret," he said again, breaking the silence, "you must find your hero now."

Some impulse made me utter quickly, "I have found him!"

A sudden spasm went over his face. In it I read, how much? and he never suspected even now: but in his eyes I read only what he chose to show me, constrained the crimson color that surged to my brow, nor was my self-control put to a severer test.

"Margaret!"—he leaned forward—"am I in a dream: do I read rightly?"

I put out my hand. "I have found my hero, Duke." I saw him smile in modest depreciation; but he was content, for he was sure, and he knew that I loved him. The nine years' old romance lies sweet and calm with the dead white violets here. I had pursued a shadow while the substance waited at my door.

May, 1862—and again on my breast blooms the violet and the fern; and a young soldier writes me:

"The May flowers in your letter, Daphne, still keep their perfume. Ah, Daphne, Daphne, when they come again I may gather them with you. In the mean time, the good work goes on. The nation is being purged of its sin. And I, Margaret, am content, for I have found my place in love and life."

THE POOL AND THE BROOK.

How silently it slumbereth,
The deep and silent pool,
Without a ripple on its face
To make its shadows cool;

While from it trills a noisy brook,
With wavelets sparkling bright,
Whose shallow waters waste and dry
When summer's at its height.

The one, like envious emotion, deep
Within the silent heart;
The other, trifling feelings, which
Dry up as they depart.

THE STARVING PEOPLE OF NEW ORLEANS FED BY THE UNITED STATES MILITARY AUTHORITIES.—[See Page 383.]

HON. MOSES F. ODELL, MEMBER OF CONGRESS FROM BROOKLYN, N. Y.—[PHOT. BY WILLIAMSON.]

HON. MOSES F. ODELL.

THE HON. MOSES F. ODELL, the patriotic Member of Congress from the Brooklyn District, was born at Tarrytown, Westchester County, on the 16th of February, 1818. His family removed to New York City shortly after his birth, and here and in Brooklyn Mr. Odell grew up, receiving his education in the common schools of the city. Early in life he received an appointment in the Customhouse, where he soon proved himself a peculiarly valuable public servant, and for twenty-six years passed step by step till he was made Assistant-Collector, which post he held during the Administration of President Polk. Being a Democrat, when the Taylor Administration came in Mr. Odell was removed from his post and put to smaller duty. He was, however, shortly replaced, notwithstanding his politics, the Collector finding him indispensable. He continued to hold his place under Collectors Bronson and Redfield till he resigned, under the latter. During this long term of responsible, laborious, and often irksome office, he gained and retained the esteem of the merchants of this city, and achieved a reputation for clear-headedness and the ability to transact a great amount of business, in a manner satisfactory to all with whom it came in contact, and which has made him a great favorite with the business community of New York. Under the Administration of Mr. Buchanan he held the post of Public Appraiser in this city.

Mr. Odell has always been a Democrat. In early life he was for a short time President of the Brooklyn Empire Club, and all his life he has taken a strong interest in the success of the Democratic party, though never seeking office. Last fall he was nominated, on the Douglas ticket, for Congress. The chances for his election were not good. The member of Congress from the District, Mr. Humphreys, was a Republican, and a gentleman of unexceptionable character, personally liked by his constituents; and the Breckinridge wing of the Democratic party nominated a candidate, and thus caused that horror of politicians, a "split ticket." Nevertheless, Mr. Odell was elected over both his competitors, his sterling character and great personal popularity carrying him far ahead of his ticket. He was, we believe, the only Democrat elected on the ticket.

He did not take his seat in Congress till the meeting of the extra session, on July 4, 1861. Meantime the rebellion had broken out. Brooklyn hastened to send a regiment to defend the capital and the Union; and in those first days, when Democrats and Republicans mingled more still and looked at with some degree of suspicion, he took his stand in a speech delivered to his constituents and to the soldiers going away to the war. The following short extract from that speech is an index to his conduct ever since. He said: "The position I stand in toward the Government and toward you, makes it right that you should hear my views. . . . I am for the Constitution of the country and for the enforcement of the laws—for the Stars and Stripes—for the flag which has protected us all. That flag has been trailed in the dust and spit on by those whom it protected. I have no apology to make for those who did this, and I have no quarter to give until that insult has been avenged. It is well known, to you, gentlemen, that I was elected as a Democrat. I have been identified with that party since I came to Brooklyn—more than twenty years ago; but I have no party here to-night. I stand by the Union; I shall be summoned to Washington, and there I shall get there [it was doubtful at that time]—and I shall give my support to any measure that will defeat the foes of the Government. I did what I could to prevent the election of the President. I labored as earnestly against him as many of you did for him. But he was elected—legally, fairly, honestly elected President of this country. He is My President. I shall sustain the President in every thing which I believe to be right, and calculated to put down the men who have made war upon our flag and trampled it under foot. . . . I am with you in this inspiring movement which has spread over the North. My prayers are with those who have gone forth to defend the country, and I believe and pray that God will defend them; for the right is with them, and they will prevail."

His acts will kept his word. When Congress met it was expected by many who knew his peculiar experience and abilities that he would be placed upon the tariff and tax committees. This was not done, probably because the Speaker did not know him. But he was reserved for as important a work. His patriotic speech attracted attention, and, we have heard, gathered around him quite a number of Congressmen, Republicans as well as Democrats; and when it was determined to appoint a Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War, Mr. Odell was wisely selected as one of its members. Here he has labored earnestly and effectively ever since, to improve the effectiveness of the army, to expose and prevent frauds, and to aid the Government in its immense labors. We have reason to know that his conduct has secured him the affectionate regard of the President, who values his advice as that of an honest, clear-headed, and single-hearted man, such as Mr. Lincoln is himself.

Mr. Odell is not a speaker, but a man of action. He has not made a speech, in Congress, yet; but he has given all his time to the important labors of the Committee room. During his residence at Washington he has greatly endeared himself to the soldiers by his constant and personal care for their comfort. After the battle of Bull Run he looked after the sick and wounded who crowded the city, and especially those of the gallant 14th (Brooklyn) regiment, many of them young men who had grown up under his eye, in business and at the Sunday-school of the Sands Street Methodist Church, of which he has been for many years the efficient and beloved superintendent. The following paragraph from a recent number of the Washington Intelligencer shows that it is not only soldiers whom his active benevolence seeks to help:

"We referred yesterday to the commendable zeal and ability of Senator Wright in the Sabbath-school and other benevolent enterprises. It is our pleasure now to add to the list worthy ones of Christian philanthropists the name of Moses F. Odell, who represents the Brooklyn District, New York, in the House of Representatives, and resides on Capitol Hill. Sunday very materially to the interests of Sabbath-Sunday very materially to the interests of Sabbath-schools in this city, which he has for some time conducted with zeal. Mr. Odell has been a member of the Bible Class in the same school ever since their residence in Washington."

CHAPTER III.

TOWARD six o'clock the next morning the light peering in on her face awoke Magdalen in the bedroom in Rosemary Lane.

She started from her deep dreamless repose of exhaustion again, with that mental sense of bewilderment on first waking which is familiar to all sleepers in strange beds. "Norah!" she called out mechanically, when she opened her eyes. The next instant her mind roused itself, and her senses told her the truth. She looked round the miserable room with a loathing recognition of it. The sordid contrast which the place presented to all that she had been accustomed to see in her own bedchamber—the practical abandonment implied in its scanty furniture of those elegant purities of personal habit to which she had been accustomed from her childhood—shocked that sense of bodily self-respect in Magdalen, which is a refined woman's second nature. Contemptible as the influence seemed when compared with her situation at that moment, the bare sight of the jug and basin in a corner of the room decided her first resolution when she woke. She determined, then and there, to leave Rosemary Lane.

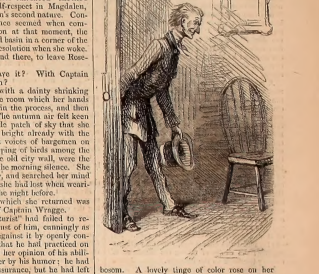
How was she to leave it? With Captain Wragge, or without him?

She dressed herself, with a dainty shrinking from every thing in the room which her hands or her clothes touched in the process, and then opened the window. The autumn air felt keen and sweet, and the little patch of sky that she could see was warmly bright already with the new sunlight. Distant voices of bargemen on the river, and the chirping of birds among the weeds which topped the old city wall, were the only sounds that broke the morning silence. She sat down by the window, and searched her mind for the thoughts which she had lost when weariness overcame her on the night before.

The first subject to which she returned was the vagabond subject of Captain Wragge.

The "moral principles" had failed to remove her personal distrust of him, cunningly as he had tried the plea against it by openly confessing the impostures that he had practiced on others. He had raised her opinion of his ability; he had amused her by his humor; he had astonished her by his assurance, but he had left her original conviction that he was a Rogue exactly where it was when he first met with her. If the one design then in her mind had been the design of going on the stage, she would at all hazards have rejected the more than doubtful assistance of Captain Wragge on the spot.

But the perilous journey on which she had now adventured herself had another end in view—an end distant and distant—an end with pitfalls hidden on the way to it, far other than the pitfalls which lay in the way to the stage. In the mysterious stillness of the morning her mind looked on to its second and its deeper design, and the dangerous figure of the swindler rose before her in a new view.



She tried to put him out—to feel above him and beyond him again, as she had felt up to this time.

After a little trifling with her dress, she took from her bosom the white silk bag which her own hands had made on the farewell night at Combe-Raven, and drew together at the mouth with delicate silken strings. The first thing she took out, on opening it, was a lock of Frank's hair, tied with a morsel of silver thread; the next was a sheet of paper containing the extracts which she had copied from her father's will and her father's letter; the next was a closely folded packet of bank-notes, to the value of nearly two hundred pounds—the produce (as Miss Garth had rightly conjectured) of the sale of her jewelry and her dresses, in which the servant at the boarding-school had privately assisted her. She put back the letter at once, without a second glance at them, and then sat looking thoughtfully at the lock of hair as it lay on her lap. "You are better than Judy," she said, speaking to it with a girl's fanciful tenderness. "I can sit and look at you sometimes till I almost think I am looking at Frank. Oh, my darling! my darling!" Her voice faltered softly, and she put the lock of hair, with a languid gentleness, to her lips. It fell from her fingers into her bosom. A lovely tinge of color rose on her cheeks, and spread downward to her neck, as if it followed the falling hair. She closed her eyes, and let her face bend droop softly. The world passed from her, and for one enchanted moment Love opened the gates of Paradise to the daughter of Eve.

The trivial noises in the neighboring street, gathering in number as the morning advanced, forced her back to the hard realities of the passing time. She raised her head with a heavy sigh, and opened her eyes once more on the mean and miserable little room.

The extracts from the will and the letter—those last memorials of her father, now so closely associated with the purpose which had possession of her mind—still lay before her. The transient color faded from her face as she spread the little manuscript open on her lap. The extracts from the will stood highest on the page; they were limited to those few touching words, in which the dead father begged his children's forgiveness for the stain on their birth, and implored them to remember the untiring love and care by which he had striven to atone for it. The extract from the letter to Mr. Pendril came next. She read the last melancholy sentences over to herself: "For God's sake, come on the day when you receive this—come and relieve me from the dreadful thought that my two darling girls are at this moment unprovided for. If my thing happened to me, and if my desire to do their mother justice existed (through my miserable ignorance of the law) in leaving Norah and Magdalen disinherited, I should not rest in my grave!" Under these lines again, and close at the bottom of the page, was written the terrible commentary on that letter which had fallen from Mr. Pendril's lips: "Mr. Vanstone's daughters are Nobody's Children, and the law leaves them helpless at their uncle's mercy."

Helpless when those words were spoken—helpless still, after all that she had resolved, after all that she had sacrificed. The assertion of her natural rights, and her sister's, sanctioned by the direct expression of her father's last wishes; the recall of Frank from China; the justification of her desertion of Norah—all hung on her desperate purpose of recovering the lost inheritance, at any risk, from the man who had beggared and insulted his brother's children. And that man was still a shadow to her! So little did she know of him that she was even ignorant at that moment of his place of abode.

"WHO THE DEVIL WOULD HAVE THOUGHT IT? SHE CAN ACT, AUNTIE ALL!"

She rose and paced the room with the noiseless, negligent grace of a wild creature of the forest in its cage. "How can I reach him in the dark?" she said to herself. "How can I find out—?" She stopped suddenly. Before the question had shaped itself to an end in her thoughts Captain Wragge was back in her mind again.

A man well used to working in the dark; a man with endless resources of audacity and cunning; a man who would hesitate at no mean employment that could be offered to him, if it was employment that filled his pockets—was this the instrument for which, in its present need, her hand was waiting? Two of the necessities to be met, before she could take a single step in advance, were plainly present to her—the necessity of knowing more of her father's brother than she knew now, and the necessity of throwing him off his guard by concealing herself personally during the process of inquiry. Resolutely self-dependent as she was, the inevitable spy's work at the outset must be work delegated to another. In her position was there any ready human creature within reach but the vagabond down stairs? Not one. She thought of it anxiously, she thought of it long. Not one! There the choice was, steadily confronting her: the choice of taking the Rogue or of turning her back on the Purpose.

She paused in the middle of the room. "What can he do at his worst?" she said to herself. "Cheat me. Well! if my money governs him for me, what then? Let him have my money!" She returned mechanically to her place by the window. A moment more decided her. A moment more, and she took the first fatal step downward—she determined to face the risk and try Captain Wragge.

At nine o'clock the landlady knocked at Magdalen's door, and informed her (with the captain's kind compliments) that breakfast was ready.

She found Mrs. Wragge alone, attired in a voluminous brown holland wrapper, with a limp cape, and a trimming of dingy pink ribbon. The ex-waitress at Darch's Dining-Rooms was absorbed in the contemplation of a large dish, containing a leathery-looking substance of a mottled yellow color, profusely sprinkled with little black spots.

"There it is!" said Mrs. Wragge. "Omelette with herbs. The landlady helped me. And that's what we've made of it. Don't you ask the captain for any when he comes in—don't—there's a good soul! It isn't nice. We had some accidents with it. It's been under the grate. It's been spilled on the stairs. It's scalded the landlady's youngest boy—he went and sat on it. Bless you, it isn't half as nice as it looks! Don't you ask for any. Perhaps he won't notice if you say nothing about it. What do you think of my wrapper? I should so like to have a white one! Have you got a white one? How is it trimmed? Do tell me!"

The formidable entrance of the captain suspended the next question on her lips. Fortunately for Mrs. Wragge her husband was far too anxious for the promised expression of Magdalen's decision to pay his customary attention to questions of cookery. When breakfast was over he dismissed Mrs. Wragge, and merely referred to the omelette by telling her that she had his full permission to "give it to the dog."

"How does my little proposal look by daylight?" he asked, placing chairs for Magdalen and himself. "Which is it to be: 'Captain Wragge, take charge of me?' or, 'Captain Wragge, good-morning?'"

"You shall hear directly," replied Magdalen. "I have something to say first. I told you last night that I had another object in view besides the object of earning my living on the stage—"

"I beg your pardon," interposed Captain Wragge. "Did you say, earning your living?"

"Certainly. Both my sister and myself must depend on our own exertions to gain our daily bread."

"What!!!" cried the captain, starting to his feet with a blank stare of dismay. "The daughters of my wealthy and lamented relative by marriage reduced to earn their own living? Impossible—wildly, extravagantly impossible!" He sat down again, and looked at Magdalen as if she had inflicted a personal injury on him.

"You are not acquainted with the full extent of our misfortune," she said, quietly. "I will tell you what has happened before I go any farther." She told him at once, in the plainest terms she could find, and with as few details as possible.

Captain Wragge's profound bewilderment left him conscious of but one distinct result, produced by the narrative on his own mind. The lawyer's offer of Fifty Pounds Reward for the missing young lady ascended instantly to a place in his estimation which it had never occupied until that moment.

"Do I understand," he inquired, "that you are entirely deprived of present resources?"

"I have sold my jewelry and my dresses," said Magdalen, impatient of his mean harping on the pecuniary string. "If my want of experience keeps me back in a theatre I can afford to wait till the stage can afford to pay me."

Captain Wragge mentally apprized the rings, bracelets, and necklaces, the silks, satins, and laces of the daughter of a gentleman of fortune, at—say a third of their real value. In a moment more the Fifty Pounds Reward suddenly sank again to the lowest depths in the deep estimation of this judicious man.

"Just so," he said, in his most business-like manner. "There is not the least fear, my dear girl, of your being kept back in a theatre if you possess present resources, and if you profit by my assistance."

"I must accept more assistance than you have already offered or none," said Magdalen. "I have more serious difficulties before me than the difficulty of leaving York, and the difficulty of finding my way to the stage."

"You don't say so! I am all attention; pray explain yourself."

She considered her next words carefully before they passed her lips.

"There are certain inquiries," she said, "which I am interested in making. If I undertook them myself, I should excite the suspicion of the person inquired after, and should learn little or nothing of what I wish to know. If the inquiries could be made by a stranger, without my being seen in the matter, a service would be rendered me of much greater importance than the service you offered last night."

Captain Wragge's vagabond face became gravely and deeply attentive.

"May I ask," he said, "what the nature of the inquiries is likely to be?"

Magdalen hesitated. She had necessarily mentioned Michael Vanstone's name in informing the captain of the loss of her inheritance. She must inevitably mention it to him again if she employed his services. He would doubtless discover it for himself, by a plain process of inference, before she said many words more, frame them as carefully as she might. Under these circumstances was there any intelligible reason for shrinking from direct reference to Michael Vanstone? No intelligible reason—and yet she shrank.

"For instance," pursued Captain Wragge, "are they inquiries about a man or a woman, inquiries about an enemy or a friend—"

"An enemy," she answered, quickly.

Her reply might still have kept the captain in the dark, but her eyes enlightened him. "Michael Vanstone!" thought the wary Wragge. "She looks dangerous; I'll feel my way a little farther."

"With regard, now, to the person who is the object of these inquiries," he resumed. "Are you thoroughly clear in your own mind about what you want to know?"

"Perfectly clear," replied Magdalen. "I want to know where he lives, to begin with."

"Yes? And after that?"

"I want to know about his habits; about who the people are whom he associates with; about what he does with his money—" She considered a little. "And one thing more," she said; "I want to know whether there is any woman about his house—a relation, or a housekeeper—who has an influence over him."

"Harmless enough, so far," said the captain. "What next?"

"Nothing. The rest is my secret."

The clouds on Captain Wragge's countenance began to clear away again. He reverted with his customary precision to his customary choice of alternatives. "These inquiries of hers," he thought, "mean one of two things—Mischief, or Money! If it's Mischief, I'll slip through her fingers. If it's Money, I'll make myself useful, with a view to the future."

Magdalen's vigilant eyes watched the progress of his reflections suspiciously. "Captain Wragge," she said, "if you want time to consider, say so plainly."

"I don't want a moment," replied the captain. "Place your departure from York, your dramatic career, and your private inquiries under my care. Here I am, unreservedly at your disposal. Say the word—do you take me?"

Her heart beat fast, her lips turned dry, but she said the word.

"I do."

There was a pause. Magdalen sat silent, struggling with the vague dread of the future which had been roused in her mind by her own reply. Captain Wragge, on his side, was apparently absorbed in the consideration of a new set of alternatives. His hands descended into his empty pockets, and prophetically tested their capacity as receptacles for gold and silver. The brightness of the precious metals was in his face, the smoothness of the precious metals was in his voice, as he provided himself with a new supply of words, and resumed the conversation.

"The next question," he said, "is the question of time. Do these confidential investigations of ours require immediate attention, or can they wait?"

"For the present they can wait," replied Magdalen. "I wish to secure my freedom from all interference on the part of my friends before the inquiries are made."

"Very good. The first step toward accomplishing that object is to beat our retreat—excuse a professional metaphor from a military man—to beat our retreat from York to-morrow. I see my way plainly so far; but I am all abroad, as we used to say in the militia, about my marching orders afterward. The next direction we take ought to be chosen with an eye to advancing your dramatic views. I am all ready, when I know what your views are. How came you to think of the theatre at all? I see the sacred fire burning in you; tell me, who lit it?"

Magdalen could only answer him in one way. She could only look back at the days that were gone forever, and tell him the story of her first step toward the stage at Evergreen Lodge. Captain Wragge listened with his usual politeness, but he evidently derived no satisfactory impression from what he heard. Audiences of friends were audiences whom he privately declined to trust, and the opinion of the stage-manager was the opinion of a man who spoke with his fee in his pocket and his eye on a future engagement.

"Interesting, deeply interesting," he said, when Magdalen had done. "But not conclusive to a practical man. A specimen of your abilities is necessary to enlighten me. I have been on the stage myself; the comedy of The Rivals is familiar to me from beginning to end. A sample is all I want, if you have not forgotten the words—a sample of 'Lucy,' and a sample of 'Julia.'"

"I have not forgotten the words," said Magdalen, sorrowfully; "and I have the little books with me in which my dialogue was written out. I have never parted with them: they remind me of a time—" Her lip trembled, and a pang of the heartache silenced her.

"Nervous," remarked the captain, indulgently. "Not at all a bad sign. The greatest actresses on the stage are nervous. Follow their example, and get over it. Where are the parts? Oh, here they are! Very nicely written, and remarkably clean. I'll give you the cues—it will all be over (as the dentists say) in no time. Take the back drawing-room for the stage, and take me for the audience. Tingle goes the bell, up runs the curtain, order in the gallery, silence in the pit—enter Lucy!"

She tried hard to control herself; she forced back the sorrow—the innocent, natural, human sorrow for the absent and the dead—pleading hard with her for the tears that she refused. Resolutely, with cold, clenched hands, she tried to begin. As the first familiar words passed her lips Frank came back to her from the sea, and the face of her dead father looked at her with the smile of happy old times. The voices of her mother and her sister talked gently in the fragrant country stillness, and the garden-walks at Combe-Raven opened once more on her view. With a faint wailing cry she dropped into a chair, her head fell forward on the table, and she burst passionately into tears.

Captain Wragge was on his feet in a moment. She shuddered as he came near her, and waved him back vehemently with her hand. "Leave me!" she said; "leave me a minute by myself!" The compliant Wragge retired to the front room, looked out of window, and whistled under his breath. "The family spirit again!" he said. "Complicated by hysterics."

After waiting a minute or two he returned to make inquiries.

"Is there any thing I can offer you?" he asked. "Cold water? burned feathers? smelling salts? medical assistance? Shall I summon Mrs. Wragge? Shall we put it off till to-morrow?"

She started up, wild and flushed, with a desperate self-command in her face, with an angry resolution in her manner.

"No!" she said. "I must harden myself—and I will! Sit down again and see me act."

"Bravo!" cried the captain. "Dash at it, my beauty, and it's done!"

She dashed at it with a mad defiance of herself, with a raised voice and a glow like fever in her cheeks. All the artless, girlish charm of the performance in happier and better days was gone. The native dramatic capacity that was in her came, hard and bold, to the surface, stripped of every softening allurement which had once adorned it. She would have saddened and disappointed a man with any delicacy of feeling. She absolutely electrified Captain Wragge. He forgot his politeness; he forgot his long words. The essential spirit of the man's whole vagabond life burst out of him irresistibly in his first exclamation. "Who the devil would have thought it? She can act, after all!" The instant the words escaped his lips he recovered himself, and glided off into his ordinary colloquial channels. Magdalen stopped him in the middle of his first compliment. "No," she said; "I have forced the truth out of you for once. I want no more."

"Pardon me," replied the incorrigible Wragge. "You want a little instruction, and I am the man to give it you."

With that answer he placed a chair for her, and proceeded to explain himself.

She sat down in silence. A sullen indifference began to show itself in her manner; her cheeks turned pale again, and her eyes looked wearily vacant at the wall before her. Captain Wragge noted these signs of heart-sickness and discontent with herself after the effort she had made, and saw the importance of rousing her by speaking, for once, plainly and directly to the point. She had set a new value on herself in his mercenary eyes. She had suggested to him a speculation in her youth, her beauty, and her marked ability for the stage, which had never entered his mind until he saw her act. The old militiaman was quick at his shifts. He and his plans had both turned right about together when Magdalen sat down to hear what he had to say.

"Mr. Huxtable's opinion is my opinion," he began. "You are a born actress. But you must be trained before you can do any thing on the stage. I am disengaged—I am competent—I have trained others—I can train you. Don't trust my word: trust my eye to my own interests. I'll make it my interest to take pains with you, and to be quick about it. You shall pay me for my instructions from your profits on the stage. Half your salary for the first year; a third of your salary for the second year; and half the sum you clear by your first benefit in a London theatre. What do you say to that? Have I made it my interest to push you, or have I not?"

So far as appearances went, and so far as the stage went, it was plain that he had linked his interests and Magdalen's together. She briefly told him so, and waited to hear more.

"A month or six weeks' study," continued the captain, "will give me a reasonable idea of what you can do best. All ability runs in grooves; and your groove remains to be found. We can't find it here—for we can't keep you a close prisoner for weeks together in Rosemary Lane. A quiet country place, secure from all interference and interruption, is the place we want for a month certain. Trust my knowledge of Yorkshire, and consider the place found. I see no difficulties any where, except the difficulty of beating our retreat to-morrow."

"I thought your arrangements were made last night?" said Magdalen.

"Quite right," rejoined the captain. "They were made last night, and here they are. We can't leave by railway, because the lawyer's clerk is sure to be on the look-out for you at the York terminus. Very good; we take to the road instead, and leave in our own carriage. Where the deuce do we get it? We get it from the landlady's brother, who has a horse and chaise which he lets out for hire. That chaise comes to the end of Rosemary Lane at an early hour to-morrow morning. I take my wife and my niece out to show them the beauties of the neighborhood. We have a picnic hamper with us which marks our purpose in the public eye. You disfigure yourself in a shawl, bonnet, and veil of Mrs. Wragge's; we turn our backs on York, and away we drive on a pleasure-trip for the day—you and I on the front-seat, Mrs. Wragge and the hamper behind. Good again. Once on the high-road what do we do? Drive to the first station beyond York, northward, southward, or eastward, as may be hereafter determined. No lawyer's clerk is waiting for you there. You and Mrs. Wragge get out—first opening the hamper at a convenient opportunity. Instead of containing chickens and Champagne, it contains a carpet-bag with the things you want for the night. You take your tickets for a place previously determined on, and I take the chaise back to York. Arrived once more in this house I collect the luggage left behind, and send for the woman down stairs. 'Ladies so charmed with such-and-such a place (wrong place, of course) that they have determined to stop there. Pray accept the customary week's rent in place of a week's warning. Good-day.' Is the clerk looking for me at the York terminus? Not he. I take my ticket under his very nose; I follow you with the luggage along your line of railway—and where is the trace left of your departure? Nowhere. The fairy has vanished, and the legal authorities are left in the lurch."

"Why do you talk of difficulties?" asked Magdalen. "The difficulties seem to be provided for."

"All but ONE," said Captain Wragge, with an ominous emphasis on the last word. "The Grand Difficulty of humanity from the cradle to the grave—Money." He slowly winked his green eye, sighed with deep feeling, and buried his insolvent hands in his unproductive pockets.

"What is the money wanted for?" inquired Magdalen.

"To pay my bills," replied the captain, with a touching simplicity. "Pray understand! I never was, and never shall be, personally desirous of paying a single farthing to any human creature on the habitable globe. I am speaking in your interests, not in mine."

"My interests?"

"Certainly. You can't get safely away from York to-morrow without the chaise. And I can't get the chaise without money. The landlady's brother will lend it, if he sees his sister's bill receipted, and if he gets his day's hire beforehand—not otherwise. Allow me to put the transaction in a business light. We have agreed that I am to be remunerated for my course of dramatic instruction out of your future earnings on the stage. Very good. I merely draw on my future prospects; and you, on whom those prospects depend, are naturally my banker. For mere argument's sake estimate my share in your first year's salary at the totally inadequate value of a hundred pounds. Halve that sum; quarter that sum—"

"How much do you want?" said Magdalen, impatiently.

Captain Wragge was sorely tempted to take the Reward at the top of the hand-bills as his basis of calculation. But he felt the vast future importance of present moderation; and actually wanting some twelve or thirteen pounds, he merely doubled the amount and said, "Five-and-twenty."

Magdalen took the little bag from her bosom and gave him the money, with a contemptuous wonder at the number of words which he had wasted on her for the purpose of cheating on so small a scale. In the old days at Combe-Raven five-and-twenty pounds flowed from a stroke of her father's pen into the hands of any one in the house who chose to ask for it.

Captain Wragge's eyes dwelt on the little bag as the eyes of lovers dwell on their mistresses. "Happy bag!" he murmured, as she put it back in her bosom. He rose, dived into a corner of the room, produced his neat dispatch-box, and solemnly unlocked it on the table between Magdalen and himself.

"The nature of the man, my dear girl—the nature of the man," he said, opening one of his plump little books bound in calf and vellum. "A transaction has taken place between us. I must have it down in black and white." He opened the book at a blank page and wrote at the top, in a fine mercantile hand: "Miss Vanstone the Younger: In account with Horatio Wragge, late of the Royal Militia. Dr.—Cr. Sept. 24, 1846. Dr.: To estimated value of H. Wragge's interest in Miss V.'s first year's salary—say £200. Cr. By paid on account £25." Having completed the entry—and having also shown, by doubling his original estimate on the Debtor side, that Magdalen's easy compliance with his demand on her had not been thrown away on

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

—he captain pressed his blotting-paper over the wet ink, and put away the book with the air of a man who had done a virtuous action, and was above boasting about it.

"Excuse me for leaving you abruptly," he said; "Time is of importance; I must make sure of the chaise. If Mrs. Wragge comes in and her mother—she is not sharp enough to be told her mother's dead—you must say I'm gone for a walk. If she presumes to ask questions exaggerate her immediately. You have only to be firm. Pray take my authority into your own hands and be as hard with Mrs. Wragge as you can." He snatched up his tall hat, bowed, and, tripped out of the room.

Smallpiece's alibi gave her relief of being dead, feeling no more distinct impression than the vague sense of some serious change having taken place in herself and her position, Magdalen let the events of the morning come and go like shadows on her mind, and waited vaguely for what the day might bring forth. After the heat of the day the door opened softly, and the figure of Mrs. Wragge stalked into the room, and stopped opposite Magdalen in solemn astonishment.

"Where are your Things?" asked Mrs. Wragge, with a burst of incontrollable anxiety. "I have my stairs looking in upon me directly. Where are your night-gowns and your petticoats and stockings? Where are your pins and your dress, and all the rest of it?"

"My luggage is left at the railway-station," said Magdalen.

Mrs. Wragge's moon-face brightened dimly. The incalculable female instinct of Curiosity tried to sparkle in her faded blue eyes—flickered piteously—and died out.

"How much luggage?" she asked, confidentially. "The captain's gone out. Let's go and look at it!"

"Mrs. Wragge!" cried a terrible voice at the door.

For the first time in Magdalen's experience Mrs. Wragge was deaf to the customary stimulus. She actually ventured to try the experiment once more in the presence of her husband.

"Oh, do let her have her Things!" pleaded Mrs. Wragge. "Oh, poor soul, do let her have her Things!"

The captain's inexorable forefinger pointed to a corner of the room—dropped slowly as his wife retired before it, and suddenly stopped at the region of her shoes.

"Do I hear a clapping on the floor?" exclaimed Captain Wragge, with an expression of horror. "Yes, I do. Down at heel again! The left shoe this time. Pull it up, Mrs. Wragge, pull it up! The chaise will be here incorrectly morning at nine o'clock," he continued, addressing Magdalen. "We can't possibly wait for the claiming your box. There is note-paper. Write down a list of the necessaries you want. I will take it myself to the shop, pay for it, bring it home, and bring back the parcel. We must sacrifice both—we must indeed."

While her husband was addressing Magdalen Mrs. Wragge had stolen out again from her corner, and had ventured to draw nearer to the captain to hear the words "shop" and "parcel." She clapped her great hands together in supernatural ecstasy, and had all control over herself immediately.

"Oh, I'm shopping, let me do it!" cried Mrs. Wragge. "She's going out to buy her Things! Oh, let me go with her—please let me go with her!"

"Sit down!" shouted the captain. "Straight! Down to the right—more still. Stop where you are!"

Mrs. Wragge crossed her helpless hands on her lap and subsided quietly into tears.

"I do so like shopping," pleaded the poor creature, "and I get so little of it now!"

Magdalen completed her list, and Captain Wragge at once left the room with it. "Don't let my wife bore you," he said, pleasantly, as he went out. "Cut her short, poor soul—cut her short!"

"Don't cry," said Magdalen, trying to comfort Mrs. Wragge by patting her on the shoulder. "When the parcel comes back you shall open it."

"Thank you, my dear," said Mrs. Wragge, meekly drying her eyes; "I thank you kindly. Don't notice my handkerchief, please. It's such a very little one! I had a nice one, but my husband lice borders. They're all gone now. Nevermind! It will comfort me to squeeze it. Things are very good to me. I like you, I say—you won't be angry, will you? Give us a kiss!"

Magdalen stooped over her with the frank grace and gentleness of past days, and touched her forehead coldly. "Let me do something for you then!" she thought, with a pang at her heart—"oh, let me do something innocent and kind for the sake of old times!"

She felt her eyes moistening, and silently turned away.

That night no rest came to her. That night she roused forces of Good and Evil fought their terrible fight for her soul, and left the strife between them still in suspense when morning came. As the clock of St. Clement's struck nine Mrs. Wragge followed Mrs. Wragge to the chaise, and took her seat by the captain's side. In a quarter of an hour more York was in the distance, and the sad road lay bright and open before them in the morning sunlight.

THE END OF THE SECOND SCENE.

FEEDING THE REBELS.

AMONG other outrages committed by General Butler at New Orleans, which have elicited the fiercest indignation of General Beauregard and his army, is the feeding of the starving people whose husbands, brothers, and sons are mostly in the rebel army. We illustrate the scene on page 380. The following description from the Herald correspondence will serve to explain it:

In accordance with notice, Captain John Clark commenced the distribution of the beef this morning, and issued eight hundred liberal rations for hungry families. A right more fearful and harrowing I do not wish ever again to witness, and it is no discredit to Captain Clark to say that, in the arrangements he had made which he supposed ten rations would serve, he is frequently deeply moved at the sad countenances of the poor people and increased the amount of the distribution to twelve hundred, which was all he could command by his previous calculations.

At the hour appointed for the beef there were thousands of eager, hungry men, women, and children crowded around the Custom-house. A very large number of this people were women, all carrying either baskets or aprons. Some were old and sickly—others infirmity; others decidedly, wearily enough, a babe at the breast; and many, God help them! bore the evidence of another claim on their support soon to come.

The sun was pouring down his rays with an intensity greater than we have before experienced since our arrival, and the poor creatures huddled and jammed each other to get into the office; and finally getting to the desk, breathless from fatigue and excitement fell upon the counter in sheer exhaustion. If the leaders of this accursed rebellion could have seen the sight which was presented this morning in front of the Custom-house, it would have been strange if they had not experienced some dark forebodings of the terrible punishment which is in store for them in another world, however easily they may escape a just retribution in this.

DROPPINGS.

THE leaves that fall on the grassy wall,
And the rain dropping out of the apple-tree
Call it to sigh: a passing thought
For, I know not why, but these things seem
To call new memories to my mind to me.

THE leaves that fall on the grassy wall:
Fast drops the rain from the apple-tree;
And I think of my feal what I have been.

But a moment longer, I think I should know
Who thus can read me, and why I read me well.

Wherefore? Leaves fall all day on the wall,
All day drops rain from the apple-tree.
And never before did I feel the rain and fall.
And they doubtless will never, never again,
Seem about to impart such a secret to me.

More leaves that fall on yonder wall!
More rain dropping down out of yonder tree!
What matter? If Nature has something to say,
Let her take her time, in the hours her own way!

So long as at last she will say it to me.

Ah! but leaves will fall, as now, on the wall,
And rain, as now, drop down out of the tree.
Many, many a day, while the chaster, I know,
Is lost. I have missed a word, a moment ago.
The leaves and the rain had confided to me.

CORINTH, MISSISSIPPI, NOW IN POSSESSION OF OUR TROOPS.—FROM SKETCHES BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 395.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1862.

REOPENING OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

THE great work of suppressing the rebellion is in effect achieved. We have "reopened" the great artery of the country—the Mississippi River; with the possible exception of some settlements in the neighborhood of Vicksburg, from which we have no late intelligence, but which can not hold out against attacks from both sides, every town and village on the river is in our hands. Our gun-boats are doing sentinel duty from the Southwest Pass to St. Louis.

It is impossible to exaggerate, and scarcely possible to realize the importance of this achievement. The possession of the Mississippi River, with its tributaries, secures to the United States fing 30,000 miles of inland navigation, which before the war carried more steam tonnage than all the waters of Europe and Asia combined.

The possession of the river not only divides the rebel States, shutting off Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas, or nearly one half the territory of the so-called Southern Confederacy, from the remainder of Jeff Davis's dominion; but, as we pointed out in a recent number, it insures, in a given period of time, the surrender of the rebel armies in Virginia and Mississippi from famine. In the rebel realm as inclosed by the river with Mr. McClellan and Halleck, by the south, and by the Mississippi River, there is no food. We turn out both rebel armies can not fight. Pork and corn may answer for a while; but unless the rebel commissaries can within a few months renew their precipitous raids into the interior States, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee, their armies will scatter. It was on this account that Davis stole his colleagues and people, over which they could not perform;" namely, to force the Border States into their secession scheme.

Thus the great drama of the war is slowly to a close. Twelve months ago the rebels held all of Virginia, all of Tennessee, half of Kentucky, the valleys of Missouri, their flag floated in sight of the White House and in sight of Cairo; their forces were to be boast-fully in the whole Southern Confederacy at first constituted Port Pickens was the only spot on which the Stars and Stripes still waved; the danger in which Washington, St. Louis, and Louisville stood was such as to appall the stoutest hearts. Twelve months have rolled up, and we hold all of Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee; the most important parts of Virginia, Louisiana, and Arkansas; the coast of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Mississippi; the uplands of Alabama; and, greatest and best of all, the Mississippi River and its tributaries. No rebel soldier is within a hundred miles of Washington, but our troops are thundering at the gate of Richmond, Charleston, Mobile, and Savannah. The finances of the rebel Confederacy have collapsed; the premium on United States security advances daily; the rebel army of the Mississippi has scattered: our army is over half a million in number, and unequaled in discipline and efficiency. Indeed, only a year ago was exultant over the destructions of the American Union, now stands smeared at the vitality and power which the national system has developed, and, so far from aiding the rebels, has long since set down their cause as hopeless.

Well may we thank God for the year's work!

THE MEXICAN QUESTION.

MEXICAN affairs are distressing many people just now. This arises chiefly from the wholesale lying and blundering of the newspapers. There is in reality no cause at all for distress, but, on the contrary, some ground for hope.

For forty years Mexico—one of the fairest portions of the world—has been a prey to the worst kind of anarchy and disorder. It has enjoyed brief intervals of peace and prosperity under military despotism. But revolution has been its normal condition, and highway robbery and murder the most usual forms of social state. This shocking condition of affairs has resulted from the antagonism between the Mexican people on the one side, and the clergy and the Mexican Church, which owns a large proportion of all the productive property in the country, and has persistently and most unscrupulously and maintain a theocratic government. Sometimes the people have succeeded in organizing a Government, which has been overthrown by the intrigues of the clergy; and sometimes the Church party have obtained power, and have in their turn been overthrown by popular outbreaks. Each party has been strong enough to prevent the other from securing undisputed sway. But neither has yet been able to crush its opponent finally and forever.

Five years ago the maritime powers of Europe, "the guardians of civilization," as the British complacently style them, proposed to the United States to intervene in Mexico, in the interest of peace and commerce. Mr. Buchanan acquiesced in the proposal, and recommended to Congress an armed occupation of certain States of Mexico. The recommendation remained without effect. Congress was unwilling to intrust a signer of the Ostend manifesto, and a confidant of John Slidell, with power to encroach upon the territory of a friendly neighbor, under any pretense whatever.

Last year, this country being plunged into a conflict which rendered us powerless against Europe, three leading powers—England, Spain, France, and Spain—agreed to intervene in Mexico without us, and by a joint occupation to enforce peace to that distracted country. Each had private and peculiar scores to settle with the Mexicans. But the sole object of the joint expedition was formally and solemnly declared to be the pacification of the country. Each of the contracting powers absolutely renounced all idea of conquest, aggrandizement, or acquisition of territory.

The convention was so far carried into effect that a joint expedition—Spanish, French, and English—military and naval—sailed to Vera Cruz, seized that port without bloodshed, and prepared to invade the country. Some preparations were in a forward state when the progress of the Government of the United States in the work of suppressing the rebellion became so obvious that the British and Spanish Powers drew back from the enterprise, wisely foreseeing a future collision with this country in the event of a European occupation of Mexico. The French general is understood to have persisted in his undertaking; to have marched on the city of Mexico; and to have been repulsed with loss by the Mexicans.

This is the present condition of affairs. We entreat the public not to be misled by the trash in the newspapers about a French occupation of Mexico for three years, a kingdom there to Isons, and the establishment by French arms of an Austrian Archduke on a Mexican throne. There is not the least foundation for any of these stories. They are the offspring of the fertile brain of newspaper correspondents who, in a branch of facts, deal in fiction. It is simply absurd and preposterous to suppose that the Emperor Napoleon, who has never yet, in his long career at the head of the French nation, committed a fatal error, should now run his power and prestige by undertaking enterprises in Mexico which could not, even if successful, possibly prove useful to him or his country, but which would almost inevitably plunge France into wars of indefinite length and expenses of formidable magnitude.

The truth of the matter is simply this: Napoleon wants to sell his surplus cotton, and an active consumer of French wines, silks, and other manufactures. To achieve this end he is willing to lend the strength of his arms to Mexico the use of a few thousand French soldiers. When he first undertook the enterprise the United States were in a position to give aid or resist him. Within a few weeks their condition will be entirely changed. They will have the power either to help France in the affairs of Mexico, or to assist them in their most sensible and worthy undertaking. We hazard little in predicting that they will adopt the latter alternative. Indeed, if we are not mistaken, the Government of the Emperor has already made known to Mr. Lincoln that it is willing to join against Mexico has no other object than the restoration and protection of a stable native Government in that country, and that the Emperor seeks and ardently desires the co-operation of the United States. Nor shall we be for wrong if we add that Mr. Lincoln has already replied that the object of the French is one that commends itself to the approval of the people of the United States, and that while a rebel power of any time this country may be in a position not only to co-operate with the French, but to relieve them altogether of the expense and trouble of intervening in Mexico, by placing at the disposal of the liberal Government of that country a force of United States troops sufficient to secure the ends which alone have led the Emperor to dispatch his armies across the Atlantic.

THE LOUNGER.

FORECASTING.

IT seems at present as if the serious fighting in the war of the country would be almost entirely over by mid-summer. But it is by no means sure. Just as a year ago we stated that General Scott meant to dine in Richmond on the 4th of July, so this year it is believed that General M'Clellan will. But the terrible fact is that the rebels are not certain that the rebels are neither cowardly nor unskilful. They have sometimes run. But we have also proved, upon occasion, that they can fight. Let us candidly confess that the rebels fought well at Bunker Hill, at Pea Ridge, at Shiloh, at Williamsburg, and at Fairoaks.

And it is well that they did so. It is best for all sides and for a lasting peace that they were plucky, that they did all they could, and that they were utterly defeated at last. For then there will be no subterfuge or illusion. They will not think that the country conquered them by tricks and chances and surprises. They will know that they have been fairly and soundly thrashed by an immensely superior and resolute and intelligent force. We shall know that we are the strongest, and they will understand that they must submit.

How will they submit? Will Jeff D. sue for mercy by publishing? Will he come to Washington and ask to be hung? Will the "Confederate Government" formally dissolve? Clearly not. The war will be really over long before we are aware of it. The rebellion will disappear as Johnston melted from Manassas and Beauregard from Corinth, while our embattled lines are still bristling and ready. The huge web of rebel war, spread to catch the eagle, as a spider spins for a fly, will rent out into miller guerrilla fighting. Desperate bands will take to the hills. They will attack and murder. The lower civilization of the rebel section will show itself in the character of the ending as in the beginning and the duration of the war.

The leaders, of course, are desperate. One of the rebel newspapers urged before Richmond said that we could take that city only over the bodies of fifty thousand dead men. Doubtless he said what he felt. Doubtless the leaders will do so. But the soldiers do not. With every lost battle which they bravely contest their cause becomes more hopeless. The moment hostess when they will see that even desperate courage does not avail against a calm and composed and persistent superiority. They will have no more to fight for. Their hope is in a confession of conquest. But the same conquest is death to their cause.

Floyd, for instance, and Davis, and Wigfall, and all Texas, and Governor Pryor, and Governor Letcher—what a scurvy set they are!—what have these men to hope for? What is it to them if fifty thousand of their countrymen die in the ditches? Have even from the halter? The only resources left to them is the impoverished country. They will not how much blood they shed, or how the fire ravages, or the land is ruined. Since they must fall they would rather have all fall in the general ruin.

If, therefore, Beauregard's army is dispersing—if Richmond shall be evacuated or captured—it is still possible and probable that Davis will withdraw to some point within the rebel lines and maintain himself for the summer—so long as he has a ship ran exit clear. That, however, must be the subject of his vessels. He will not risk his neck. Should all escape from the sea-board or the Mississippi be shut up, he will still have his way across the Free States to Canada. These imaginative fellows him to England, the melancholy pet of the world that finds in the wildest, wanton, inhuman war which he has waged for the right of human slavery, the best only the sympathy of a refined and oppressed people against a brutal lust of power.

He completes the trio of names infamous in our history—Arnold, Burr, Davis. But how infinitely inferior is Davis to either! Arnold was a soldier Arnold and as an intriguer to Burr! He is not infamous because he is a rebel; for Cromwell and Washington were rebels. But for organizing aggression for which there was no hope of remedy left in arms. Catiline and Davis also are rebels But they rebelled against governments which they despaired of corrupting.

We now entertain no reasonable doubt that the rebellion in arms is ending. Now comes the great and grave task of securing the peace we are conquering.

M'CLELLAN.

UP to the moment of writing General M'Clellan has suffered no defeat. Since the campaign opened his rebels have been driven before him at Manassas and at Yorktown; while his army has been engaged in four severe battles—at Williamsburg, Fort Pooh, Hanover Court House, and Fairoaks—besides several brilliant skirmishes, in all of which it has been successful. The estimate of the country is, that, with the sole exception of the hapless division of General Fremont, General M'Clellan has been worthy its character and the cause it defends.

When the story of the whole war can be told it will not be found that any great mistake made by M'Clellan would have been an immediate and overwhelming disaster to the National cause, and that he was therefore compelled to be certain of every step. Heroic rebs, brilliant dashes, dazzling but dangerous manœuvres were not for him. He was to be content to be the successful, not the romantic, hero of the war. For he was not only before Richmond but before Washington. He was not merely attacking the rebel capital, he was defending his base. He was not merely to conduct a thousand men across an enemy's country already stripped, and with the intrenched head-quarters of rebellion, defended by the most desperate, the most skilful, and the best armed of the enemy. Risk, dash, brilliancy, were not necessary—however captivating, but successes was indispensable. He had gone to Richmond. Not to take it was to disclaim the country, to invite the rebels to march upon Washington all that is most sacred and precious to a loyal American. He was not there to wonder what Hinton, or Don Carlos of Austria, or Frederick the Great, or Napoleon would have done; but to do what the country and the rebels would think him to do with the means his country had provided.

Their coward spec. If Richmond is taken, it is useless to say that it might have been taken by a dash in another way, because the value of this way is proved, and that is the only way to do it.

General M'Clellan is a soldier. As a soldier he has made his name; as a soldier he is to write it on our history. And to understand practically does he show his soldierly genius than in adopting this movement by the peninsulas of the campaign. A year ago, upon guerrilla duty, as it were, in Western Virginia, his daily bulletins sparkled like rhocket from an electrical battery. Nobody complained that he was too slow, or loved to-morrow better than to-day. In Eastern Virginia for the last two months he has been upon other than guerrilla duty. He is not carrying a mountain pathway, but a fortified empire. Not for every step has been a sure advance; and when his headquarters are in Richmond, we may believe indeed that other greater words than these will have won victory, but M'Clellan will have won it.

Earnest, devoted, successful—silent as fortune usually is—such is the soldier of whom complaint M'Clellan is one of the smallest figures of the war. "Oh, that man which I described," writes a correspondent of the Tribune (which has not praised the General); "had it not been for that, M'Clellan would to-night have been in Richmond. His plans were matured, and our march in overwhelming force and vigor could not have been stopped. The it is only a question of time with the commander. I felt to-day for the first a full sense of the terrible responsibility which the overwhelming heavy burden of the responsibility which weighs down his heart and his brain, when I saw him dismounted from his horse at a cottage door, and ask for a cup of cold water, which was scooped up in the hollow of a dirty hand. Surrounded, hampered as he is, may the God of Battles give you success and give you rest!

IMPORTANT FOR THE FUTURE.

THE conduct of Mr. Stanly, the new military Governor of North Carolina, has naturally excited great attention. It has raised the profoundly important inquiry whether the United States may, in a loyal section of the country, hold and govern without the authorities at Washington. We will have disposed of Governor Stanly's action before this paragraph is written. But the principle involved ought to be clearly understood by every citizen.

The United States have taken military possession of the State of North Carolina. They govern it by martial law. In other words, the supreme power for the authorities duly chosen by the State Government is suspended, and they act solely from all laws of the State which interfere with the national supremacy.

Mr. Stanly is sent by the United States as Military Governor, and he begins by closing the school for the education of the colored people who are willing to go through the farce of an effort to kidnap any body whom they choose to call their slave. The reason for this extraordinary action is that, by law of North Carolina recognizes slavery, and does not permit slaves to be taught. Possibly; but the law of North Carolina is the law of Mr. Stanly, to be Governor. If he is only anxious to obey its behests he will then return to California and we will the State chooses him.

He misconceives his duty. Mr. Stanly was not sent to North Carolina to enforce the laws of the State. He was sent there, as all military Governors are sent, to enforce obedience to the laws of the United States, and to repudiate and annul any of the State whenever they are in conflict with them. So long as the laws of the State by military power it is entirely within its discretion what State laws it will suffer to be effective. Whatever law, in the judgment of the United States, interferes with the suppression of the rebellion "may rightfully and actually be annulled by force." Slavery, for instance, exists every where in this country only by the force of State laws. But no one can say at the time execute that law, and abolish slavery by military power, is either a usurpation.

The same authority which by the necessity of the case it has over the State law recognizing slavery, it has over every other State law. In fact, its exercise is simply a question of policy and special is expedient. The President defined General Butler's proclamation upon the ground that in act we once which he reserved to himself not for the reason that slavery was recognized by the State law of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. The supof his modification was merely that he did not think the time for interference had arrived. Governor Stanly's case he will doubtless say that the time has arrived. But in this instance it is a question of policy, not of right or power, which an both beyond question.

But, indeed, Mr. Stanly has not even the State law upon his side. The law of 1830 in North Carolina which all appeals to Mr. Stanly's zeal to read or write. Mr. Stanly's order assumes that all blacks in the State are slaves. But they are not so, for the law upon which the assumption of his proceeding is unjustified. The United States, however, as he is, does not assume that any one is a slave or a criminal until he is proved to be so.

Moreover the difficulties of such a terrible attempts and exercise of power as Mr. Stanly's act, which frees all slaves that have been used by the rebels against the country. What right has Mr. Stanly to say that any slave has been used by the rebels against the country, that fortification, the liberty, forcibly or by fraud, of any slave, or any slaves, that he is a Union man, and that they have never been used against the Government? How does Mr. Stanly know all this? How can he know it without investigation? Is a Mr. Brey's statement to be only proof for an act of such infinite moment to the welfare of those concerned, and to the character and peace of the nation?

By what authority, also, does Mr. Stanly, also, does Mr. Stanly return any North Carolina slave to the country who does not leave the State. The business it leaves to the local law, and Mr. Stanly is not the administrator of that law without express instructions, which he has not received.

There is no reason whatever, legally, politically, or morality, for Mr. Stanly's action, except to appropriate the citizens of North Carolina by showing them that the Government will not touch their local laws. But how are they to be conciliated by any action whatsoever of a man whose authority rests upon force and who is itself the annihilation of their local law?

THE MASK OF "CONSERVATISM."

WHENEVER any especially inhuman and repulsive measure is proposed in Congress or elsewhere it receives the support of people who call themselves, and are called by their friends, "the conservative party." Whenever a base and disgraceful interpretation is given to any clause of the National Constitution it is called by the same persons "the conservative view." Whenever any rigorous and radical means of suppressing this cruel rebellion are suggested, they are malignantly resisted by the same "conservative" party and papers. The persistent political allies of the rebels, like Vallandigham, Powell, Bayard, and Saulsbury, are leaders of this "conservative" movement. While the newspapers which openly supported the rebellion until the Government took it in hand, or which from their continued support of it received a very significant warning, are the organs of the same faction.

The same "Conservatives" during the last Presidential canvass solemnly warned the country that they could not allow any body but their own candidates to be elected; and they brought eminent "Conservatives" from the Southern States to confirm what they said. The same "conservative" gentry at the South when the new administration was constitutionally chosen, took up arms and have maintained a desperate and bloody war for more than a year. The same "conservative" citizens at the North are now most anxious to make compromises with their friends who are red to the neck in the blood of the brave and hardy youth of the loyal part of the land. Peace at any price, whether of civil order, of national existence, of human rights, of individual honor, or of common decency, is the heart's prayer of this "conservatism." If a man shows himself false to our common humanity, or indifferent to our national unity, they hail him as a "Conservative." If any law aims to destroy or abridge the equal rights which the Government was founded to protect, they rally to it as a "conservative" measure. If a man is faithless to the Democratic principle he is "sound." If he sneers at justice, and manliness, and honor, he is "prudent."

These gamblers are still busy, but their game is played out. It is transparent. "Conservatism" has been used as a convenient and alluring name with which to conceal the effort to sustain the predominance of a single class in this country over all other men and classes. James M. Mason, famous for fathering the Fugitive Slave Bill of 1850, and for nothing else but a futile endeavor to implicate his political enemies with John Brown; John Slidell, famous for the Plaquemine election frauds, and for nothing else but the most unscrupulous political intrigue; John B. Floyd, famous for stealing and running away, and for nothing else; Wigfall, famous for whisky-drinking; Pryor, famous for not fighting with Potter; Cobb, famous for emptying the Treasury and imperiling the credit of the country; Toombs, famous for idiotic bellowing in the United States Senate; Jefferson Davis—these, and an endless string more, are the representative "Conservatives" of the present epoch in our history, and their "conservatism" consisted and consists in the effort to destroy all the safeguards which our Constitution throws around the rights of all men; and, baffled in that, in the fierce and furious armed attempt to overthrow that Constitution and ruin the country.

This game of "Conservatism" is up. Meanwhile the great and true Conservative party of the country—the party of all faithful citizens who, to whatever political band they may have hitherto belonged, are daily learning that national peace can be preserved only by maintaining, by conserving the cardinal and distinctive principles of our Government—is engaged in the triumphant suppression of the rebellion instigated by these pseudo "Conservatives" and their abettors at the North in Congress and the press; and having preserved the country from the military blows which rebel treason strikes at its heart, it will equally save it from the political plots of rebel "Conservatism."

TRUTH VERSUS TWADDLE.

THERE is a lively piece of twaddle afloat. It is the ineffably and silly assertion that this is a nation of white men, or a white man's government. Of course it is only one of the mean appeals to the hate that people always feel for those they have injured. Its intention is to quench any sympathy for black men. It is the kind of argument that does duty in bar rooms, and is very effective in the mouths of politicians whose success depends upon the ignorance and not upon the intelligence of the people.

The assertion is false in whatever way you look at it. It is false theoretically and practically. It is false historically and in current experience. This Government is founded upon the doctrine of equal human rights. The Declaration of Independence holds it to be self-evident that "all men are created equal"—not equal, of course, in capacity, or circumstance, or condition, any more than in the height, or weight, or the color of their hair and eyes—but equal in the right to a guarantee from society of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The men who made the Declaration said this. Did they mean it, or did they solemnly assert what they thought to be false? Did they mean that "all" men, or "some men" are created equal? In other words, did they mean to say that all men are not created equal? No; they meant what they said; and they said "men." Not white men, nor black men, nor yellow, red, brown, or motley men; not Americans, nor Englishmen, nor Frenchmen, nor Germans, nor Irishmen, nor Italians, nor Hindoos, nor Chinese, nor Malays, nor Africans, nor East or West Indians. Not short men, nor tall men, nor fat, lean, or dumpy men; not smart men, nor stupid, mean, foolish, good, bad, or indifferent men. The fathers said what they meant, and meant what they said. They meant all men, and calling God and the world to witness, they said all men. Their doctrine may have been false, but they believed it to be true—and acting upon it they published the Declaration, and upon the principles of the Declaration the Constitution was founded.

Our National Government, therefore, is a Government of all men who, living in the country, obey the laws and behave themselves. The yellow Chinese, and the olive Spaniard or West Indian, or the red Turk or Hindoo, or the white Englishman or Irishman, or the African or Creole of any race, may be a citizen of the United States, subject to the conditions of the State law. As a matter of fact the paler complexions predominate among the citizens; but the ballot of the voter of tawny Spanish descent in New Orleans, or of dusky African descent in Boston, counts just as much in this Government as the vote of the Honorable Mr. Cox, for instance, of Ohio.

The glory of this Government is not in the color of the skins of the citizens, but in the justice with which its laws are made and the fidelity with which they are executed. If the laws be unjust, the Government is mean and inglorious and the nation disgraced, although the face of every citizen were as white as snow.

A HINT TO THE IMPATIENT.

THE following extract from a letter of an officer at Fort Macon hits off admirably the impatience of the slowness of military operations which is so constantly felt and expressed by those who have had no experience of such movements:

"You people that stay at home are in such a confounded hurry that you think that all is lost if a General has to besiege a place twenty-four hours. The newspapers say "Great Success! Fort Macon taken after ten hours' bombardment"—so you all think that General Parke breakfasted early one morning; took a hand-car; came down from Newbern; crossed over; put eight mortars and four siege-guns behind a sand-hill; fired away; took the fort; paroled the prisoners; hoisted the flag; and returned to Newbern to dinner, getting there five minutes after the dinner-bell rang, and was reprimanded for being late. Whereas we besieged the place for a good month; worked like dogs and made half our regiment sick; were on picket duty every third day, besides furnishing camp guard, fatigue parties to work in trenches, and patrols. Whenever you hear again that a thing is done in ten hours, understand that doing the thing is easy work, but getting ready to do it is confounded hard work. And now, instead of supposing that we are ready to go somewhere else because we have taken Fort Macon, know that is the very reason why we are not able to move. We need rest, and the fort needs to be put in proper condition again."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

COMMENCING EARLY.—A brutal teacher whipped a little boy for pressing the hands of a little girl who sat next to him at school, after which he asked the child "why he squeezed the girl's hand?" "Because," said the little fellow, "it looked so pretty I couldn't help it." How very natural!

The bard of Twickenham, though very short and deformed, was nevertheless very partial to his person. One day he asked Dean Swift what people in Ireland thought of him.

"They think," says the Dean, "that you are a great poet and a very little man."

Pope exclaimed, passionately, "And, Mr. Dean, the people in England think quite the reverse of you!"

A correspondent with a mathematical turn sends us the following:

"I heard some one say the other day that Harper's Weekly has a regular circulation of 130,000 copies. At this rate it would soon cover the whole land. I amused myself by making a few calculations as to the progress you are making in this attempt.

"The Weekly measures 46 by 33 inches, and contains 1518 square inches. There are 6,272,640 square inches in an acre; so that 130,000 papers will carpet a farm of 31 acres and a little more: the 52 numbers in the year will therefore cover (disregarding fractions) 1612 acres.

"Again, the length of the paper being 46 inches, the 130,000, laid lengthwise, would reach 94 miles, with 2004 feet to spare; the 52 yearly numbers will then extend to within a few rods of 4910 miles. The circumference of the globe being, in round numbers, 25,000 miles, it would require a little more than five years to 'put a girdle [of Harper's Weekly] round the globe.'

"Again, I find that 30 numbers of the Weekly, when folded and pressed, measure an inch in thickness. So that the whole edition for a single week would make a pile 362 feet high—say one-third higher than the steeple of Trinity Church."

THE SEX.—A parson, reading the funeral service at the grave, forgot the sex of the deceased, and asked one of the mourners, an Emeralder, "Is this a brother or a sister?" "Neither," replied Pat, "only a cousin."

NOT SO DUSTY.—"Dost thou clean my furniture, fair handmaiden?" asked X., of the pretty servant who was polishing his escritoire. "I Dust," replied the handmaiden.

A mechanic having taken a new apprentice, awoke him the first morning at a very early hour by calling out that the family were sitting down to table. "Thank you," said the boy, as he turned over in bed to adjust himself for a new nap, "thank you, but I never eat any thing during the night."

A surgeon aboard a ship of war used to prescribe salt-water for his patients in all disorders. Having sailed one evening on a party of pleasure, he happened, by some mischance, to be drowned. The captain, who had heard of the disaster, asked of the tars next day if he had heard any thing of the doctor. "Yes," answered Jack, after a turn of his quid, "he was drowned last night in his medicine chest."

In chemistry the best way to separate two bodies is to introduce a third. The same holds true in other departments. To increase the distance between a pair of lovers all that's required is to let Willie walk into the "back parlor" with a lighted candle in his hand.

A gentle heart is like ripe fruit, which bends so low that it is at the mercy of every one who chooses to pluck it, while the harder fruit keeps out of reach.

When the telegraph poles were first stationed through the valley, a green 'un drove into a village and tied his horse to what he supposed was a spruce pole. He was accosted by a precocious urchin with, "Mister! mister! what have you done?" "Done," said the fellow; "what do you mean? I hain't done nothin' as I knows on." "Why, yeth you have, thir; you have just hitched your horse to the Magnetic Telegraph, and you'll be in New York in less than two minutes if you don't look out." The man untied his horse with nervous anxiety, and jumping into his sleigh, drove hastily down the street.

An Englishman and Yankee being in a promiscuous company, the latter was so much struck with some bold air sung by the former, that he asked the name of it. "Oh nothing but the tune the old cow died on," was the response. The Yankee struck up Yankee Doodle. "What is that?" asked his companion. "This is the tune old bull died on!" was the prompt reply.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Tuesday, June 3, in the Senate, communications relative to soldiers imprisoned in the District penitentiary, and transmitting the instructions given to the provisional Governors of Tennessee and North Carolina, were received. A joint resolution was adopted allowing hereafter a premium of two dollars for every accepted recruit to the regular army, and allowing soldiers enlisted as volunteers or in the regular army to receive their first month's pay in advance. The Tax bill was then taken up, and occupied the Senate till the adjournment.——In the House, the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill to free from servitude the slaves of rebels was rejected was taken up, and, after debate, the subject was recommitted to the Select Committee, with instructions to report a substitute in effect liberating the slaves of the leading conspirators against the Government. A bill declaring all persons holding office under the Confederate government forever ineligible to office under the Government of the United States was passed. The House then adjourned.

On Wednesday, June 4, in the Senate, the House bill punishing polygamy in the Territories, with an amendment of the Senate annulling acts of the Legislature of Utah with regard to the practice, was passed by a vote of 37 to 2. The consideration of the Tax bill was then resumed, and continued till the adjournment.——In the House, a petition asking that Western Virginia be admitted into the Union as a new and independent State, was referred to the Territorial Committee. The Senate bill recognizing the independence of Hayti and Liberia and providing for diplomatic relations with those republics was then passed by a vote of 86 against 37. Mr. Blair introduced a bill providing for the removal of the Mint at New Orleans to St. Louis. A joint resolution that Congress finally adjourn on the 16th inst. was adopted, and the House adjourned.

On Thursday, June 5, in the Senate, the bill providing a government for the Territory of Arizona was discussed. A motion to take up the resolution providing for the expulsion of Senator Stark, of Oregon, who is charged with disloyalty, was rejected by a vote of 13 yeas against 20 nays. The consideration of the Tax bill was then resumed. The plan of the Boston Board of Trade and the substitutes of the Finance Committee were both rejected. Senator Sumner proposed a tax of two dollars per head on slaves, the slaves in no case to be sold for said tax, which was adopted by a vote of 19 against 16. The Senate then adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Wickliffe asked leave to introduce a resolution inquiring whether General Hunter has organized a regiment of blacks and fugitive slaves in South Carolina, but objection was made, and the subject was therefore not entertained. The bill appointing a Board of Fortifications for sea-coast and other defenses was discussed in Committee of the Whole. Mr. Stevens moved to strike out the enacting clause, which was agreed to. The House subsequently confirmed the action of the committee, so the bill was lost. The House then adjourned.

On Friday, June 6, in the Senate, official reports of the operations of the naval forces on the Mississippi, the capture of New Orleans, etc., were received from the Secretary of the Navy. Senator Sumner offered a resolution in effect calling for the removal of Edward Stanly from the post of Military Governor of North Carolina. Objection was made, and the resolution lies over. Senator Sumner also offered a resolution declaring the office of Military Governor contrary to the Constitution and laws, destructive to the civil authority, and contrary to the spirit of our institutions. This was likewise objected to, and lies over. Senator Sumner moved to take up the resolution for the expulsion of Senator Stark, of Oregon, charged with disloyalty; but the Senate refused, and recommenced the consideration of the Tax bill. The vote of Thursday levying a tax of two dollars per head on slaves was, after considerable debate, reconsidered—twenty-two against eighteen. A proposition to tax slaves under ten and over sixty-five years of age was defeated—seventeen against twenty-three. The Tax bill was then passed, by a vote of thirty-seven against one, Senator Powell, of Kentucky, casting the negative vote.——The session of the House was devoted to the consideration of private bills and general debate, in which no matters of general interest transpired.

Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, June 9, the Senate resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment for the trial of Judge Humphreys, of Tennessee, charged with treason and other high crimes. Proclamation was made, calling on West H. Humphreys to appear and answer to the charges, and no response being offered, the Court adjourned till the 26th inst. The Senate then resumed legislative business, and the House bills prohibiting slavery in the Territories, and prescribing an additional oath to grand and petit jurors, were passed, the first named by a vote of 28 to 10. The Pacific Railroad bill and amendments were ordered to be printed, and the subject was then postponed.——In the House, a memorial asking the admission of Utah into the Union was presented by the delegate from that Territory. The document, together with the constitution of Utah, were appropriately referred. The Tax bill and the Senate's amendments thereto were referred to the Ways and Means committee. A resolution calling for information as to whether General Hunter has organized a regiment of negroes in South Carolina, was adopted. Mr. Vallandigham offered a resolution tendering the thanks of the House to General Halleck and his army for the occupation of Corinth without loss of life, and declaring that the House would rejoice to see the Constitution as it is, and the Union as it was, maintained and restored every where without any further effusion of fraternal blood. Mr. Vallandigham demanded the previous question on the resolution, but objection was made, and the subject was laid over. The resolution appropriating $35,000 for the purchase, from Gales & Seaton, of sets of Annals of Congress and Register of Debates, was repealed. Mr. Julian offered a resolution for repeal of the Fugitive Slave law, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee. A resolution was offered by Mr. Colfax, instructing the Judiciary Committee to report a bill modifying the Fugitive Slave law, by giving trial by jury to any person denying under oath he is a slave, etc. A resolution declaring that the President should instruct the commanding Generals in the rebel States to issue a proclamation that the army of the republic will be subsisted, as far as practicable, upon the property of those in rebellion and those who gave aid and comfort to the enemies of the U. S., was adopted by a vote of 83 against 39.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN TO HIS SOLDIERS.

The following address was read to the army on 3d at dress parade, and was received with an outburst of vociferous cheering from every regiment:

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
CAMP NEAR NEW BRIDGE, VIRGINIA, June 2, 1862.

SOLDIERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC!—I have fulfilled at least a part of my promise to you. You are now face to face with the rebels, who are held at bay in front of the capital. The final and decisive battle is at hand. Unless you belie your past history the result can not be for a moment doubtful. .. the troops who labored so faithfully and fought so gallantly at Yorktown, and who so bravely won the hard fights at Williamsburg, West Point, Hanover Court House, and Fairoaks, now prove worthy of their antecedents, the victory is surely ours. The events of every day prove your superiority. Wherever you have met the enemy you have beaten him. Wherever you have used the bayonet he has given way in panic and disorder. I ask of you now one last crowning effort. The enemy has staked his all on the issue of the coming battle. Let us meet him and crush him here in the very centre of the rebellion.

SOLDIERS!—I will be with you in this battle, and share its dangers with you. Our confidence in each other is now founded upon the past. Let us strike the blow which is to restore peace and union to this distracted land. Upon your valor, discipline, and mutual confidence the result depends.

GEO. B. M'CLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

JEFF DAVIS TO HIS SOLDIERS.

We find the following in the Richmond Inquirer of June 4:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, June 2, 1862.

TO THE ARMY OF RICHMOND.

I render to you my grateful acknowledgments for the gallantry and good conduct you displayed in the battles of the 31st of May and 1st inst., and with pride and pleasure recognize the steadiness and intrepidity with which you attacked the enemy in position, captured his advanced intrenchments, several batteries of artillery, and many standards, and every where drove them from the open field.

At a part of your operations it was my fortune to be present. On no other occasion have I witnessed more of calmness and good order than you exhibited while advancing into the very jaws of death, and nothing could exceed the prowess with which you closed upon the enemy when a sheet of fire was blazing in your faces!

In the renewed struggle in which you are on the eve of engaging, I ask and can desire but a continuance of the same conduct which now attracts the admiration and pride of the loved ones you have left at home.

You are fighting for all that is dearest to men; and though opposed to a foe who disregards many of the usages of civilized war, your humanity to the wounded and the prisoners was the fit and crowning glory to your valor.

Defenders of a just cause, may God have you in His holy keeping!

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The general will cause the above to be read to the troops under his command.

OUR LOSS AT FAIROAKS.

THE PURSUIT OF BEAUREGARD.

The following dispatch was received on 4th at the War Department:

HALLECK'S HEAD-QUARTERS, June 4, 1862.

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

General Pope, with 40,000 men, is thirty miles south of Corinth, pushing the enemy hard. He already reports 10,000 prisoners and deserters from the enemy, and 15,000 stand of arms captured.

Thousands of the enemy are throwing away their arms. A farmer says that when Beauregard learned that Colonel Elliott had cut the railroad on his line of retreat he became frantic, and told his men to save themselves the best way they could.

We have captured nine locomotives and a number of cars. One of the former is already repaired, and is running to-day. Several more will be in running order in two or three days.

The result is all I could possibly desire.

H. W. HALLECK,
Major-General Commanding.

General Pope telegraphs on 9th from the advance, that the prisoners who first deserted to be exchanged now want to take the oath. The rebels drove and carried off every thing for miles around. The wealthiest families are destitute and starving. Women and children are crying for food, and all the males are forced into the army.

THE CAPTURE OF MEMPHIS.

The particulars of the capture of Memphis were received in Washington on 7th from Commodore Davis, in which he states that a battle took place between his fleet, aided by Colonel Ellet's ram flotilla, and the rebel fleet of eight gun-boats and rams. The engagement commenced at half past five on the morning of the 6th instant, and ended at seven in a running fight, the end of which was the capture of four vessels of the rebel fleet, the sinking of two, and the burning of one. One escaped by superior speed. Colonel Ellet, who is seriously but not dangerously wounded, is highly complimented for his gallantry and skill. Memphis was surrendered by the Mayor immediately after the engagement, and was placed under military authority.

THE BATTLE OF CHATTANOOGA.

Dispatches received from General Mitchell, on 7th, dated at Huntsville, Alabama, state that General Negley, with a portion of the forces under his (Mitchell's) command had driven the rebels under General Adams from Winchester to Chattanooga, and at that place had utterly routed them and captured all their baggage wagons, supplies, and ammunition.

MOBILE ATTACKED.

A dispatch from Mobile to the Petersburg Express states that the Union fleet has passed the lower batteries on the river and attacked Fort Morgan.

THE MOVEMENT AGAINST CHARLESTON.

Dispatches from Flag-Officer Dupont state that the gunboats have possession of Stono, near Charleston.

General Stevens, with an expedition, went from Port Royal to Pocotaglio, a railway station on the road between Charleston and Savannah, and tore up the track, thus cutting off communication between those two cities.

Southern papers report that our troops landed on the 4th instant at James Island, opposite Charleston; that a battle took place there, and they claim a victory. Later dispatches, dated the same day, say that our men landed in large force on Battery Island and John Island, and were then in front of General Gist, the rebel leader, under cover of our gun-boats. An immediate advance on the city was then considered imminent.

THE SHENANDOAH VALLEY.

The whole Shenandoah valley has been cleared of the rebels by the combined movements of General Shields, General Frémont, and General M'Dowell, from whose force a brigade of cavalry, under General Bayard, reached Strasburg on 1st, and was ordered by General Frémont to join in the pursuit of Jackson's army, who made three attempts to maintain a position at different points, but were driven from each with great loss. The rebels were attacked at Strasburg by Frémont's forces on the evening of 1st, and rapidly pursued on Monday morning by the troops of Frémont, Shields, and Bayard. Their dispersion was complete.

General Frémont reached Harrisonburg on 7th, and drove Jackson's rear-guard from the place.

ANOTHER UNION MEETING IN TENNESSEE.

The Union meeting announced to be held in Shelbyville, Tennessee, has come off. Three thousand people were present, and the Union sentiment was strongly manifested. Governor Johnson, Colonel May, and J. L. Scudder addressed the meeting, the latter gentleman having been a prominent secessionist previously, and an official under the rebel Governor Harris.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE SLAVE-TRADE TREATY.

IN the House of Lords Earl Russell has laid upon the table the new treaty with the United States for the suppression of the slave-trade. He briefly explained its objects, and bore testimony to the efforts of the Government of President Lincoln to put a stop to the traffic.

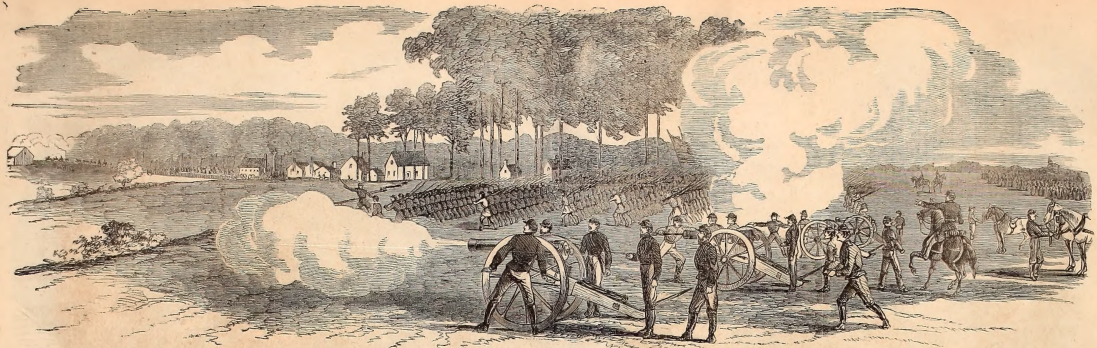
TURKEY.

NO REBEL FLAG IN TURKISH WATERS.

As a singular contrast to the action of the Christian Powers of Europe with regard to the reception given and aid afforded to rebel vessels in their ports, we have the fact demonstrated, by recent official communications between Mr. Seward and the Government of the Sultan of Turkey, that the latter has refused admission into Turkish ports to any vessel bearing the rebel flag.

MEXICO.

RUMORED REPULSE OF THE FRENCH.



News from Vera Cruz comes to us to the 14th ult. Reports were circulating to the effect that the French had met with a severe repulse at Puebla, losing about twelve hundred men; but many were slow to believe it; and other rumors say that the invaders occupied Puebla without any resistance. Preparations for defending the capital were continuing.

A POOR BROTHER OF SAINT CROSS.

I was little more than sixteen years old when the murder—the unsparing extermination of the Mars and Williams families, of Ratcliffe Highway, London, sent a thrill of horror through the nation; from which my own boy-mind received so deep an impression, that, though the effacing hand of more than half a century has since done its work upon me in regard of other occurrences, the Mars and Williams tragedies, with the surrounding circumstances, are fresh and vivid in my memory as ever. It will be seen that an influence unshared by the public greatly helped to burn that impression into my brain.

The feature of the ferocious deed which more especially terrorized timid, nervous people, was, that no conceivably-adequate motive could be assigned for the assassination of those men, women, children, babes—for the wholesale destruction of two families who, though near neighbors, were unconnected by any tie of blood, friendship, or even of a common acquaintance. Quite inoffensive people, they could not have incurred the personal vengeance to be appeased only by such a horrible massacre; while, as to plunder, but a few shillings—if a few shillings—were carried off. What before unheard-of demon-spirit, hot from hell, had been loosed upon the earth? The excitement and alarm were, as I have said, intense in their exaggeration—ludicrous, absurd it may be; but it was long before a cool, reasonable appreciation of the horrible events took place of that excitement and alarm.

The topic had, however, almost ceased to be discussed, when it was revived at our fireside under strange conditions. Our family consisted only of my father, mother, myself, and a woman-servant. Our dwelling, completely isolated, was situate about half-way between the city of Winchester and the village of Otterbourne, distant from Winchester about four miles, on the Southampton road. My father was a lay-vicar of the Cathedral, a good musician, had a lucrative teaching practice, and was possessed of eight houses—tenements would be the more suitable expression—yielding in all about a hundred pounds yearly. Those rents, which were punctually paid, he himself collected, being a singularly methodical man in business matters, exactly on the day fortnight after they fell due—that is to say, on the 8th of July and the 8th of January. On these occasions my father dined at the "Hare and Hounds," Otterbourne; and it was often not till the small hours of the morning chimed that he found his way home—occasionally fresh, no doubt, but never in any degree intoxicated. He was of a genial disposition, and sang so agreeably, that he could not be so churlish as to leave tenants and other friends whom he was delighting, at what they would have deemed an unreasonably early hour. This practice of collecting his rents, and walking home alone at the dead of night with about fifty pounds in cash about him, was of course well-known in the locality, and often warningly remonstrated against—the road in many places being a lonely one. But he was a man of fearless temper; and nearly twenty years of impunity had banished apprehension, if any he had ever felt.

The Hospital of Saint Cross, where to this day a manchet of white bread and a cup of ale can be demanded by every wayfarer, was as nearly as possible midway between our abode and Winchester city. The Poor Brethren dwelling there, uniformed with loose blue overcoats and cocked hats, were familiar objects—passing, as they frequently did, our door. One of them—a new-comer—known as Richard Cheyne, happened to render my mother an essential service. She was driving alone in a chaise on the Southampton road, when the horse first shied, then bolted, dashing off at a fearful pace. My mother, panic-stricken, could only scream for help; and she would probably have been either killed outright, or received serious injury, but for the opportune appearance of Cheyne—who, a resolute, powerful man, succeeded, at considerable risk to himself, in stopping the terrified animal, and delivering my mother from a great danger.

So great a service, of course, secured him a welcome to our house at all times—a privilege or right of which he was not slow to avail himself. Richard Cheyne might be about fifty years old—certainly not older; a hale, vigorous, instructed man, with a vehement flow of words if in the least degree excited—always at such times monopolizing the conversation, or nearly so, and pouring forth a torrent of declamative comment upon affairs in general, mainly sarcastic, vituperative, mixed up with a profusion of anecdote, the whole strung together, I have heard my father more than once remark, in a loose, dislocated fashion, but always commanding the close attention of his hearers. His physiognomy was remarkable. Such a face, from its mobile, varying expression, would be, I should imagine, the despair of portrait painters. There was, however, about it one never-changing and by no means agreeable peculiarity. No one could ever fix for a moment his restless, fiery eyes. They were invariably turned away from the individual addressed, and directed toward a window, wall, or vacancy.

My father, I quickly discovered, while grateful for the service he had rendered, felt a growing antipathy toward the man—shrank with almost a shudder from only the slightest bodily contact with him. I do not believe they once shook hands after the first meeting. It was equally clear to me that Cheyne felt and resented my father's coldness and reserve—to use mild terms—though he never hinted in words that he did so. My mother remonstrated; but the reply of her husband always was, that he felt in Cheyne's presence as if confronted by an embodied, undefinable, but not the less real, peril—that there were dark depths in his mind unfathomable by human eyes, and concealing strange monsters, which at times rose shadowily to the surface, and as instantly disappeared again—in short, that to travel along the journey of life but casually with the Poor Brother, Richard Cheyne, required wary walking.

Boy as I was, this feeling of my father's was perfectly intelligible to me, needing no non-natural interpretation. Cheyne was possessed by a mastering passion for relating horrible stories. A morbid mania for dwelling, dilating, upon greatly revolting crimes—extraordinary murders especially—had obtained such irresistible ascendency over him, that, upon however different a topic his voluble headlong discourse first started, it was always sure to diverge into some thrilling story of atrocious, triumphant crime—foul murders, the secrets of which had died with the successful perpetrators. I have now no doubt whatever that the mass of those blood-curdling narratives were inventions—the creations, or, might I say, fumes, of an imagination heated to a very unusual degree by the fascination in which the terrible blood-blots that stain and richly illume the histories of all nations exercises over most minds, rendering Madame Tussaud's Chamber of Horrors the most attractive part of her Exhibition, for admission to which a double fee is demanded, and readily paid.

How the man gloated over, analyzed, dissected, placed in every possible light the murder of the Mars and Williams families! Full six months had passed since that occurrence. It was, I have remarked, becoming stale to most people. Not to him; he never wearied of it. It was his daily bread. Many of the melodramatic incidents with which he tinseled the terrible tale were, I am quite sure, if not absolutely false, most grossly exaggerated for effect, he being wonderfully vain of his genius for word-painting. Still, he having been in London at the time, and, from his predilection for such unwholesome excitement, zealously engaged in the self-assumed character of amateur policeman in hunting up and sifting the revolting details, his claim to superior information upon the subject could not be disputed—at least, not openly.

How graphically, with what nervous emotion, the Poor Brother of St. Cross dwelt upon, gloated over, those details—described where, in what position the bodies were found! A father doubled up behind his shop-counter!—a servant-girl that had gone to fetch oysters for supper fallen across the threshold of the parlor she was entering!—a mother killed while dozing, it might be, in an arm-chair!—daughters when partly undressed for bed!—children, mere babes, while their eyes were closed in sleep! And the lodger who, awakened by a noise below on the night of the second massacre, stole softly, in his shirt, with loaded pistols in his hands, down stairs, saw a man bending over the dead body of a woman, and apparently rifling the pockets; and how that armed craven stole up back again as softly as he had descended, tied the sheets of his bed together, and by that means gained the street in safety!

This, and much more which I forbear to repeat, Richard Cheyne poured forth with exultant, frothing fury—if I may so express myself—one evening when there were present only my father, a Mr. Woolgar, and myself. He seemed like one possessed, demented, carried out of himself by the spirit of a fiend.

My father listened in silence, and with watchful astonishment as it were. Mr. Woolgar, at a momentary pause in Cheyne's boiling, turbid torrent of description, said:

"Don't you then believe, Mr. Cheyne, that the fellow apprehended upon suspicion, and who destroyed himself in jail, was the assassin, or at least the principal murderer?"

"He, miserable coward, the principal murderer!" shouted Cheyne, as if Mr. Woolgar's words had been oil cast upon the flame of demoniac triumphal passion. "No! Never, Sir! He who planned—he who mainly consummated that act of hate, that act of vengeance upon the human race, was—must have been—a criminal lunatic escaped from Bedlam, or some other mad-house!"

The words had no sooner left the man's lips than his face, the suddenly variable expression of which I have before noticed, changed to a deathly pallid hue; beads of perspiration burst out upon his forehead; his eyes were cast down; his whole frame trembled in, it seemed, a paroxysm of terror, as a man would look and tremble, I should fancy, who, having taken a wild, drunken leap in the dark, finds that he has landed himself upon the crumbling edge of an abyss.

"A criminal lunatic escaped from Bedlam, or some other mad-house!" said my father, slowly, and with the air of one upon whom a startling light had fallen. "A criminal lunatic escaped from Bedlam, or some other mad-house! That is a singular guess, if it be a guess, to be so confidently put forth."

Cheyne, as my father spoke, raised his eyes and looked the speaker keenly in the face—the very first time I had seen him do so. It was necessary to understand the significance of that slow, solemn interpretation of his own words. He did understand its significance, and my father must have felt that he did.

The head of the Poor Brother was again bowed down; the eyes shaded by his outspread palms. There was a silence of some minutes' duration, broken by the placid tones of Mr. Woolgar:

"A very extraordinary guess, or surmise, Mr. Cheyne—an absurd one, if I may say so without offense. Criminal lunatics, I have read, have always a method in their madness—seek to accomplish some long-meditated atrocity, displaying very often much cunning in carrying out that preconceived object: or their flawed minds have been attracted toward some prominent celebrated personage—a Prince, General, or other person—who occupies an unusually large place in the world's eye; by which a notion has been engendered in their brain which connects them with that great personage, and that they will achieve some kind of desirable notoriety by destroying him. But how could it have occurred to a criminal lunatic to compass the destruction of two humble families, with whom, from all that has transpired, he could not have had the slightest acquaintance? Your proposition or guess, Mr. Cheyne, though, I can not doubt, sincerely entertained, has not a leg to stand upon: to me it is absolutely absurd."

"I do not agree with you," said my father, in his coldest, sternest tones: "I do not agree with you, Woolgar, in this instance. You may be right in a general sense—I dare say you are. It is a subject to which I have given no attention. There are exceptions to all rules. I believe, with Mr. Cheyne, that he who planned, he who mainly consummated the murder of those two unfortunate families, was a criminal lunatic escaped from Bedlam, or some other mad-house."

Again my father's and the Poor Brother's eyes met. Had a shred of doubt remained in the mind of Cheyne that my father had seized his terrible secret, that look—though, being so young, it did not at the time strike me so forcibly as upon after recollection—must have dissipated that shred of doubt. Still, my father's suspicions, aroused by his own maniacal imprudence, would avail little or nothing, he must have argued; and if, when called up to the session of cooler thoughts the next morning, he espied danger in those injurious suspicions, some mode of silencing them might be found. Meanwhile, not to throw away a chance, Richard Cheyne—commencing, in, for him, a cool, deliberate style, and continuing so to speak till constitutional infirmity of uncontrollable passion confirmed the self-betrayal of his true character to the watchful observance of the lay-vicar of Winchester Cathedral—favored his auditors with a narrative in very nearly the following words:

"I disagree with Mr. Woolgar's theory of the determinate action of insanity. No man, however well studied in the phenomena of cerebral disorders, can predicate what course of action under any circumstances a lunatic must take. There is a profound truth, ludicrously conveyed, in Hamlet's speech, that 'he is only mad nor-nor-west, and when the wind is southerly he knows a hawk from a heron—'"

"And yet, Mr. Cheyne," interrupted my imprudent father—not knowing, or unmindful, that his words were goads striking deep into the flesh of a ferocious human tiger—"and yet, Mr. Cheyne, you but two or three minutes since pronounced dogmatically, assuredly, that those dreadful murders, with the details of which you are so familiar, and to which your mind, as if haunted by them, reverts, must have been perpetrated by a criminal lunatic escaped from Bedlam, or some other mad-house. That positive assertion, unless based upon facts within your own exclusive knowledge—for certainly the general public entertain no such suspicion or notion—is, as it seems to me, very much at variance with your theory."

Mr. Richard Cheyne, disdaining or avoiding a direct reply, continued his narrative:

"Hamlet's remark hints, I say, an unquestionable truth, that cerebral disease, except it be a decay or disorganization of the texture of the brain, is a hallucination—a delusion—a passion confined, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases of one thousand, to one particular hallucination, illusion, passion. Now it happened to me, about four months previous to my nomination as a Poor Brother of Saint Cross by the Earl of Guilford, that I found myself at a mean public house, at an out-of-the way village, not far from Dudley, in Staffordshire. My means were slender, and I was therefore obliged to content myself with the mean lodging and coarse fare which such slender means could command. In the same house was another lodger—poor as I, or poorer; and he, a climax of calamity, was hunted by the blood-hounds of the law. He kept very close; but I had at last met with him in the yard of the public, and recognized William Parsons immediately, having been present when he was tried at Chelmsford, Essex, for willful murder. He had killed and robbed a farmer who insulted him a few hours before the avenger met him in a solitary part of the road from Chelmsford to Brentwood."

"I remember the case very well," said Mr. Woolgar.

"So do I," added my father. "William Parsons, a blood-thirsty ruffian, if there ever was one, was acquitted by the jury on the ground of insanity—ordered to be confined during his Majesty's pleasure, and when you met him was a criminal lunatic escaped from Bedlam, after murdering one of the keepers. Is it him you suspect of having plotted and perpetrated the destruction of the Mars and Williams families?"

"I do not permit myself to suspect without reasonable grounds of suspicion," replied Cheyne, recovering his sarcastic tone. "To do so is to stamp one's self a coward or a bully—likely enough both. I have no right to suspect William Parsons of those particular crimes; I am only about to explain how it came to be strongly borne in upon my mind that such seemingly motiveless murders, carried out with consummate cunning and success, may be fairly presumed to be the work of a criminal lunatic—"

"Escaped from Bedlam, or some other mad-house," interjected my father.

"Escaped from Bedlam, or some other mad-house. There is certainly not much logic in the deduction arrived at, when, fresh as it were from listening to William Parsons's confessions—confidences would be the fitter term—I came to the conclusion that only such a man could have conceived and carried out, influenced only by an overpowering mania for murder, those else unaccountable atrocities."

"William Parsons made you his confidant?" said Mr. Woolgar. "I am not much surprised at that. He did not imagine, I dare say, that you would actively assist in the hunt after him. And from all I have heard, there seems to be an overruling necessity compelling great criminals—those especially who have broken into the sacred temple of human life—to perpetually revert to, and babble of, the crimes ever present to their affrighted consciences. William Parsons drowned himself, did he not?" added Mr. Woolgar.

"About a month after I left him at the obscure village in Staffordshire he was found drowned in the Mersey."

"I have seen it so reported," said my father; "but such reports are easily inserted in newspapers. They serve to slacken pursuit."

"The story of his life, confided to me by William Parsons," continued Cheyne, with constrained calmness, "was a terrible one. His name was not Parsons—at least, that was not the name of his reputed father, a wealthy squire of Lancashire, and which he, the supposedly legitimate son and heir, bore unquestioned till he had passed his twentieth year. The father died. The validity of his marriage with the young man's mother was disputed by the next of kin. In the end, William Parsons—as, for sufficient reasons, he called himself in after-years—was legally branded bastard, and cast forth a penniless vagabond into the mocking world: he who had been reared in luxury, taught to regard himself as the undoubted heir to estates yielding a clear yearly rental of twelve thousand pounds. The fall from that splendid height to such a depth of darkness and despair flawed his intellect. The disease took the form of a tiger-thirst for vengeance—a thirst for blood. Eagerly, untiringly, did he, with lolling tongue, dog those who had despoiled him, in search of an opportunity for slaking that hellish thirst. For years—long, weary years—in vain. At last occasion called, and he was ready. The father and son who reveled in his rightful heritage all at once conceived a caprice for the sea. A yacht, the Zephyr, fitted with all luxurious appliances, was built for them, and on a fine summer afternoon they set sail with a favoring breeze for the Mediterranean—Youth at the prow, and Pleasure at the helm. Had they known that the Avenger, habited and working as a common seaman, was on board the Zephyr, the joyous insolence of merriment indulged in by the silken fools would have been checked. More than once William Parsons imagined he was recognized. A vain fear!

"One night a solitary sailor, when the Zephyr was becalmed in the Mediterranean, slid down quietly into a boat used sometimes by the gentlemen for fishing in calm weather, and then towing astern. In the boat, as they would probably resume their fishing should the weather continue favorable, was placed an abundant supply of daintiest provisions, wine, etc. The night was dark. The solitary sailor cast off unobserved—quietly shipped the boat's mast, loosed the sail, the faint air blowing sufficed to waft the light skiff away from the slumbering ship, and in some ten minutes a sufficient distance had been gained. The sailor then furled his sail, and lay rocking on the gently-breathing sea, impatient for the dread catastrophe which he believed—with such patient skill had he laid the train—would be inevitable. The Zephyr (though the war with the revolted States of America was concluded, that with revolutionary France not commenced) carried four pieces of brass ordnance, and the magazine was sufficient to blow the yacht into chips—the men on board to heaven or hell, according to the premises.

"The sailor had not very long to wait. He had won the game. The slight, tortuous, serpent train of fire, as it runs sparkling on its deadly mission, meets with no check from material obstacles of human watchfulness on board a vessel in which discipline is of the laxest kind. The licking tongue of fire reaches the magazine; a pyramid of flame, accompanied by the roar as of a thousand thunders, leaps up into the dark night. Presently afterward the heavy fragments of the Zephyr fall with sullen splash into the water, and all is over! The usurping father and son and William Parsons have at last finally settled accounts; the great estates in Lancashire have slipped from their grasp as irretrievably as they did from that of the Bastard. Ha! ha! That, now, if you like, was a triumph—though no money was obtained by it—the remembrance of which would heat the icy blood of infirm age to flame."

"Do you mean to seriously state that the misbegotten villain really committed the fiendish act you describe? It is impossible! Parsons must have been abusing your ears with the recital of a devilish fiction."

"The Zephyr, at all events, has never since been heard of. I have no doubt Parsons told me the simple truth. He was mad, you know—his particular craze being the lawfulness of slaying your enemies whenever the opportunity occurs. A right royal doctrine, you can not but admit. Besides, a jury decided that Parsons was not an accountable being. In the case of the farmer he did not, they in substance declared, know what he was about—had no distinct conception that he was killing the fool who insulted him. By parity of reasoning it must be held that he did not know that a cleverly-contrived train of gunpowder, if it reached the magazine, would make splinters of the yacht—beatify or damn the souls of all on board. Dangerous men, no doubt, are madmen—and to be locked up for life; but innocent, oh! perfectly innocent in intention. They know not what they do. Ha! ha! It is a sound, wholesome doctrine. Good-night, gentlemen. I must be off, or the gate of Holy Cross will be closed before I reach it."

"Cheyne"—gravely remarked Mr. Woolgar, as he also rose to leave—"Cheyne talks as if he himself was as mad as Parsons."

"I have no doubt, friend Woolgar, that Cheyne is every whit as mad as Parsons. I will speak with you further on the subject," added my father, "in a day or two. The matter is a serious one, and must be looked to."

"Mention not a word to your mother, James," said my father, "of what we have heard to-night; it would only distress her to no purpose. My own opinion is fixed. Cheyne is a madman and a murderer. As I said to Woolgar, the matter is a very serious one, and must—shall be sifted. Meanwhile keep guarded silence."

The next day but one was the 8th of July. My father, as usual, betook himself to Otterbourne; and I, as was the custom, waited up for his return. One—two—three struck. He had never been so late before; and as it was quite light I, without disturbing my mother, set off toward Otterbourne to make inquiry. I had not far to go. In a ditch not more than two hundred yards away I found his self-styled, cold! He had been stabbed with body—stark, cold! He had been stabbed with bayonet—instrument from behind. Robbery had been added to murder. His money and watch were gone. The zealous investigation immediately set out first elicited no reliable particle of evidence, so much as suggested a suspicion of who the assassin or assassins might be. No one exhibited more anxiety to discover a clue to the perpetrator of the deed than Richard Cheyne's son. Had he not received by that show of zeal, and consulted with Mr. Woolger as to whether he could not, by paying or obtaining a warrant to search the Poor Brothers's apartments in the Hospital. He strongly demurred on from attempting such a thing. The lawyer, however, persisted; communicated my suspicions, and the grounds of them, to the Mayor of the borough, and a search-warrant issued. Nothing was found to criminate the Poor Brother; and the only result of the search proceedings was that I had aroused myself the enmity of a man whose enmity was death. He did not openly manifest any displeasure on the occasion by any manner toward me had never been so friendly, so apparently cordial—which friendliness and cordiality but the more convinced me I was a marked victim.

The months rolled on. We were again in the dark days and nights of January. My mother, shrinking in any unfavorable, had sought the quiet nests in Otterbourne. The money was in our hands, we were to leave for Australia in March, ourselves, and a few more general relatives, in a few days.

My mother, who was much indisposed, had gone to Winchester to consult a Dr. Lyford, accompanied by the woman-servant, and would sleep there. Anticipating that I should remain up to read the immediate reach, at all events, of Richard Cheyne, I had retired to my bedroom early.

Again and again, while vainly attempting to fix my attention upon a book, I passed over in review the whole of the succeeding time, the circumstances attending the murder of my father—thought over again the unsatisfactory visit to the Poor Brother, Richard Cheyne; wondered if the popular notion that "murder will out" would prove true; wondered also how far the public communication had reached us from Lavender, the Bow Street Runner, who had inserted a notice of the matter in the principal newspapers offering a reward to whoever would give information that might lead to the discovery of the escaped criminal, William Parsons. I had answered the advertisement, describing Richard Cheyne, and hinting my own belief that he was the man wanted. No answer had been returned, and I concluded that my pen-portrait of the Poor Brother had not struck Mr. Lavender that Richard Cheyne was not the man wanted.

It was getting somewhat late for country-folk, and I was thinking of locking up and going to bed, when the night-bell rang, and in glided Richard Cheyne!—all the demon in his nature roused in action, and flaring with flame from the bottomless pit in his wild, glittering eyes.

He closed and locked the outer door before my shocked paralyzed senses had acquired the faculty to shout of triumph advanced toward me, a bright, thin poniard (the instrument, I should think, with which he had slain my father) glittering in his hand. "I have thee now, young viper! thou and thy father shall be my victims!" he hissed, as I started the stroke by leaping backward, seized a chair, successfully warded off his furious poniard strokes, and endeavored to gain the window, or the door of the room—once out, my legs would save me. I kept shouting the while, "Murder! murder! Help! help!" Furious—mad—Cheyne flung down the dagger, with his hands seized the chair, and was wrenching it from me, when, just at the right moment, I felt the full bitterness of death, the side-door was opened, and in rushed Lavender and a brother officer—both recognized with a shriek of terror by Cheyne. They also recognized him. "All right," almost shouted Lavender; "this is our man! No nonsense, Parsons."

The fiend-lunatic seemed to have vanished—that was effectually secured and relodged in Bedlam, where he died about three years afterward. It is not, certainly, quite clear that he was one of the murderers of the Mars and Williams families, but the probabilities favor the assumption that he was; and my own conviction upon the point five weeks out born out of me.

THE ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

We are enabled to give in this number three pages of illustrations of the ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI, from sketches by our special artists, Messrs. DAVIS and BARNETT.

On page 385 we reproduce three of Mr. DAVIS's sketches of Corinth. Mr. DAVIS was enabled, through the kindness of the officers, to visit this fine place on the evacuation, and he accordingly introduces us to a GENERAL VIEW OF CORINTH; BRAGG'S HEAD-QUARTERS there, and the JURNEY JUNCTION which gave the point its strategical importance. On page 384 is a very graphic picture, also from a sketch by Mr. DAVIS, showing the ADVANCE OF THE ARMY UNDER GENERAL POPE ENTERING THE REBEL WORKS. This was in all probability the outlaying point of the war in the Southwest, and the sketch therefore possesses historical interest. The picture shows the rude breast-works erected by the enemy for the defense of their position.

We publish on page 391 three illustrations of GENERAL POPE'S ARMY, from sketches by our artist, Mr. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT. FARMINGTON, which is shown in the sketches as this described by a correspondent of the World:

> Farmington, that I write in—that Pope took from the rebels, which they rebel took from Pope, and which they now are not left with, and that we now have securely under our left wing—is a mere mass of ruins, deserted even by its savage-like inhabitants; old, dilapidated, and solitary, situated to the east of Corinth about three miles and a quarter, and to the north of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad some two miles and a half. On the log tree at the cross-roads hard by it is written, "To Pretty 32 Miles." The only sign-board left in Farmington reads, "Hyrtle & Hartle." What manner of wares Hyrtle & Hartle were the disposers of their sign does not signify.
> Farmington is not only utterly and absolutely wanted of its inhabitants, but presents the appearance, moreover, and in, of having been in this state and condition behind the rebel lines.
> Still unsapped, insignificant Farmington, all deserted and ruinous, is yet one of the most delicious spots on earth. I found it so. Here is the first running water in the neighboring hill. The moment you set foot within this delicious ruin, you are struck by the extraordinary and exalted fashion of every thing around you. The whole area is in a grand forest of oak, and yet I venture to assert to presume that Greenwood or Mount Auburn do not equal and outclass the wealth of the forest scenery at at this little rural grave-yard. Old Mortality might find employment here for years. Others will, without doubt, look of experience or the age of the inscriptions, made but of the second fall of Farmington.
> The trees, of pilings that had never known the ordinance of human hands, are of the first order of beauty. I also the rule, shall these but here and there cover from the sight of the passer-by the fact that Farmington has had once looked after it, and that there are fallen trees and overgrown with moss. A deep ravine runs through the town below the cross-roads, and the rude bridges or the tenacious evergreen peps on in testimony of a lovely cove of the time, long ago, when Farmington was while every ten square feet contains a lofty and venerable oak. Two years ago it was more and more verdant than the trees, occupies the centre of the cemetery, and spreads its vast arms in benediction over the graves around them. Some of the graves are surrounded by a small post and rail or iron supporting, and are thickly covered with myrtle or pillin pallage. Most are destitution of designation save a simple wooden head-board, and the graves of several of the dead are circled on marble tombstone.

THE ARMIES OF THE POTOMAC.

We devote the bulk of our pages this week to illustrations of the ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, from sketches by our artists, Messrs. A. R. WARD and WALL.

On page 390 we give a picture, from a sketch by Mr. Ward, of the BATTLE OF MECHANICSVILLE. A small village of that name is made much of therefore they ran toward Richmond; and on page 387 another picture, from a sketch by Mr. Ward, of the retreat forces from the place, from a sketch by Mr. A. R. Ward. The affair is thus described in the correspondence of the Philadelphia Inquirer:

> The morning at daybreak the rebels opened upon the fifth land their artillery from the other side of the bridge. The cavalry and artillery were encamped across the river, and commenced the fight with the enemy without in supporting distance. To our right was a little village called Mechanicsville, on the road to Richmond, a force of four guns commenced to fire said shot; before or was to open fold, and the fight was commenced. Some damage being done in half an hour, or the firing being intermittent, the rebels opened with a battery of eight guns, and a rifle-gun of large calibre. Our artillery replied with York, Colonel J. R. M'Knee; Thirty-third New York, Forty-ninth New York, and Fifth Maine. Our infantry were ordered to take the battery. They at once marched up half a mile, when the rebel infantry were seen drawn up in line of battle in front of the battery. Nowhere but they at once halted and opened fire, which was kept up a terrific fire of canister and shell. It was returned with such a will that in a very few minutes the rebels broke ranks and ran in all directions through the woods. Down went hundreds of rebels, apparently dead. Our troops supposed them cautiously, and found one wounded man by the battery. Our troops then advanced, capturing the killed and wounded were taken away with them with the exception.
> On pages 392 and 393 we publish a picture representing the ENCAMPMENT OF THE ARMY AT CHAMBERLAIN'S, ON THE PAMUNKEY, from a sketch by Mr. Mead, of Vermont. This summary must was a very important point in the line before in this country had so many men of various arms been collected on one plain. The site of the camp itself was one of natural beauty. On the one the river numbers of transports, steamers, and sailing craft, were constantly hovering, bringing up troops and munitions of war. The quiet little stream was never so busy since it first flowed through the forest. Here the commissariat of the army moved forward to the Chickahominy and the front of the battle-field.

On the same pages we illustrate one of the terrible BAYONET CHARGES BY SICKLES'S BRIGADE, in the Battle of Fair Oaks, from a sketch by Wall. The Herald correspondent wrote:

> Now the heavens poured forth a broad along the line of the battle-field. Sickles's brigade, and the brigade of Gen. Hooker, on the right of the day on the ground, and well directed and severe. But it was returned with certainly loud effect, and the enemy's infantry broke from the railroad and fired into the swamp; and now the order to his men was given, and with a loud hurrah Sickles and the men could not at all times keep the line, and were broken by the nature of the ground, but they entered the swamp. Yet still they kept on. Sometimes, waist-deep in water, sometimes on dry ground, but the gallantry of the officers kept the men up to it. This was the first time the rebels had ever fought Sickles's brigade here, by his own gallantry, gave an example that restored the men to their former confidence in their leader, and he and he required two rifle-balls in his right arm, and he was carried to the rear. Still the men kept on, and the rebels broke and fled in confusion, and the swamp was passed up and down the lines on either side, no order could be heard, and no command given. Still the brave officers were compelled to keep ahead in the advance of their men, or they could not lead.
> There was the Irish brigade in all the glory of a fair fore fight. Some of the men were drunk, and fought indifferently, but the only man that really loves it shot down. The regiment suffered severely. Before the trees fails from the old sod, with the chosen Meagher at their head, laughed and shouted as they went. It was a splendid fun in the world. We saw one sitting on the edge of a fallen, with his feet in the water, and his face in his hand, waited too very hot—and he apparently wounded—and we said, "We could not to know if we had ever seen a better Irishman."
> Then Richardson's division the fire spread around to the New Jersey brigade, on the front which the enemy had pushed on for the day before. Soldy did the Jerseymen stand up to their work. Their line was broken, and earnest fell back, through the thick swamp, slowly and steadily. In front the fire was severe, and the men were compelled, but still it told heavily on our brave fellows, though it did not materially check them.
> Still farther to the left was the Excelsior brigade, and General Sumner in person. Here, as on every part of the battle-field, the General had not the air or manner of a novice. He was all activity, and thought only of the way to win.
> Sickles's men apparently lost their patience, and we suppose the officers did, and General Sickles especially. When men advance across a battle-field, loading and firing as they go, they naturally do not go very fast, and the Sickles brigade voted the gait to be decidedly slow. So the order was given to fix bayonets and charge, and they did it not mikingly at all, but in terrible earnest and with a glorious result. Some of the rebels stood to and their places; some stood long enough to fire their pieces, and then ran. Some ran at once. The charge spread away through the woods like so many squirrels.
> The rebels fled in the most opposite direction, for in their wild rush to the rear they rushed to the left of the woods. We didn't see the encampments of our enemy, for, as a matter of right here must follow the Sickles men, so with a wise caution the Sickles brigade was kept in front of the rest of the wood, and told not to pursue; and there it spent its Sunday ready for visitors. Some of the men did go into the rebel encampments that had the enemy threw into the wood over their heads.

On page 396 we reproduce one of Mr. WARD's sketches, representing GENERAL MCCLELLAN RECONNOITRING THE TURNPIKE FROM MECHANICSVILLE TO RICHMOND. He has been within half an hour's ride of the rebel capital for several days! One can easily imagine the feelings with which he must have reconnoitred. A few days more and we will realize the aim of his expedition—On to Richmond!

Lastly, on page 397 we give a picture of the commencement of the BATTLE OF HANOVER COURT HOUSE, from a sketch by our correspondent engaged, which was kindly presented to our artist. We take the following account of the transaction from the Herald correspondence:

> Within about three miles of Hanover Court House the road turns to the left, and to the left there branches off another road which leads to Ashland. It was at this point that the cavalry of the Hanover Court House woods, apparently in force, near the Hanover Road, while at the same time he was drawn up in position near the Ashland Road to the left. General Porter immediately made a proper disposition of his forces, and Colonel Emory's cavalry were speedily placed in position to meet the enemy. Before the cavalry charged, Captain Martin's battery of artillery and shots were exchanged between the opposing forces. At the forks of the road General Martindale was ordered to support Emory. Then the enemy fired a battery, on the left of the telegraph wires, and pull up a portion of the Virginia Central Railroad, between the Peake's Station, and less than half a mile distant, while the Twenty-fifth New York went in front. General Martindale's brigade, consisting of Twenty-second Massachusetts, Colonel Gove, and the Second Maine, Colonel Tilton, to execute the order. The Twenty-second Massachusetts being directed to support the battery of artillery, the Second Maine, accompanied by the artillery in person, skirmishers were thrown out in front and on each side, the remainder of the regiment marching in line of battle behind the battery. The skirmishers soon met the enemy's pickets, and a brisk fire was kept up by this, similar orders were given to the Twenty-fifth. Companies was ordered to the left of the battery, which opened fire shell in the direction in which the enemy were seen, at the same time the Second Maine being thrown to the right to support the skirmishers.
> In the mean time the section of battery was relieved by Captain Martin, and moved between the regiments and opened a vigorous fire on the enemy, while the latter had been engaged with musketry and shell, and now opened quite an artillery engagement. It was subsequently found that the enemy had battery exploded one of the enemy's caissons. The pioneers of the Second Maine were ordered to the right of the wire, which is cut about 12 rails from the railroad track, and, in conjunction with the pioneers of the Twenty-second Massachusetts, tore up the railroad track and destroyed the telegraph wire. The regiments were withdrawn and directed to join the remainder of the brigade, which was halting on Hanover Court House.
> The above operations had transpired on the left the Twenty-fifth New York, in General Martindale's brigade, had been ordered to the front, and marched into the Hanover road. When debouching from the woods, skirmishers were thrown out in front, the enemy opened a vigorous fire of musketry from the woods to the left, about 200 yards distant, which was kept up for about half a day. At this fire Lieutenant-Colonel Savage was wounded in the arm, Lieutenant Elder was killed, and the regiment then advanced through the fields, fired right and left, driving the enemy before them. Some of the rebels broke from their cover and fled in confusion, but the valleys were exchanged. Lieutenant Thompson and four men were wounded by this fire. Advancing through the detachments, the enemy succeeded in cutting off and capturing Lieutenant Colonel Savage and Lieutenant Elder's men. Declare sharp-shooters were incessible engaged. Colonel Johnson, of the Twenty-fifth, then withdrew his small command to give the enemy battle near his reserve, and which was then engaged with the enemy, as the other troops arrived on the ground at this suspicious moment.
> Those troops consisted of a portion of General Butterfield's brigade, which received information from the Commanding General that his troops were required in front, and immediately marched to the support of the Twenty-fifth New York. The first line consisted of the Twenty-eighth New York, Colonel Lansing, on the right, and the Eighty-third Pennsylvania, Colonel Dwight, on the left; and the second, of the Twelfth New York, Colonel Weeks, on the right, and the Sixteenth Michigan, Colonel Stockton, on the left, the two latter regiments being in close column of divisions. A strong force of skirmishers were thrown out in advance. In this order the regiments went through the woods, at the edge of which they were halted till the line was perfectly formed and the position of the enemy ascertained. In the mean time command emerged from the woods, the skirmishers firing in front. The Eighty-third Pennsylvania of the brigade as in charge of the skirmishers, and the vigorous fire of the skirmishers had the effect of driving the enemy from the rebels and the woods, and the Twenty-fifth New York, on the front on the right, took one of the enemy's guns—a brass 12-pounder—which appeared as the most prominent object from the battle-field. Lieutenant-Colonel Morris, of the Twenty-fifth, was wounded in the leg, Lieutenant Hall, one of the Ninety-third, being sick, was requested by the Colonel to take charge of some prisoners who had been taken near Dr. Kenny's house. When the enemy was advancing on the Ashland road Lieutenant Hall with the prisoners took away the captured cannon, which, for the want of horses, could not be taken. Captain Martin's battery, and turned upon the rebels.
> The fire was then opened from now on the ground, and orders were given for the troops to follow, as well in pursuit of the enemy, who was to take the Hanover Ashland station, and participate in the capture action in the vicinity of Hanover Court House. These regiments preserving their first formation still steadily advanced, at shoulder arms, across the extensive fields, over a rough and broken country, for two miles. The enemy, however, occupied the railroad station to the left, where cars of the Virginia Central Railroad were standing, and, abandoning the track, a number of the enemy's tents, and other articles of value, and the Hanover Court House Cavalry, from intelligence was received that the enemy had reappeared in our rear, and orders were given to return.

OUR FLOTILLA IN THE JAMES RIVER.

CITY POINT.

City Point is, or rather has been, the "port of entry" to Petersburg. It is situated on the right bank of the James River, about fifty miles below Richmond. It can hardly be called a town, having at the best of times not more than two or three hundred inhabitants, and these mostly negroes; at present it is almost entirely deserted. Being the terminus of the Petersburg Railroad, the cars frequently arrive, and are met by the United States steamer Massachusetts, both under the charge of effect the exchange of prisoners. It is daily expected that Colonel Corcoran will here be restored to his command.

A letter from City Point says:

> While coming up the river the height of the tide indicated that the banks were not about a foot. The water was very high, and the river presented a most picturesque scene of boats, large pieces of wreck, etc., floating down with the current, and being driven by the force of the current. So strong is the tide that it is with great difficulty a boat keeps off the towns to ever down can reach another higher up the river. Yesterday a vessel's bank, and soon after a schooner, with all the stores, were drafted down, and the corpse of a man floated past, face downward, and legs extended. The corpse was clad in a white shirt and white trousers or drawers. As the face was downward, we could not tell whether the body was that of a white or a black man.
> The appearance of the dead floating on broad boats were not unfrequent, and by the force of the current, and the appearances seem to indicate that the obstructions placed by the rebels across the river from Dutch Gap to the rebels site be gradually washed away by the freshet; but it is exceedingly doubtful whether they will have been so far removed as to admit of the passage of our vessels, so effectually have the rebels driven vessels loads of stone between piles driven into the river, and such large quantities of stones have been sunk between the interstices. The current is threatening and the current in full force, with a rushing sound like that of a waterfall, and there is no doubt that the freshet subsiding for some time.

OH, MY DOVE, WHERE DOST THOU GO?

AN ANSWER TO "MOTHER, CAN I COME?" PUBLISHED IN HARPER'S WEEKLY OF MARCH 29.

Go, my boy, and Heaven bless you! I have read each line
Of your heart's responsive throbbings to a Higher Call
God hath spoken—you have heard Him—and though
Your affection for your mother shall not mar your love
For Him,
Could I but stay those tendrils, when the ever-ruling Hand
Makes your path to duty clearly for the safety of your land?
No! 'tis yours to be a patriot, and 'tis mine to prove us true;
Go, my boy, where duty calls you, and my heart shall follow you!

Go in faith, and feel protection in a Power Supreme, Divine;
Should a bullet pierce your body it will also enter mine.
Should a sabre fall to sever? Then its keen edge I will have severed
Ere it reach your heart. Do you doubt me? Do you doubt me, my brave one?
No, my son; no more than you.
Dear is every pathway where your precious feet have trod;
But I gaze fondly, freely, to my country and my God.
You and I shall never falter in the work we have to do;
Go, my boy, where duty calls you, and my heart shall follow you!

I shall pray for you—how often—with the waking hour of morning,
Through the labors of my household, and when night is coming on.
At evening in prayer can keep you 'mid the dangers you incur,
God will surely bring you back again to happiness and her.
I will not doubt the goodness that has kept you until now,
That has kept the evil from your heart, the shadow from your brow;
And I know I shall keep you in the path you must pursue;
Go, my boy, where duty calls you, and my heart shall follow you!

If my boy were less a hero, less the man in thought and deed
I had less to give my country in her trying hour of need;
And I'm glad to-day in knowing that to serve that land
Divine,
From the hearth-stone more to me than from the mine.
I have loved you from the hour that my first fear pressed your cheek,
Ever tenderly, but never quite as tenderly as now.
I have loved you from the day you, in whatever life into me;
Go, my boy, where duty calls you, and my heart shall follow you!

I shall miss you through the spring-time, when the orchard is in bloom,
When the living face of Nature bathes its beauty in perfume;
When the birds are sweetly singing by the door and on the wing,
I shall miss you where you always loved to pause and hear them sing.
Ever, ever, through the dreary hour through the dreary summer day,
While you fly exposed to dangers on a soil so far away.
But my spirit shall not murmur, though a tear bedim my eye
Go, my boy, where duty calls you, and my heart shall follow you!

You will come and see your mother, come and kiss her, as you say,
From her lips receive the blessing that shall cheer you on the way.
From her fond embrace go forward to resist your country's foe
With the comforting assurance that your mother backs you go.
Heaven protect, and bless, and keep you; holy angels your way,
Keep your spirit from temptation, and your feet from stumbling stay.
To your mother ever faithful, to your country ever true—
Go, my boy, where duty calls you, and my heart shall follow you!

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—CAPTAIN PORTER'S MASSACHUSETTS BATTERY SHELLING THE REBELS ACROSS THE SWOLLEN CHICKAHOMINY.
[SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WARD.]

ACROSS THE CHICKAHOMINY.

WE reproduce above a sketch by Mr. A. R. Ward representing CAPTAIN PORTER'S BATTERY SHELLING THE REBELS ACROSS THE CHICKAHOMINY. The picture gives a good idea of the scenery of the region. Mr. Ward, the author of the picture, thus describes it: "The sketch gives a good idea of the scenery of this stream, flowing through rich, flat meadows, and bordered by a fringe of trees—alns, willows, tulip-trees, etc. From the fields rise gentle hills, partly under cultivation, and in part covered with woods. The Richmond turnpike crosses the streams—or swamp, as the natives call it—upon a bridge near Mechanicsville, which the rebels have burned, and now guard by artillery placed upon the hill. Along the river our pickets are thickly posted, under cover of trees and bushes or in the open fields. Occasionally the artillery posted on the heights commanding the valley fire shot and shell with varying effect upon the enemy's position."

The Tribune correspondent says:

The Chickahominy is the drain of a swamp. The stream is deep, though sluggish. Densely timbered, marshy land fringes it on either bank. The Rebels had gathered enormous reservoirs of water by the use of dams, as a weapon of military offense north of the Richmond and York River Railroad bridge. When the awful rains of last Wednesday and Friday had set every square rod of this part of the peninsula to work to contribute the elements of a flood to the Chickahominy, there was glee in Richmond, and mutual congratulations among military men. They surely reckoned that Bottom Bridge would be afloat, and that on the other side of the swollen stream, wherever McClellan had made passage ways for his troops and his transportation, his artillery would be motionless, bog-deep in the mire, and his trains of ammunition and of food inaccessible, and from 40,000 to 50,000 of the best troops in the army standing useless upon the brink of a river, beyond which the brothers in arms were being crushed in their rush by overwhelming numbers, or driven at the point of the bayonet to death by drowning before their eyes.

On Friday night the reservoirs of accumulated water at the Upper Chickahominy were cut open. On Saturday morning Bottom Bridge was afloat.

The Chickahominy is still a lake.

BETWEEN THE SCENES.

CHRONICLE OF EVENTS: PRESERVED IN CAPTAIN WRAGGE'S DISPATCH BOX.

I.

I have retired into the bosom of my family. We are residing in the secluded village of Ruswarp, on the banks of the Esk, about two miles inland from Whitby. Our lodgings are comfortable, and we possess the additional blessing of a tidy landlady. Mrs. Wragge and Miss Vanstone preceded me here in accordance with the plan I laid down for effecting our retreat from York. On the next day I followed them alone with the luggage. On leaving the terminus, I had the satisfaction of seeing the lawyer's clerk in close confabulation with the detective officer whose advent I had prophesied. I left him in peaceable possession of the city of York, and the whole surrounding neighborhood. He has returned the compliment, and has left us in peaceable possession of the valley of the Esk, thirty miles away from him.

Remarkable results have followed my first efforts at the cultivation of Miss Vanstone's dramatic abilities.

I have discovered that she possesses extraordinary talent as a mimic. She has the flexible face, the manageable voice, and the sharp dramatic perception which fit a woman for character-parts and disguises on the stage. All she now wants is teaching and practice to make her sure of her own resources. The experience of her, thus gained, has revived an idea in my mind, which originally occurred to me at one of the "At Homes" of the late inimitable Charles Mathews, comedian. I was in the Wine Trade at the time I remember. We imitated the Vintage-processes of Nature in a back kitchen at Brompton; and produced a dinner-sherry, pale and curious, tonic in character, round in the mouth, a favorite with the Court of Spain at nineteen and sixpence a dozen, bottles included —Vide Prospectus of the period. The profits of myself and partners were small; we were in advance of the tastes of the age, and in debt to the bottle merchant. Being at my wit's end for want of money, and seeing what audiences Mathews drew, the idea occurred to me of starting an imitation of the great Imitator himself in the shape of an "At Home," given by a woman. The one trifling obstacle in the way was the difficulty of finding the woman. From that time to this I have hitherto failed to overcome it. I have conquered it at last; I have found the woman now. Miss Vanstone possesses youth and beauty as well as talent. Train her in the art of dramatic disguise, provide her with appropriate dresses for different characters, develop her accomplishments in singing and playing, give her plenty of smart talk addressed to the audience, advertise her as A Young Lady at Home, astonish the public by a dramatic entertainment which depends from first to last on that young lady's own sole exertions, commit the entire management of the thing to my care—and what follows, as a necessary consequence? Fame for my fair relative, and a fortune for myself.

I put these considerations, as frankly as usual, to Miss Vanstone, offering to write the Entertainment, to manage all the business, and to share the profits. I did not forget to strengthen my case by informing her of the jealousies she would encounter, and the obstacles she would meet, if she went on the stage. And I wound up by a neat reference to the private inquiries which she is interested in making, and to the personal independence which she is desirous of securing before she acts on her information. "If you go on the stage," I said, "your services will be bought by a manager, and he may insist on his claims just at the time when you want to get free from him. If, on the contrary, you adopt my views, you will be your own mistress and your own manager, and you can settle your course just as you like." This last consideration appeared to strike her. She took a day to consider it, and when the day was over gave her consent.

I had the whole transaction down in black and white immediately. Our arrangement is eminently satisfactory, except in one particular. She shows a morbid distrust of writing her name at the bottom of any document which I present to her; and roundly declares she will sign nothing. As long as it is her interest to provide herself with pecuniary resources for the future, she verbally engages to go on. When it ceases to be her interest, she plainly threatens to leave off at a week's notice. A difficult girl to deal with: she has found out her own value to me already. One comfort is, I have the cooking of the accounts; and my fair relative shall not fill her pockets too suddenly, if I can help it.

My exertions in training Miss Vanstone for the coming experiment have been varied by the writing of two anonymous letters in that young lady's interests. Finding her too fidgety about arranging matters with her friends to pay proper attention to my instructions, I wrote anonymously to the lawyer who is conducting the inquiry after her; recommending him in a friendly way to give it up. The letter was inclosed to a friend of mine in London, with instructions to post it at Charing Cross. A week later I sent a second letter, through the same channel, requesting the lawyer to inform me, in writing, whether he and his clients had or had not decided on taking my advice. I directed him, with jocose reference to the collision of interests between us, to address his letter: "Tit for Tat, Post Office, West Strand."

In a few days the answer arrived—privately forwarded, of course, to Post-office, Whitby, by arrangement with my friend in London.

The lawyer's reply was short and surly: "Sir,—If my advice had been followed, you and your anonymous letter would both be treated with the contempt which they deserve. But the wishes of Miss Magdalen Vanstone's eldest sister have claims on my consideration which I can not dispute; and at her entreaty I inform you that all further proceedings on my part are withdrawn—on the express understanding that this concession is to open facilities for written communication, at least, between the two sisters. A letter from the elder Miss Vanstone is inclosed in this. If I don't hear, in a week's time, that it has been received I shall place the matter once more in the hands of the police.—William Pendril." A sour man, this William Pendril. I can only say of him, what an eminent nobleman once said of his sulky servant—"I wouldn't have such a temper as that fellow has got for any earthly consideration that could be offered me!"

As a matter of course I looked into the letter which the lawyer inclosed before delivering it. Miss Vanstone the elder described herself as distracted at not hearing from her sister; as suited with a governess's situation in a private family; as going into the situation in a week's time; and as longing for a letter to comfort her before she faced the trial of undertaking her new duties. After closing the envelope again, I accompanied the delivery of the letter to Miss Vanstone the younger by a word of caution. "Are you more sure of your own courage now," I said, "than you were when I met you?" She was ready with her answer. "Captain Wragge, when you met me on the Walls of York I had not gone too far to go back. I have gone too far now."

If she really feels this—and I think she does—her corresponding with her sister can do no harm. She wrote at great length the same day, cried profusely over her own epistolatory composition, and was remarkably ill-tempered and snappish toward me when we met in the evening. She wants experience, poor girl—she sadly wants experience of the world. How consoling to know that I am just the man to give it her!

II.

[Chronicle for November.]

We are established at Derby. The Entertainment is written, and the rehearsals are in steady progress. All difficulties are provided for but the one eternal difficulty of money. Miss Vanstone's resources stretch easily enough to the limits of our personal wants; including piano-forte hire for practice, and the purchase and making of the necessary dresses. But the expenses of starting the Entertainment are beyond the reach of any means we possess. A theatrical friend of mine here, whom I had hoped to interest in our undertaking, proves unhappily to be at a crisis in his career. The field of human sympathy, out of which I might have raised the needful pecuniary crop, is closed to me from want of time to cultivate it. I see no other resource left—if we are to be ready by Christmas—than to try one of the local music-sellers in this town, who is said to be a speculating man. A private rehearsal at these lodgings, and a bargain which will fill the pockets of a grasping stranger—such are the sacrifices which dire necessity imposes on me at starting. Well! there is only one consolation. I'll cheat the music-seller.

III.

[Chronicle for December. First Fortnight.]

The music-seller extorts my unwilling respect. He is one of the very few human beings I have met with in the course of my life who is not to be cheated. He has taken a masterly advantage of our helplessness, and has imposed terms on us for performances at Derby and Nottingham, with such a business-like disregard of all interests but his own, that—fond as I am of putting things down in black and white—I really can not prevail upon myself to record the bargain. It is needless to say I have yielded with my best grace, sharing with my fair relative the wretched pecuniary prospects offered to us. Our turn will come. In the mean time I cordially regret not having known the local music-seller in early life.

Personally speaking, I have no cause to complain of Miss Vanstone. We have arranged that she shall regularly forward her address (at the post-office) to her friends as we move about from place to place. Besides communicating in this way with her sister, she also reports herself to a certain Mr. Clare, residing in Somersetshire, who is to forward all letters exchanged between herself and his son. Careful inquiry has informed me that this latter individual is now in China. Having suspected from the first that there was a gentleman in the back-ground, it is highly satisfactory to know that he recedes into the remote perspective of Asia. Long may he remain there!

The trifling responsibility of finding a name for our talented Magdalen to perform under has been cast on my shoulders. She feels no interest whatever in this part of the subject. "Give me any name you like," she said; "I have as much right to one as to another. Make it yourself." I have readily consented to gratify her wishes. The resources of my commercial library include a list of useful names to assume; and we can choose one at five minutes' notice, when the admirable man of business who now oppresses us is ready to issue his advertisements. On this point my mind is easy enough: all my anxieties centre in the fair performer. I have not the least doubt she will do wonders if she is only left to herself on the first night. But if the day's post is mischievous enough to upset her by a letter from her sister, I tremble for the consequences.

IV.

[Chronicle for December. Second Fortnight.]

My gifted relative has made her first appearance in public, and has laid the foundation of our future fortunes.

On the first night the attendance was larger than I had ventured to hope. The novelty of an evening's Entertainment, conducted from beginning to end by the unaided exertions of a young lady (see advertisement), roused the public curiosity, and the seats were moderately well filled. As good-luck would have it, no letter addressed to Miss Vanstone came that day. She was in full possession of herself until she got the first dress on and heard the bell ring for the music. At that critical moment she suddenly broke down. I found her alone in the waiting-room, sobbing and talking like a child. "Oh, poor papa! poor papa! Oh, my God, if he saw me now!" My experience in such matters at once informed me that it was a case for sal-volatile, accompanied by sound advice. We strung her up, in no time, to concert pitch, set her eyes in a blaze, and made her outblush her own rouge. The curtain rose when we had got her at a red heat. She dashed at it, exactly as she dashed at it in the back drawing-room at Rosemary Lane. Her personal appearance settled the question of her reception before she opened her lips. She rushed full gallop through her changes of character, her songs, and her dialogue; making mistakes by the dozen, and never stopping to set them right; carrying the people along with her in a perfect whirlwind, and never waiting for the applause. The whole thing was over twenty minutes sooner than the time we had calculated on. She carried it through to the end, and fainted on the waiting-room sofa a minute after the curtain was down. The music-seller having taken leave of his senses from sheer astonishment, and I having no evening costume to appear in, we sent the doctor to make the necessary apology to the public, who were calling for her till the place rang again. I prompted our medical orator with a neat speech from behind the curtain; and I never heard such applause, from such a comparatively small audience, before in my life. I felt the tribute—I felt it deeply. Fourteen years ago I scraped together the wretched means of existence, in this very town, by reading the newspaper (with explanatory comments) to the company at a public house. And now here I am at the top of the tree.

It is needless to say that my first proceeding was to bowl out the music-seller on the spot. He called the next morning, no doubt with a liberal proposal for extending the engagement beyond Derby and Nottingham. My niece was described as not well enough to see him; and, when he asked for me, he was told I was not up. I happened to be, at that moment, engaged in putting the case pathetically to our gifted Magdalen. Her answer was in the highest degree satisfactory. She would permanently engage herself to nobody—least of all to a man who had taken sordid advantage of her position and mine. She would be her own mistress, and share the profits with me, while she wanted money, and while it suited her to go on. So far so good. But the reason she added next for her flattering preference of myself was less to my taste. "The music-seller is not the man whom I employ to make my inquiries," she said. "You are the man." I don't like her steadily remembering those inquiries in the first bewilderment of her success. It looks ill for the future; it looks infernally ill for the future.

V.

She has shown the cloven foot already. I begin to be a little afraid of her.

On the conclusion of the Nottingham engagement (the results of which more than equaled the results at Derby), I proposed taking the Entertainment next—now we had got it into our own hands—to Newark. Miss Vanstone raised no objection until we came to the question of time, when she amazed me by stipulating for a week's delay before we appeared in public again.

"For what possible purpose?" I asked.

"For the purpose of making the inquiries which I mentioned to you at York," she answered.

I instantly enlarged on the danger of delay, putting all the considerations before her in every imaginable form. She remained perfectly immovable. I tried to shake her on the question of expenses. She answered by handing me over her share of the proceeds at Derby and Nottingham—and there were my expenses paid at the rate of nearly two guineas a day. I wonder who first picked out a mule as the type of obstinacy? How little knowledge that man must have had of women!

There was no help for it. I took down my instructions in black and white as usual. My first exertions were to be directed to the discovery of Mr. Michael Vanstone's address: I was also expected to find out how long he was likely to live there, and whether he had sold Combe-Raven or not. My next inquiries were to inform me of his ordinary habits of life; of what he did with his money; of who his intimate friends were; and of the sort of terms on which his son, Mr. Noel Vanstone, was now living with him. Lastly, the investigations were to end in discovering whether there was any female relative, or any woman exercising domestic authority in the house, who was known to have an influence over either father or son.

If my long practice in cultivating the field of human sympathy had not accustomed me to private investigations into the affairs of other people, I might have found some of these queries rather difficult to deal with in the course of a week. As it was, I gave myself all the benefit of my own experience; and brought the answers back to Nottingham in a day less than the given time. Here they are, in regular order, for convenience of future reference:

(1.) Mr. Michael Vanstone is now residing at German Place, Brighton, and likely to remain there, as he finds the air suit him. He reached London, from Switzerland, in September last; and sold the Combe-Raven property immediately on his arrival.

(2.) His ordinary habits of life are secret and retired; he seldom visits or receives company. Part of his money is supposed to be in the funds, and part laid out in railway investments which have survived the panic of eighteen hundred and forty-six, and are rapidly rising in value. Since his arrival in England, he has also speculated with great judgment in house property. He has some houses in remote parts of London; and some houses in certain watering-places on the East coast, which are shown to be advancing in public repute. In all these cases he is reported to have made remarkably good bargains.

(3.) It is not easy to discover who his intimate friends are. Two names only have been ascertained. The first is Admiral Bartram; supposed to have been under friendly obligations, in past years, to Mr. Michael Vanstone. The second is Mr. George Bartram, nephew of the Admiral, and now staying on a short visit in the house at German Place. Mr. George Bartram is the son of the late Mr. Andrew Vanstone's sister, also deceased. He is therefore a cousin of Mr. Noel Vanstone's. This last—viz., Mr. Noel Vanstone—is in delicate health, and is living on excellent terms with his father in German Place.

(4.) There is no female relative in Mr. Michael Vanstone's family circle. But there is a housekeeper, who has lived in his service ever since his wife's death, and who has acquired a strong influence over both father and son. She is a native of Switzerland, elderly, and a widow. Her name is Mrs. Lecount.

On placing these particulars in Miss Vanstone's hands she made no remark, except to thank me. I endeavored to invite her confidence. No results; nothing but a renewal of civility, and a sudden shifting to the subject of the Entertainment. Very good. If she won't give me the information I want, the conclusion is obvious—I must help myself.

Business considerations claim the remainder of this page. Let me return to business.

VI.

Practice has now given my fair relative the confidence which I predicted would come with time. Her knack of disguising her own identity in the impersonation of different characters so completely staggers her audiences that the same people come twice over to find out how she does it. It is the amiable defect of the English public never to know when they have had enough of a good thing. They actually try to encore one of her characters—an old north-country lady—modeled on that honored preceptress in the late Mr. Vanstone's family to whom I presented myself at Combe-Raven. This particular performance fairly amazes the people. I don't wonder at it. Such an extraordinary assumption of age by a girl of nineteen has never been seen in public before in the whole course of my theatrical experience.

I find myself writing in a lower tone than usual; I miss my own dash of humor. The fact is, I am depressed about the future. In the very height of our prosperity, my perverse pupil sticks to her trumpery family quarrel. I feel myself at the mercy of the first whim in the Vanstone direction which may come into her head—I, the architect of her fortunes. Too bad; upon my soul, too bad!

She has acted already on the inquiries which she forced me to make for her. She has written two letters to Mr. Michael Vanstone.

To the first letter no answer came. To the second a reply was received. Her infernal cleverness put an obstacle I had not expected in the way of my intercepting it. Later in the day, after she had herself opened and read the answer, I laid another trap for her. It just succeeded, and no more. I had half a minute to look into the envelope in her absence. It contained nothing but her own letter returned. It was not the girl to put up quietly with such an insult as this. Mischief will come of it. He wrote to Michael Vanstone—which is of no earthly consequence; mischief to me—which is a truly serious matter.

VII.

[Chronicle for March.]

After performing at Sheffield and Manchester, we have moved to Liverpool, Preston, and Lancaster. Another change in this weather-cock of a girl! She has written no more letters to Michael Vanstone,and she has become as anxious to make money as I am myself. We are realizing profits, and we are worked to death. I don't like this change in her: she has a purpose to answer, or she would not show such extraordinary eagerness to fill her purse. Nothing I can do—no cooking of accounts, no self-protected sentimentalism—can keep that purse empty. The success of the Entertainment, and her own sharpness in looking after her interests, literally force me into a course of compensating economy. She puts into her pocket more than a third of the profits, in defiance of my most arduous assertions to prevent her. And this at my age! this after my long and successful career as a moral agriculturist! Marks of admiration have very little things; but they express my feelings, and I put them in freely.

VIII.

We have visited seven more large towns, and are now at Birmingham. Consulting my Books, I find that Miss Vanstone has realized by the Entertainment, up to this time, the enormous sum of nearly four hundred pounds. It is quite possible that my own profits may amount to one miserable hundredth more. But I am the architect of her fortunes—the publisher, so to speak, of her books—and of my fitting I am undespaid.

I made the above discovery on the twentieth of the month—anniversary of the Restoration of my royal predecessor in the field of human sympathy, Charles the Second. I had just finished locking up my dispatch-box when the ungrateful girl whose reputation I have made came into the room, and told me in the plainest words that the business-connection between us was for the present at an end.

I attempt no description of my own sensations: I merely record facts. She informed me, with as apparently perfect composure as if she had decided rest, and that she had "new objects in view." She might plainly want me to assist those objects; and she might possibly return to the Entertainment. In either case it would be enough if we exchanged addresses, and that we could write to each other in case of need. Having no desire to leave me so abruptly, she would remain the next day (which was Sunday), and would take her departure on Monday morning. Such was her explanation in her own words.

Remonstrance, as I knew by experience, would be thrown away. Authority I had none to exert. My one sensible course was to take in this emergency was to find out which way my own interests pointed, and to go that way without a moment's unnecessary hesitation.

A very little reflection has since convinced me that she has got a decisive purpose in view—and Vanstone in view. She is young, handsome, clever, and unscrupulous: she has a strong desire to live on, and has time at her disposal to find out the weak side of an old man; and she is going to attack Mr. Michael Vanstone unarmed with the legitimate weapons of her sex. As she likely to start so far such a purpose as this? Doubtful. Is she merely anxious to get rid of me on easy terms? Probable. Am I the sort of man to be treated in this way by a young simpleton? Decidedly not: I am the man to see my way through a neat succession of alternatives; and here they are:

First alternative. To announce my compliance with her proposal: to exchange addresses with her; and then to keep my eye privately on all her future movements. Second alternative. To express fond anxiety as a paternal capacity; and to threaten giving the alarm to her sister and the lawyer if she persists in her intention. Third alternative. To turn the information I already possess to the best account, by making it a marketable commodity between Mr. Michael Vanstone and myself. At present, I incline toward the last of these alternatives; but my own decision is far too important to be hurried. To-day is only the twenty-ninth. I will suspend my Chronicle of Events until Monday.

May 31.—My alternatives and her plans are both overthrown together.

The newspaper came in, as usual, after breakfast. I looked it over, and discovered a remarkable entry, among the obituary announcements of the day:

"On the 29th inst., at Brighton, Michael Vanstone, Esq., formerly of Zurich, aged 77."

Miss Vanstone was present in the room when I read those two startling lines. Her bonnet was on; her gloves were packed; she was waiting impatiently until it was time to go to the train. I handed the paper to her without a word on my side, but without a word on hers, she looked at it, pointed, and read the news of Michael Vanstone's death.

The paper dropped out of her hand; and she suddenly pulled down her veil. I caught one glance at her face before she hid it from me. The effect on my mind was startling in the extreme. To put it with my customary dash of humor—her face informed me that the most valuable action which Michael Vanstone, Esq., formerly of Zurich, had ever achieved in his life, was the action he performed at Brighton on the 29th instant.

Finding the dead silence in the room singularly unpleasant under existing circumstances, I thought I would make a remark. My regard for my own interests supplied me with a subject. I mentioned the Entertainment.

"After what has happened," I said, "I presume we go on with our performances as usual?"

"No," she answered, behind the veil. "We go on with my inquiries."

"Inquiries after a dead man?"

"Inquiries after the dead man's son."

"Mr. Noel Vanstone?"

"Yes; Mr. Noel Vanstone."

Not having a veil to let down over my own face, I stooped and picked up the newspaper. Her devilish determination quite upset me for the moment. I actually had to steady myself before I could speak with composure.

"Are the new inquiries as harmless as the old ones?" I asked.

"Quite as harmless."

"What am I expected to find out?"

"I wish to know where Mr. Noel Vanstone remains at Brighton after the funeral."

"And if you succeed?"

"If not, I shall want to know his new address, wherever it may be."

"Yes. And next?"

"I wish you to find out next if all the father's money goes to the son."

I began to see my drift. The word money relieved me: I felt quite on my own ground again.

"Any thing more?" I asked.

"Only one thing more," she answered. "Make sure, if you please, whether Mrs. Lecount, his housekeeper, remains or not in Mr. Noel Vanstone's service."

Her voice relaxed a little as she mentioned Mrs. Lecount's name: she is evidently sharp enough to distrust the housekeeper already.

"Your expenses are to be paid as usual?" I said.

"As usual."

"When am I expected to leave for Brighton?"

"As soon as you can."

She rose and left the room. After a momentary doubt I decided on executing the new commission. The more private inquiries I conduct for my fair relative the harder she will find it to get rid of hers truly, Horatio Wragge.

P.S.—I propose to prevent my starting for Brighton to-morrow. So to-morrow I go. If Mr. Noel Vanstone succeeds to his father's property he is the only human being possessed of pecuniary blessings who fails to give me with a feeling of unmitigated envy.

BUNKER HILL.

JUNE 17.

OUR patriot's name is on our lips,
Who fell before the foe,
Upon the field of Bunker Hill
Eighty-six years ago.
His dying words we say again,
Still thinking of our heroes slain.

We have seen many a brave one fall
Since we took up the sword:
Not dreaming how much blood would flow
Ere peace should be restored.
We should not dare to count our dead
But for those words that Warren said.

Then raise the Stars and Stripes to-day,
Now England, over thee!
Lift up the land—one more give out
The watch-word of the free!
Whene'er our country's foes are nigh,
'Tis yours—'tis hers—and for her to die!

Ay, wheresoever floats our flag
Beloved of Freedom still,
Let all her brave defenders shout,
"Remember Bunker Hill!"
"Our country calls"—'tis ours to try
How sweet it is for her to die!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SHALL WE CUT OFF OUR NOSES?

CONGRESS and the Administration of Mr. Lincoln seem to be traveling in a direction which must lead to mischief. In the Act passed by Congress for the collection of taxes in insurrectionary districts, a portion of the revenues to be derived from lands seized under the Act is to be appropriated for the purpose of exporting emancipated negroes to Hayti or Central America. This Act passed by Congress, or by one branch of the national legislature, indicates a similar purpose to expatriate the negroes as soon as they are freed. Mr. Lincoln has expressed the opinion that colonization should go hand in hand with emancipation, and Judge Montgomery Blair, a leading member of his Cabinet, has emphatically pronounced against abolition without colonization. The purpose of these statements and of the present Congress evidently to get rid of the negroes as speedily as possible, and at whatever cost.

We wish to keep within bounds; but we think the future historian of the period in which we live will be somewhat embarrassed to decide which was the more insane, the conspiracy of Jeff Davis to divide the Union, or the efforts of the loyal Government to deprive the country of labor.

If there is one thing which we in these United States need, it is raw labor. We have a country of boundless magnitude and unequaled fertility. We have an excellent system of government, and every natural element of wealth. Millions of acres of the best agricultural land in the world lie idle for want of hands to till them. Countless mines of coal, iron, lead, copper, silver, and gold await the hand of man to yield their produce. Factories of all kinds are grievously wanted in almost every State of the Union, yet we are established far west of labor. There is no country in the world in which labor is so much wanted, and is so highly paid as here. In the South we pay unskilled laborers on the average four times as high wages as they can command in Europe, and eight times as much as they command in Asia. In the South, the demand for labor has raised the price of slaves 400 per cent. in a generation. Our whole legislation, for half a century, has been an expression of the popular demand for "more men." In the free States we have strained every nerve to encourage immigration from Europe. We have offered our public lands at nominal prices, and granted rights to squatters which enabled the veriest paupers to acquire homesteads. We have offered the privileges of full citizenship to every man who lived here five years, and in some States no even better time than that. When we have pitted Germans and Irishmen, because we wanted their thews and sinews; we have framed our debtor and creditor laws so as to assist the needy; we have frowned down discussions of race and faith; we have done every thing, in fact, which could possibly be done to attract to the country men of every race and of every grade in society. So at the South. There the want of labor has been so keenly felt that the character of a century the labor question which, in that section, takes the name of the slavery question, has been that, still, the only question of the day. Deprived, by United States law, of the right of recruiting their supply of labor by immigration, the leading minds of the South have been exclusively devoted for twenty-five years to fostering its development at home. Virginia, Maryland, and Kentucky—which, had their own interests alone been consulted, would long ago have been free States—have been kept in the slave ranks because the great producing States of the South could not dispense with the annual supply of raw labor derived from thence. One by one all other political issues at the South have given place to the vital question of labor. This question at last, in 1860–'61, became so overwhelmingly paramount; the want of labor grew so imperative that the leading Southern States actually sought to arrest the monetary drain in the hope of escaping from the dangers which menaced their supply of labor, and of attending thoroughly to emigration from Africa. In the words of one of the leading conspirators:

"Cotton is King: when we have achieved our independence, we shall say to England, 'Open out the slave-trade we can not grow cotton.' The Europeans will demur at first, but finally they will acquiesce, and will then receive more negroes from Africa than the North receives white laborers from Europe."

It must hardly escape the eye in view of these facts, these necessities, and this policy uniformly pursued both by the North and by the South for more than a quarter of a century, that labor must be gravely proposed by any person of responsibility deliberately to give away, or to pay for the privilege of getting rid of it, is a thing too absurd to be much, and which we have striven for so many years and at such sacrifices to procure.

Other nations have done so. Denmark offers to take all our contrabands off our hands and guarantee their well-being on the island of Santa Cruz. Hayti offers to the same end to take all the contrabands at Fortress Monroe, and feed and clothe them at her expense there until they could be transported to the Dominican Republic. Jamaica has begged at intervals, for six years, the privilege of being allowed to relieve us of some of our blacks, who, according to our leading papers and some of our politicians, are such a nuisance. Venezuela is our earnest suitor for some of the same kind of help that we seek to get rid. Other nations have, in various ways, testified their perfect willingness to receive the freedmen which we appear so anxious to throw away. These regions—the Danish and British West Indies, Hayti, Venezuela, etc.,—know what we do not, the value of labor. They have suffered acutely from the disease of which we have merely had premonitory twinges and distempers. They know what it is to see noble estates and gorgeous valleys abandoned to wild beasts, birds, and weeds, away from every trace of man.

An account of the efforts which have been made, within the past ten years only, by France, England, and Spain, to supply their colonies with labor without shocking the moral sense of Christianity, would form a useful and valuable historical volume. From the coast of Africa in Senegal, laid on lines of packets, and exhausted ingenuity in efforts to seduce negroes to the plantation on Reunion, Martinique, Guadeloupe, Marie-Galante, and Guiana; England has kidnapped coolies in Hindostan, and winked at the kidnapping of others in China; and Spain, with seven or eight thousand miles across the water, and planted them in Trinidad, Guiana, etc., under the name of apprentices, without changing in their physical and moral nurture, for their apprenticeship, and subsequent wages, and finally, for their return, if they should wish to go back to their country. Thus far the labor secured by these elaborate and expensive schemes has been a mere drop in the bucket, but it is a steady bucket and more piercing than ever, from all these tropical countries—the natural garden and granary of the world—for more men, more men, more men!

If Mr. Blair and his friends should carry out their present purposes, and expatriate a portion of our negroes from the Southern States to the West Indies and Central America, those foreign islands and States would be the last which we could count a place in history would then become prosperous and rich, and our Southern States which, for many years, have clothed and fed one hundred hundreds of millions annually to our national wealth, would sink into the condition of Jamaica, Venezuela, and Hayti. Nothing is more certain to be reversed. It would be this country which would fill the air with cries for labor: and it would be the tropical islands and the negroes . . . and which would claim to be the seat of commercial empire.

This matter of getting rid of the laborers at the South because their skin is black is merely a revival of the old prejudices of race which induced so many European nations in former centuries to enact penal laws against Jews and heretics. When Louis XIV. of France revoked the Edict of Nantes, and drove into exile many thousand of the best people of his country to America, England, and Belgium, he acted on precisely the same principle which Mr. Blair exercises to-day. Prejudice, in every case, is the parent of folly and of crime. Had the Constitutional Convention of the State of Illinois, following the example of Indiana, prohibited negro immigration within the borders of the State. The white people of the United States will not live side by side with black men as their equals."

The original of this doctrine may be found in any history of England. The sentiments of Mr. Blair are precisely those which the Norman Conquerors of England expressed when the Saxons clearly first claimed civil and political rights. In fact, it has been the sentiment of every dominant race in every country at every time when its domination was called in question. When the French Revolution cut down the old servility to a level with the people, the Marquises and Counts declared that it was utterly impossible that they could live side by side with their former equals. If they had had the power, they would have proposed to export the vassals just as Mr. Blair wants to export our negroes: simply because they are in a decided minority that it was cheaper to export themselves; and they did so. But their children have completely grown up side with the progeny of the vassals.

We have got, in this world, from the cradle to the grave, to go on unloosing prejudices, acquiring toleration. Every one of us can put his finger on some wrong which he patiently tolerates, though at one time he considered it perfectly intolerable. Every one has learned to live with people whose society he at one time deemed incompatible with happiness and even existence. Every man, as he grows old, acquires the capacity of submitting to petty inconveniences which, in his youth, he would have died rather than endured. So with nations. Our weakness, in our present national childhood, is that we do not like to tolerate negroes except as slaves. We can't bear them. We don't want them in our houses. We won't meet them in public assemblies or eat with them in our eating rights whatever, except the bare right of living and working for us, sometimes for wages, generally without. Common sense rather than a canjoy the rights of manhood, say Mr. Blair and his friends, we had better part with that labor which has been the source of half our past prosperity, and without which the fairest portions of this continent would relapse into a wilderness, the abode of wild beasts and savages.

We have got, North as well as South, to unlearn this silly, unchristian nonsense. It is our destiny, in the history of the world, to show how educated and humane people can rise superior to prejudices which have proved an insuperable obstacle to the highest pleasures of life in the tropic Islands. It is our business to demonstrate that two races which have lived peacefully and prosperously side by side under a system which was a compound of the most brutal selfishness, the basest cruelty, and the most outrageous injustice, can get along at least as well when the selfishness, cruelty, and injustice are replaced by humanity, kindness, and fair-dealing. No race but the American could appreciate the value of the American nation can have ways for the result.

THE LOUNGER.

POLITICAL "GAS."

WHENEVER a vigorous military measure is proposed there is a cry from certain people and papers that the war is for the maintenance of the Constitution and the Union—you-know. Certainly it is; but what then? What is the Union-as-it-was? It is the union of the people living in thirty-four States under one supreme national government, which by the Constitution-as-it-is is empowered to levy obedience to its authority from every citizen of the land, by military force if necessary.

That is what the Government is doing. This war is the effort of the Government to reduce armed rebels to its authority. By the Constitution-as-it-is the Government is empowered to use its military power to suppress insurrection. When the last military force of the rebels has laid down its hands, and confronted by hundreds of thousands of armed rebels, when bloody battles are fought, cities taken, and a rebel blockade established, there is war between the Government and the insurgents, but we do not use the word enemies, and who are to be subdued by every means known to war.

When the Government acts under the clause of the Constitution which authorizes the temporary suspension of the rebellion, all constitutional rights inconsistent with a state of war are suspended. For instance, the clause of the United States which is a constitutional immunity against the taking of his life by the Government, except after due process of law; meaning indictment, trial, etc. But the Government took the life of Sydney Johnson, at Shiloh, without any indictment or trial whatever. Was it as unconstitutional act? Not at all. It was perfectly constitutional as the hanging of Gordon. For the Constitution-as-it-is authorizes the use of military measures, after due warning, as much as military measures are ever authorized, and when the Union-as-it-was is restored, every citizen who has not lost his life by military necessity will enjoy all the civil guarantees for it.

And so with whatever else may fall within the scope of military necessity. By the late law passed in the House our army is to be fed at the expense of the rebels. Every citizen has a right to his own property, but the grain and the cattle of the rebels will be peremptorily seized and appropriated to the use of the Government wherever they are needed in the Constitutional Convention of the State of Illinois, following the example of Indiana, prohibits negro immigration within the borders of the State. The white people of the United States will not live side by side with black men as their equals."

it. Does that interfere with the Union-as-it-was? No; it is simply an integral part of the necessary operations to restore the Union-as-it-was. In like manner, the slaves of every rebel who has been used against the Government are liberated. Does that interfere with the Union-as-it-was? Not at all. It is only part of the constitutional means necessary to restore the Union-as-it-was.

By-and-by it may become necessary to summon all loyal people to the defense of the Government, and to levy a tax for the purpose. Will that interfere with the Union-as-it-was? Not at all; it will be only another blow which may be constitutionally struck at the rebellion. It is true that in the Union-as-it-was there were slaves and a Fugitive Slave Law, and slavery was in the District of Columbia. But when the war is over, if it ends to-morrow, the Union-as-it-was is lawfully there. Must the Declaration likewise be re-enacted, lest otherwise we shall not have the Union-as-it-was? The Declaration of the American Government clearly fulfills the purposes for which it was expressly created, and every man assigns it this Government—if open to any doubt which the Declaration of Independence declares to be given that Government—if open to any doubt which the Declaration of Independence declares to be given by God's gift upon the continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the crack of the liberty-bell heard no more, and universal peace and prosperity reign, as they will, like red and white roses from these bright trees of June, will it be the wrest and slaves of the nation?

No, and forever no! It will be the Union-as-it-was in the very intent and words of the father, the Union-as-it-was meant by the God in the Unity, by God's blessing, as the children of those fathers mean it shall be.

AN EVENING AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

THERE was lately an unheralded début at the opera. It was that of a singer entirely unknown to New York. He was a young Frenchman in Lucresa, and who sang the part as it has not been sung here since Grisi.

It seems, according to the bill of the play, that Mr. Ullman, the manager, had promised the public a benefit for every evening of opera. They were to be directed by Mr. Grau, who, for some reason, on the twenty-four which Mr. Ullman was absent in Europe, was the return of that gentleman he was not upon the wharf by the astounding intelligence that his six months' salary was paid due to the Public. He was overwhelmed with amazement. He had heard, of course, nothing of it. It was shameful. Such news at a time. He must make reparation.

He therefore hastily prepared a programme of six nights. The best opera company in the country, Gottschalk and Hermann, were all to appear, and the first night was to be "for the use to the public," said the ingenuous Ullman. "I am nothing, and I have no use for the use for my private advantage. I must sacrifice at fifty cent admission." He said in the bills that the performances would be under the "sole direction." That was a mistake springing from his Parisian habits. For an opera manager in this country there has to be one chief, and that chief is the way to come in.

The manager's self-sacrifice was rewarded. The evening came, and so did the crowd. The hous was overflowing. It is not for any Lounger to inquire whether the receipts equaled fifty cents each in the cash-box, because a strict survey of the situation forbids that supposition. But in consequence persuade the Lounger that the hands which just behind him clapped violently upon the last chance had paid any more than the fee for the price of entrance. These hands literally worked their way in. The manager was not swindled in the transaction.

Was there any swindling at all?—say in the matter of the performance? Not at all. It was a splendid, but only prestidigitation. Mr. Ullman is a theatrical prestidigitator. You pay fifty cents unless you are a free-and-easy sort of Lounger. Yes you also fifty cents to go to Albany by the steamer. And you pay fifty or a hundred dollars more to go a berth or a state-room. It is an extremely ingenious prestidigitation, whereby the admission is fifty cents, but every body pays at least a dollar. The excellent Herald calls Mr. Ullman a "Napoleon." But he is at the bottom of the bill of the play you will see why.

But the house was full, and what electricity it did house! The first night was to be a grand one with after the first five minutes of the opera. Dazzling dashing across the stage—the most beautiful of Ormisti—had given the performance an impetus which was felt until the end. How romantic the opera is! How fantastic and the Italian gaiety—the revelry—the gay costumes—the mysterious city—the gondola—the masked lady! The mysterious lady in Lucresa Borgia! She is clad in red velvet with a black mantilla. She moves in mystery and disappears.

In interesting variety of action and of genuine tragic intensity no Italian opera is so striking as Lucresa Borgia. And in the other and more material sense so truly a master. Certainly in no other of his is the scenery so various a few and so beautiful and delightful melody. The debutante, Mr. Ullman hid ill in the hill, had just emerged from a brilliant career in New Orleans. The Lounger says that would not have counted here. But her admirable conception of her character—her fine delicacy—her conception of her delineation—her pure, supple, and flexible voice, and her polished and exquisite vocalization, showed her to be the only one of excellent lyrical artist we have had since La Grange, and in many points—as repose and largeness of style—she is superior to La Grange.

The audience was cool, but evidently not that Madame Borchard was satisfactory and successful. Why then was it cool? Simply because she was not known. Had her personal equation been well known, the cool would have had a warm-shaking enthusiasm. Yet to an old stager (for there were doubtless such in the house) it must have been consoling to remember, as some of her really fine points passed unrecognized, that la diva, Grisi herself, had endured the same reception in the same house.

Between the first and second acts Mr. Gottschalk prestidigitated upon the piano; and between the second and third Mr. Hermann upon handkerchiefs and huge rings. Each was a most perfect and most elegant legerdemain. Certainly neither Thalberg nor Liszt could do such wonders at the key-board as Gottschalk; and in the simpler passages there is a clear, sonorous precision in his playing which almost rivals Thalberg. It is inconceivable that any one should do more with the piano than he does. Yet doubtless we always interpret the character of piano-playing by our knowledge of the player. If we know him to be imaginative, generous, creative, simple, we find these qualities in his performance. If we think him shallow, conceited, sensual, then that is all heard at the instrument. The mere skill of the two players may be almost indistinguishable; but the spirit and effect of their performance are as different as simplicity and conceit.

Hermann is a master. He ought to wear a red skull-cap with a cock's feather. Then he would look the mysterious Mephisto he is.

MORE MEN.

That a nation entirely unused to war should make mistakes was most natural. But we have made but one serious, and that by no means irretrievable, mistake in ours. That was in declining the service of any man who offered. We have never had men enough. Perhaps we have had as many men as arms. But we might have had large reserve camps of drilled soldiers to supply the vacant places of the various divisions; and arms can be procured easier than skilled men, many and willing as they are.

It is not that we have not men enough to defeat the enemy, but we want to defeat them overwhelmingly and finally. M'Dowell and M'Clellan should have been reinforced without weakening Banks. His retreat, although masterly in itself and in no way disastrous, still lengthens the war. Hunter may capture Charleston, but more men would have made it easier. M'Clellan will probably take Richmond, but with fifty thousand more men the immediate capture would have had a moral effect in weakening the rebellion and in shortening the war, which it can not now have.

Of course it is easy to say "more men." But we shall be reminded that armies cost money. That is true; but in war speed is cheapness. A man will readily pay a dollar more fare if he can go to a place, transact his business, and return the same day, for he saves a dollar in his lodging. The nation is ready and willing to put down the rebellion speedily, at any cost, because it knows that cost now is saving in the end. Vallandigham and Co. talk about the extravagance of the Government because they want to paralyze our military operations by frightening people with the expense already incurred. The truth is, as a friend expresses it, "The People meant to finish up this war in one campaign, and they are ready to do every thing that is required for the purpose, and it will be the fault of our generals (political as well as military) if it be not done."

MR. COLLYER.

In their late eagerness to prejudice the public mind, the newspapers which think that the valuable and lovely thing in American institutions is not liberty but slavery incessantly spoke of Mr. Collyer as Doctor Collyer or the Reverend Mr. Collyer. The intention was to make him appear a penniless missionary, a needy clerical adventurer, or impracticable visionary.

The truth is that Mr. Collyer is an artist of this city of great repute as a crayon draughtsman among all who are interested in art. His penciled female heads in past Academy Exhibitions have been justly among the most noted and admired. Just before the beginning of the war made upon this Government in the interest of slavery, Mr. Collyer, who is richer than many of his brethren of the pencil, was proposing to visit Europe with his family. But fortunately his wealth is not of one kind only. Hearing the call of his country upon all her children, and looking to see how he could most effectively serve her, he resolved to devote himself to the care of the soldiers.

It was in pursuance of this humane and patriotic duty that he was in North Carolina. The instruction of the friendless colored people was a service not less humane and patriotic, and he readily united that with his other cares. Like the noble Colonel Howland, of the 16th regiment of this State, who willingly turned away from all the ease and delight which wealth, cultivation, taste, and a generous soul secured, and whose late gift of a thousand dollars to the Sanitary Commission was but a single drop in the ample offering he has made to his country, Mr. Collyer is no fanatical enthusiast, or well-meaning inefficient brother, but an American gentleman, who gives his time, his labor, his talent, and his money, to the great cause of human liberty and enlightenment to which this Government was consecrated, for which it is struggling, and which is instinctively the cause of every gentleman in the land.

THE SANITARY SHIP.

The noble work of the Sanitary Commission is deeply appreciated by the country. Its services to our soldiers have been invaluable. Its energy, faithfulness, and comprehensiveness in doing its work are among the most grateful and hallowed events of the war. Nor has the practical public recognition been either slow or niggardly. A great many thousand dollars have been gladly contributed, while loyal hands of innumerable women and children have been busily toiling to aid its work.

In expectation of the increased sickness of the season and of the crowds of wounded and suffering whom the imminent battle before Richmond will throw into its charge, as well as to provide still ampler accommodation for those already under its care, the Sanitary Commission has fitted up the first-class clipper ship St. Marks as a floating hospital or a transport for the sick and wounded, to be stationed in York River or Hampton Roads. The experiment of the hospital ship Florence Nightingale has been so entirely satisfactory that there can be no doubt of the wisdom and beneficence of this act.

It is another indication of the fidelity and sagacity of the Sanitary Commission.

ANOTHER TROLLOPE UPON AMERICA.

Mr. Anthony Trollope, the pleasant and shrewd novelist, has been writing a book about us. It was known that he was here last year, and he did not disguise his literary intention. The work comes at last, and with a peculiar interest as the view of an unusually good-tempered Englishman, who has seen us and chatted with us during the war.

The book is evidently thoroughly English and really friendly. There is a blunt honesty in it which will not surprise those who have read his "West Indies and the Spanish Main," and there is that total want of enthusiasm which marks the true Briton. Mr. Trollope constantly talks of the war, and he understands much more than most strangers who write of it. He makes some capital social criticisms, and all he says is said with that easy, genial humor which disarms all suspicion of bitterness or satire. The work is very entertaining, as every thing he writes must be.

We speak from a taste here and there in various parts; but the flavor is excellent, and will go far to take the taste of the earlier Trollope book out of our mouths. Published by Harper & Brothers.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

OLD PROVERBS IN MODERN LIGHTS.

The early bird goes to bed the earliest.
The wise child dies the youngest.
The rolling stone sees most of the world.
To be poor in purse and proud in heart is the highest proof of gentility.
Maidens—at present, young ladies—must be cool and forward; the want of ears to be made amends for by the length of tongue.
Would you be a great man in the world's estimation, never hesitate to tell a lie or be dishonest when you are pretty sure of not being found out.
Never pay what you owe; it is the height of snobism.
The gift of a slippery tongue makes a man more admired than a tenpenny income-tax makes him disliked.

Jones thinks that the adoption of crinoline has tended to keep marriageable young men on the outskirts of female society. No doubt, while the fashion lasts, milliners' bills must continue to be a good round sum.

All the Difference.—What is the difference between man and his mother earth? The latter shows its furrows in spring, the former his in autumn.

Great Confederate Loss.—We fancy by this time that it must be loss of heart.

Any sort of lecture is a bore that tells you nothing but what you knew already, and if every preacher bore this in mind no congregation would ever be bored with a sermon. Some gentlemen denounce as a bore any speech or writing which informs them of what they don't want to know, and which, making them no wiser than they were, they ironically call didactic. What is one man's bore is another man's hobby. What a bore is music or poetry to a man who has none in his soul—that is to say, in his animal nature! Dancing is as great a bore to one man as moral philosophy is to another. Small talk bores some men worse than metaphysics or even than theology. The most insufferable of all bores are wife to husband and husband to wife, between whom the most ardent affection does not exist; but when it does they are tormented with anxiety on one another's account, and that is a bore.

NOTES BY A HORRIDLY SATIRICAL CREATURE.

Women first resorted to tight lacing to prove to men how well they could bear squeezing.

Tim works wonders on the faces of Mrs. Tittyvate's friends, but Time never touches Mrs. T.

How beautiful is woman when adversity frowns upon her sister! It is touching to behold the resignation with which a woman sees her best friend compelled, by circumstances, to put down the carriage and suppress her lady's maid.

Widows' Weeds are easily got rid of by planting a late variety of the Seringa—perhaps better known as orange-blossom.

Love at first sight often leads to marriage with the eyes shut.

When I see a bee in the cup of an orange-blossom, he reminds me of the day when the confectioner called for his bill for a certain wedding breakfast.

We are told that "Use is Second Nature." This may be the case with many, but we think with a rare number of people, inasmuch as our enemies generally exceed our friends, it should be, "Abuse is Second Nature."

A woman living up in Jackson County has lost, within eighteen months, two husbands. The first was a common farm hand, able to earn ten dollars per month—the latter, a mill-wright, who earned two dollars a day, but was killed the second week after he had got a steady job for a year. She said to a consoling friend the other day: "It seemed so hard to lose him, just after he'd got a good job, too!"

Nelly Gwynn's First Love.—"My first love, you must know, was a link-boy." "A what?" "'Tis true," said she, "for all the frightfulness of your what; and a very good soul he was too, poor Dick! and had the heart of a gentleman. God knows what has become of him; but when I last saw him he said he would humbly love me to his dying day. He used to say that I must have been a lord's daughter for my beauty, and that I ought to ride in my coach, and behaved to me as if I did. He, poor boy, would light me and my mother home, when we had sold our oranges, to our lodgings in Lewkenor's Lane, as if we had been ladies of the land. He said he never felt easy for the evening till he had asked me how I did; then he went gayly about his work, and if he saw us housed at night he slept like a prince. I shall never forget when he came flushing and stammering, and drew out of his pocket a pair of worsted stockings which he brought for my naked feet. It was bitter cold weather, and I had chilblains, which made me hobble about till I cried; and what does poor Richard do but work hard like a horse, and buy me these worsted stockings. My mother bade him put them on; and so he did, and his warm tears fell on my chilblains, and he said he should be the happiest lord on earth if the stockings did me any good."

A lazy fellow begged alms, saying that he could not find bread for his family. "Nor I," replied an industrious mechanic; "I am obliged to work for it."

The following epitaph is on a tombstone in Berkeley church-yard. The subject of it died in June, 1725, aged 63 years:

Here lies the Earl of Suffolk's fool;
Men called him Dicky Pearse:
His folly served to make folks laugh
When wit and mirth were scarce.
Poor Dick, alas! is dead and gone;
What signifies to cry?
Dickys enough are still behind
To laugh at by-and-by.

Why can not two slender persons ever become great friends? Because they will always be slight acquaintance.

A man may be called poverty-stricken when knocked down by a beggar.

"What was the matter with Brown who died yesterday?" "Oh, he drank too much beer; that's what aled him."

We are told to have hope and trust, but what's a poor fellow to do when he can no longer get any trust?

Why is a man who beats his wife like an exquisitely formed dog? Because he's a perfect brute.

When is a boy more than a boy? When he is a lad-der.

A young man who was desirous of marrying the daughter of a well-known Boston merchant, after many attempts to broach the subject to the old gentleman, in a very stuttering manner commenced, "Mr. Owen, are you willing to let me have your daughter Jane?" "Of course I am," replied the old man; "and I wish you would get some other likely fellows to marry the rest of them."

The individual who broke the ice by his speech was drowned by applause.

A countryman recently came to town to purchase an article of household necessity, and in passing a music-shop observed "All sorts of wind instruments for sale here." He forthwith stepped in and asked for a pair of bellows.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, June 10, in the Senate, a resolution was adopted calling for information as to whether any claims have been made by citizens of the United States for property destroyed by the Federal army, and whether any measures have been taken to ascertain the actual damages in such cases; and if so, what. The treaty with Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave-trade, together with the correspondence on that subject, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A memorial from citizens of Utah, asking admission into the Union as a State, under the title of the State of Deseret, was referred to the Committee on Territories. The bill making additional appropriations for civil expenses, including the Haytien and Liberian missions, was passed. The Naval Appropriation bill was reported back by the Finance Committee with amendments. A motion to take up the bill amending the Fugitive Slave Law was agreed to by a vote of 25 to 10, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a bill to punish fraudulent government contractors was reported by the Judiciary Committee. The bill transferring the Western gun-boat fleet from the War to the Navy Department, was passed.

On Wednesday, June 11, in the Senate, a resolution admitting Messrs. Cannon and Hooper, Senators elect from Deseret, to the floor of the Senate, was laid over, as was also a resolution declaring null and void all acts or ordinances of secession passed by any Legislature or convention, and that loyal citizens of seceded States are entitled to all the privileges guaranteed and conferred by the Constitution of the United States. The Judiciary Committee reported a bill to establish provisional governments in certain cases. The bill amending the Fugitive Slave Law was postponed, and that for the construction of the Pacific Railroad was taken up. Senator M'Dougall explained its provisions, when it was postponed.——In the House, Mr. Stevens, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill authorizing the issue of $150,000,000 of Treasury notes, not bearing interest, of a denomination not less than five dollars. It was ordered to be printed. Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, presented a preamble and resolution declaring that information has been received by the Government that Hon. Benjamin Wood, a member of the House from New York city, has been engaged in communicating, or attempting to communicate, important intelligence to the rebels in arms against the Government, and directing the Judiciary Committee to investigate the subject and report upon the facts. After some debate, during which Mr. Wood favored the adoption of the resolution, it was adopted.

On Thursday, June 12, in the Senate, Senator Davis, of Kentucky, offered a resolution that the rebel General Buckner, captured at Fort Donelson, and now a prisoner at Fort Warren, ought to be transferred to the civil authorities to be tried for treason, whereof he stands indicted, in the Kentucky District Court. After some discussion, during which Senator Davis said Buckner ought not to be exchanged, but taken to Kentucky and hanged, the subject was laid aside. The bill for the relief of General Grant was passed. The Pacific Railroad bill was then taken up and discussed, and, after an executive session, the Senate adjourned.——In the House the Tax bill was reported back from the Committee on Ways and Means. Mr. Stevens recommended a general non-concurrence in the Senate's three hundred and fourteen amendments, and a committee of conference on the points in dispute between the two Houses. This was agreed to by a vote of 80 against 58. The bill defining the pay and emoluments of certain army officers, conferring citizenship upon all volunteers who serve and are honorably discharged on proving one year's residence, and punishing fraudulent contractors by court-martial with fine and imprisonment, and bringing all contractors under the Articles of War, was passed. The report of the Conference Committee on the bill appropriating five million dollars for bounties for volunteers was accepted.

On Friday, June 13, in the Senate, a bill to carry into effect the new treaty for the suppression of the African slave-trade was reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. The bill provides for the appointment of United States officers at mixed courts at New York, Sierra Leone, and Cape of Good Hope; each of the three Judges to receive $2500 per annum; also, for the arbitrator at New York to receive $1000 per annum, and the others $2000 each; also, for the clerk of the court at New York to receive the fees pertaining to the office. The appropriations for the Naval Academy, temporarily located at Newport, Rhode Island, and for repairs to the Academy buildings at Annapolis, Maryland, were, after considerable debate, adopted, thus indicating that the Academy will again be restored to Annapolis.——In the House, the Committee on Foreign Affairs made a report that no exigency seems to exist to require the interposition of the Government in behalf of the suffering people of Ireland. The bills to secure more prompt payment of officers and volunteers, and adding 40 surgeons and 120 assistant-surgeons to the army medical corps, was passed; also the bills indemnifying the citizens of Delaware for war expenditures, and prescribing an additional oath to grand and petit jurors serving in United States courts.

On Saturday, June 14, in the Senate, a message was received from the President calling attention to the subject of enlarging the Erie and Oswego canals and locks, so as to admit of the passage of gun-boats. The House bill providing for the more prompt payment of the volunteers was passed. An executive session was then held, and the Senate adjourned.——The House was not in session.

On Monday, June 16, in the Senate, the Naval Appropriation bill was taken up, and Senator Wilson's amendment, that no slaves shall be employed in the navy-yards, dock-yards, etc., was rejected, by a vote of 17 yeas to 18 nays. The appropriation for repairs at the Naval Academy buildings at Annapolis was adhered to, and the bill passed. A joint resolution authorizing the President to purchase Jones's improvement for operating heavy guns was presented. A debate ensued relative to changing the hour of meeting, and it was resolved that the Senate, on and after the 19th instant, meet at eleven o'clock.——In the House, the Committee on Elections reported against the claim of Charles Henry Foster to represent the Second Congressional District of North Carolina. A joint resolution was introduced creating the grade of Lieutenant-General of the army, to be filled, on the restoration of peace, by such eminent Major or Brigadier General as may be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, the grade to continue only during the life or service of the person appointed. Resolutions were adopted directing inquiry as to whether our wounded soldiers at Port Republic have been subjected to unnecessary neglect; whether rebel prisoners at Port Royal have been treated better than our own troops; and whether General Banks, while on his retreat, provided transportation for negroes, making our sick soldiers walk; also requesting the Secretary of War to inform the House by whose orders the rebel General Lee's house, near Richmond, is guarded and withheld from hospital purposes. The bill to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the Navy was then taken up and passed. By this bill admirals take rank with major-generals, commodores with brigadier-generals, etc. The Senate bill reorganizing the Navy Department was also passed, and the House adjourned.

THE FLIGHT OF BEAUREGARD.

Dispatches from General Halleck, dated on Thursday the 12th, state that spies and deserters from Beauregard's army represent the whole force to be greatly disorganized. Several of the regiments had mutinied, and refused to serve any longer, as their term of enlistment had expired. These troops had accordingly been disarmed, and numbers of them shot for mutiny. A large amount of valuable stores had been destroyed by the retreating rebels. Locomotives and cars in a half consumed state have been found at various points, all showing that the enemy had made a precipitate flight. The whole country south of Corinth has been completely devastated by the rebels to such an extent that the population are in a starving condition.

At latest dates General Pope had reached Okelona, and reports that Beauregard is still retreating. General Price was with him, and Jeff Thompson was at Grenada. General Hindman was said to have gone into Arkansas.

THE BATTLE OF CROSS KEYS.

Jackson's army attacked General Shields's advance on Monday morning, near Port Republic. The conflict was maintained for four hours by about two thousand of our men against the main body of General Jackson's army. The enemy's force became so overwhelming in numbers that our advance was compelled to fall back, which it did in good order, until it met the main body of General Shields's command, near Conrad's store. As soon as this was effected the enemy in turn retired.

The subsequent advance of our army from General Frémont's head-quarters to Port Republic, Virginia, ascertained the fact that none of the enemy were in the way except the wounded, who lay in every house. The dead found in the road shows that the rebels lost five hundred in that fight. Ambulances and wagons, arms and accoutrements were strewn along the route. A dispatch received at the War Department puts our loss at 125 killed and 500 wounded. Our own loss in officers was severe.

AFFAIRS AT MEMPHIS.

The condition of Memphis at the latest accounts was most satisfactory. The people generally seem rejoiced to enter once more under the protection of the Government. The stores are being opened, and many of the merchants are starting for the Northern cities to buy goods in the old fashion, and applications to ship 6000 bales of cotton have already been made to our authorities; while at the same time the rebel cavalry, who are scouring the country in the vicinity of Grand Junction, are wantonly destroying as much of the staple as they can. The people of Memphis treat our soldiers with kindness and cordiality.

The Post-office and Adams's express office have been opened and business resumed. The state of affairs in the city were thus much improved.

AT NEW ORLEANS.

Affairs at New Orleans seem to be progressing satisfactorily. The New Orleans Bee, which was previously suppressed by the General for its advocacy of cotton-burning, has reappeared with an apology and explanation, assuring General Butler that it never intended to recommend the destruction of the crops of the Southern people. Upon this assurance the Commanding General has permitted the issue of the paper.

AT NORFOLK.

The Union feeling in Norfolk is progressing. Trade is reviving there, and the sentiments of the citizens in favor of the flag is becoming manifest in public meetings and processions. General Viele has been offered and has accepted a fine house for his head-quarters.

THE REBEL LOSS AT FAIROAKS.

The Richmond Dispatch gives a terrible record of the rebel loss of officers at the battle of Fairoaks. While it puts down the killed in the aggregate, on their side, at only 8000, which is, doubtless, considerably below the mark, it says that they lost a vast number of officers, including five generals, twenty-three colonels, ten majors, and fifty-seven captains, either killed or captured. The same paper makes the important admission that our army can at any time cut off the retreat of the rebels South by seizing the railroads at Petersburg, and intimates that a retreat to Lynchburg and the mountains was the only one left to them.

REACTION AGAINST JEFF DAVIS.

The Charleston Courier says that men in high official positions in the South are at present engaged in a crusade against Jeff Davis, and are calling for a convention of the Confederate States to depose the rebel President and put a military dictator in his place.

ANOTHER SLAVER PUNISHED.

The jury in the case of Appleton Oaksmith, whose trial at Boston, upon the charge of fitting out a slaver, has been in progress during the past week, on Friday, after thirty minutes' deliberation, rendered a verdict against the prisoner on eight out of the ten counts in the indictment. The penalty for the crime is imprisonment for five years, and five thousand dollars fine, and one year's imprisonment for each one thousand dollars of the fine not paid.

Steamers running the blockade were insured at Lloyds at from thirty to forty guineas.

THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

The Paris Moniteur of the 7th of June notifies the blockade of the Mexican ports of Tampico and Alvarado by the Emperor. A French protectorate for the republic was spoken of.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

The Spanish documents relative to the affairs of Mexico have been submitted to the Cortes. The impression is reported as unfavorable to General Prim.

MEXICO.

THE DEFEAT OF THE FRENCH.

The papers publish some very important news from Mexico, fully confirming previous reports of the defeat of the French on the 4th and 5th of May last. The battle was a sanguinary one, and the French Zouaves, who must have fought with great gallantry, suffered severely. The French were only 4000 strong; but the numbers of the Mexicans are not given, though they may be computed at from fifteen to twenty thousand men.

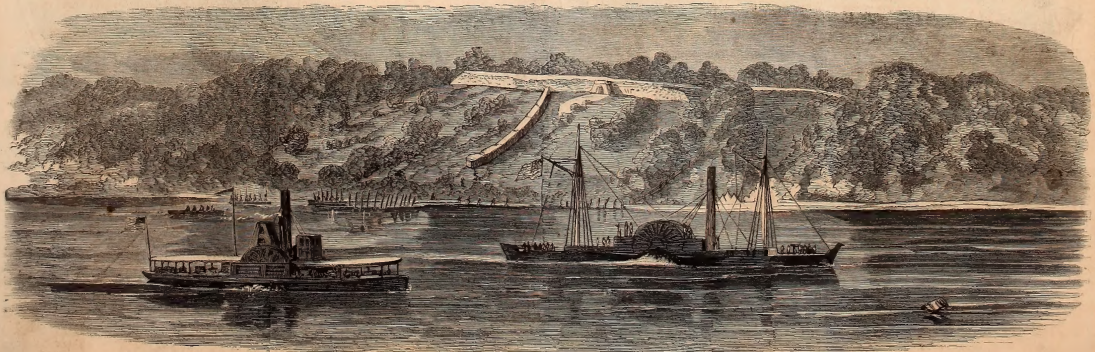
BRIGADIER-GENERAL EDWIN V. SUMNER, U.S.A.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANTHONY.]

GENERAL SUMNER.



GENERAL EDWIN V. SUMNER, commander of an army corps in the ARMY of the Potomac, was born in Massachusetts, about the year 1797, and was appointed to West Point, from New York, in 1815. He served in the infantry for eighteen years; in 1833 he was appointed Captain of Dragoons, and Major in 1846. He served in the Mexican war, and was brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel for gallant and meritorious conduct at Cerro Gordo; and Colonel for the same behavior at Molino del Rey. In 1848 he was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of the First Dragoons. When the troubles broke out in Kansas a force of cavalry was sent to preserve the peace, and Colonel Sumner was placed in command. He discharged the delicate duties of his office with skill and success. On the election of Mr. Lincoln he was one of the four officers (Generals Pope and Hunter being two of the remainder) who were appointed by the War Department to escort the President-elect to Washington. The famous night-journey through Baltimore, which was undertaken in order to frustrate a plot for the assassination of the President, was resolved upon, against his counsels and in spite of his entreaties. After the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln Colonel Sumner was appointed to supersede General Albert S. Johnson (who turned rebel) in command of our force on the Pacific. He speedily set matters straight in that section of the country, and returned home, signalizing his return by the arrest of the traitor Gwin, of California, on the way. The authorities of New Granada attempted to prevent the passage of Gwin as a prisoner through their territory; but Sumner took the responsibility, and marched him across the Isthmus with a battalion of United States troops. On his arrival at Washington General Sumner was appointed to the command, first, of a division and next of a corps in General M'Clellan's army. His conduct at Williamsburg has been the subject of much criticism, but at Fairoaks he certainly vindicated his reputation for good soldiership and gallantry.

LOVE AS A CLAIRVOYANT.

A chilly wind sighing through leafless boughs, rain pattering against the windows, river and sky a gray blank—such had been the day. Twilight came early, filling the little parlor at Oak Glen with shadow. Already the flower-stands were scarcely distinguishable from the sea-green curtains against which they stood, the tall Indian vases, the book-cases, the wide fauteuils, the gay pastels on the walls looked alike but so many dim ghosts, and Barton Ethicke's weird, uncanny music seemed sounding out from shadow-land itself.

He sat, with head bent down, playing low, as if to himself—the music, evidently only the half unconscious expression of his thought, ceasing presently altogether. Little boot-heels on a sudden clicked sharply on the marble tiles without, a fresh young voice hummed "Oh liberta gradita!" just without the door, and then with a swish of silken flounces came straight toward him an airy, slender figure. Close upon him Ethel Herrick started and tossed her saucy head.

"Oh! it is you, Mr. Ethicke! I hardly knew what it could be sitting there in the dark."

Barton's thought stood before him, and the golden opportunity for which he had prayed so long was in his grasp. For weeks she had eluded him; always tantalizingly kind, but innocently inaccessible. Now he had her—with no elderly relatives of dull perceptions as a shelter, no child, not even a spaniel, with which to effect a diversion. Sunbeams and mist wreaths had been as easily trapped as she—and now there she was, alone with him and the shadow, shrinking, uneasy; outwardly demure, inwardly, he knew, divining his intention and plotting to defeat it.

"Ethel."

"Mr. Ethicke."

"Don't call me that."

"What then?"

"I have another name."

"Oh! Mr. Barton Ethicke."

"Give me my first name," he remonstrated, with ominous meekness.

"Well then, Mr."

With such an enemy what was the use of firing at long range, thought Barton, and sent Patience to the right-about, threw reticence to the winds. Long repressed emotion flamed up suddenly in his face; vi et armis he possessed himself of the little fingers toying nervously with the ends of her sash.

Ethel recoiled, and as Fate would have it, against a light music-stand, which, under the pressure, followed the example of certain commercial houses, and went down. The crash sounded out with melancholy distinctness, and an elderly relative crossing the hall put in her head to see what was the matter. There sat Ethel, by the fading light diligently reading "Idylls of the King," while Barton was guiltily gathering up the music.

"It was Mr. Ethicke," explained the little hypocrite. "He is always coming down with a crash. For some unfortunate people this world seems really only one great stumbling-block."

Virtuous indignation, polite resignation, sounded in her voice. The elderly relative hemmed, hesitated, and like most neutrals, finding her position untenable, retired. The door had scarcely closed when Barton rose and walked over to her. As quick as he, she had tied her handkerchief on her fan, and held it up, a flag of truce, as he reached her; but he was no longer to be evaded with jests. He sat down close beside her—useless then for her to tremble and shrink away in her corner of the sofa; closer and closer he drew her, till her full scarlet lips were pressed against his, and he could feel the beating of her poor heart. She tried to cover her glowing face with her hands, but they were seized and imprisoned at once, leaving no hiding-place but on his shoulder.

"You shy little elf," he whispers, "how did you have the heart to torture me so long?"

What need to go on? It is the old story. Lovers know it by heart; pater and mater familias smile to recall it; fossil bachelors and awful maiden ladies are shocked even to think of it. Besides, more serious matters presently claimed the attention of our young couple.

Their engagement was hardly viewed with pleasure by Ethel's family, for Barton Ethicke, desirable in other respects, was a Northern man, and his Union sentiments made Alabama no longer a safe residence for him.

The marriage, if marriage there was, must take place at once; the separation of Ethel from her family be immediate, perhaps final. Mother's and brother's love, political sentiment, Ethel's natural hesitation, all barred the way, only to be swept aside by Barton's indomitable energy. Monday was the day fixed; "four days more," Ethel said to herself with flushing cheeks, as she sat watching for the click of his horse's hoofs on the gravel walk. He had been gone two days—detained in the city on business. She had expected him early in the afternoon, and now it was twilight, so a few minutes more must bring him, and her heart beat high at the very thought.

Sounded out, sharp and suddenly on the evening stillness, a horse's hurried gallop: over the little wooden bridge, along the road, in at the gate it came. She ran gleefully out on the piazza, waving her handkerchief; but the rider, who had slackened his furious pace, and was coming slowly up the avenue of oaks, was not Barton, but her brother Ralph. He looked pale and anxious, and came in without speaking, seeming scarcely to see her. She followed him to the library.

"Have you seen Barton?"

"Yes."

"Where is he? What keeps him?"

"He is—detained."

"Detained! How odd! But he sent me a message—you have a letter for me?"

"No—nothing."

He sat down as he spoke in the most shadowed part of the room. Ethel instantly drew away the curtains to let in the feeble light, and going up to him looked searchingly in his face.

"Ralph, what is it? What is the matter?"

"Nothing."

"There is. Are you sick?"

"No, I tell you! How absurd you are!"

His tone and look were half savage, but she wound her arms about his neck, murmuring close in his ear,

"Ralph, you can not deceive your sister. I know that something troubles you. What have you been doing? Tell me. When did I ever fail you, or betray your confidence? Trust in me once more, and perhaps I can help you. You know the mouse gnawed the lion's net."

No answer, only the closer pressure of his arm. Appalled at the silence, she bent her head back, and met the solemn, ominous pity of his eyes. All at once she began to tremble and grow white.

"Is it—is it—something has happened to Barton! He is dead—they have killed him!"

"No, but he is in prison."

"Well, why do you stop?" I am calm, Don't you see, perfectly calm."

Ralph's broad chest heaved; his voice shook in spite of himself.

"My poor Ettie! shall I tell you? Have you courage to hear?"

"Yes, yes, I tell you. All, any thing, only quick! for my heart won't beat. I think it is waiting to hear." All this spoken low, with white, dry lips and a curious, strained distinctness of utterance, as though each word were forced out by a mighty effort of will.

"Ethel, it would be better if he were dead this moment with a bullet through his heart. Our boys had planned a surprise for the Federals, and how Barton got wind of it Heaven only knows, for it was kept secret, and why he must meddle with it, is a still deeper mystery. He must have counted on capture and detection, for the train filled with soldiers was positively in sight as he was tearing up the track."

"Is that all? The destruction of a few rails!"

"All! He might have murdered his father with more impunity. Our long-cherished and well-planned scheme was foiled; the Federals saved incalculable loss and disaster! His life will be the forfeit, for he is judged and condemned already, before his trial."

"Never! It is monstrous! incredible! He shall not die! Ralph, we must save him."

"Ethel, all this afternoon I have been with Judge Percy, father's oldest friend. I have told him how near he was to us and to you. I offered myself as a hostage for his good conduct, till he could be sent North. I pleaded for imprisonment—any thing but a shameful death. I even threatened."

"And he—"

"Said if it were his own son he could not save him. The mob were clamoring night and day about his prison; they thirsted for his blood. It was doubtful if they would not tear him limb from limb on his way to trial. He dared not, even if he would, acquit him. There is actually no hope."

Ethel shuddered, but made no comment, only rose quietly. Ralph held her back.

"Where are you going?"

"To him."

"My dear child, not to-night; you can not see him. Visitors are not allowed after this hour. Wait till to-morrow."

"But the night is so long and still, and I shall think—" answered Ethel, with a look of terror.

"My poor Ettie! I will stay with you."

"And we shall start very early?"

"As early as you like." And with that she was forced to be content.

Says George Herbert, "Closets are halls, and hearts highways to God's affections." And all Ralph's tender sympathy, all her desperate striving, nowise softened her fearful suffering. She paced the floor, she knelt down, she fairly groveled at times, as if enduring acutest physical anguish. With the first ray of light she ordered the carriage, and her misery was so great that no one had the heart to oppose her. She drove straight to the prison, where she was refused admittance, as she had expected; back again she went to the house of Judge Percy. The old man wiped his spectacles, blew his nose vigorously, and tried to look all judicial sternness. Quoth he,

"My dear Miss Ethel, a Roman or a Spartan maiden would have tied the noose with her own hands, were he twenty times her lover;" but Ethel burst out with a pitiful cry,

"Oh! Mr. Percy, I am neither Roman nor Spartan, only a poor, weak girl, and so utterly miserable. See, I will carry nothing to him. Search me if you will. I can not help him to escape; the words that we speak will harm no one; but I must see him—I must! Do not shake your head. You will not refuse, oh! you can not, for you are not of stone;" and she fell down on her knees before him, and her beautiful golden hair, loosed from the comb, dropped about her like a shining veil.

The Judge cleared his throat vigorously.

"I have no sympathy with the traitor," he said, half apologetically to Ralph, "but for her sake—here is the order for your admittance. After all a couple of hours will do no harm."

Ethel clutched the paper with desperate eagerness, stopped for no thanks, not even to look if Ralph were coming, but hurried back to the carriage again. To her burning impatience minutes were ages of torture. She sat leaning forward, her hand on the door, her eyes devouring the streets through which they rolled.

They were admitted. The door of Barton's cell opened. "At length!" she said, and sprang in with a cry. He turned quickly—opened his arms wide.

"My darling! my pet!" he said, low.

For the last time she was folded to his heart. Oh! the unutterable bitterness of the thought! His last kisses! his last words to her on earth! So precious, yet melting away like the air, to leave her only their remembrance.

"But there is another world," he said, softly.

"Ah! but I haven't faith like you."

"My darling, Christ will come to you I am persuaded. You see my death is for the best. He might not if I had lived."

"But oh, Barton, to die in this way! If you had been shot in battle, or stricken by God, I must have mourned; but by the hangman's hands;—horrible!"

"For the Union—for our country, Ethel. Is not that glorious? Could I do less than offer up my life? The meanest hireling in the ranks does that. I counted the cost beforehand. I acted deliberately. I knew that capture was almost certain, but I felt that God, who sent me knowledge of the plot in a way of which the conspirators little dream, destined me also to foil it."

Ethel answered by mute caresses, she had no heart for words. Two hours slipped away like a dream. Ralph called her, but she clung frantically to Barton.

"Oh, I can not, I can not! or if it must be, grant me annihilation! Let not one atom of my being remain to throb with this intolerable anguish!"

"Poor heart! ask rather for resignation," he whispered; but she was past hearing—for the first time in her life she had fainted.

The mockery of a trial was over, Barton condemned, and the day of his execution fixed—the Monday that should have been his wedding-day. Ethel had left the city because her thoughts wandered out continually, and went up one street and across another, and so on, till they came to the prison, outside of whose bars they clamored, crying out "that they were spirit, and it but senseless matter, and they must pass; that he was alone, perhaps despairing, and they were one with him, and must go to him—they must, they must!" till she fancied herself going mad.

The journey and alternate trances of sleep and paroxysms of agony wore out the wretched Saturday, and the Sabbath brought with it a new phase of feeling; an utter incredulity, born out of the fragrance and stillness about her. The tranquil fields, the peaceful sunshine, the very bird swaying and balancing on the slender twig near her window, what were they but nature's contradictions of the possibility of such horror as haunted her? Surely it was some dream, and oh, how she struggled and prayed that she might wake! She knew nothing about the time, for Ralph had stopped all the clocks in the house, and possessed himself of her watch, that she might be unable to count the hours or know the moment of his last struggle; but somewhere late in the wane of the long golden day she lay down, utterly wearied in body and mind, but with the unbelief in her coming desolation still strong upon her. There were the roses blooming in the rustic flower-stand that he had given her; his miniature rose and fell on her bosom with every pulse of her heart. She opened the little golden case and looked at it. There was no foreshadowing of evil, no foreboding in the clear-cut face. As she closed it the ring on her third finger caught the light, and flamed out with red and violet hues. She remembered so well when he placed it there; he who was to die the death of a felon, of those loathsome degraded beings whom she hesitated to believe possessed of a common humanity with herself, he who had held her to his heart and pressed his lips on hers—monstrous! impossible!

At last, present and future, all outward circumstances, all thoughts were lost, merged suddenly in a sense of nervous exaltation, a rapid, awful thrill, as if soul and body were parting. She was not asleep, she was not dreaming, but she was with him floating on to the wild music of the Hirten Spiele, filled with an unearthly pleasure that was half the delicious whirling harmony, half the clasp of his loving arm. Suddenly sepulchral air chilled them through and through, and they were in his prison cell, doors fast shut, all hope gone, and again her whole soul rose up in wild rebellion; before its revolt bars of sense went down, time and place vanished—whether in the body or out of the body she could not tell, but she saw a road with its iron track, showing ghostly white in the dim night, cut in two by a wide and rapid stream. The faint air was alive with the low hum of voices, the clatter and ring of arms. Men swarmed like bees rolling huge bales to the banks, tearing up the iron rails, prying open ropes, binding the bales together, and hurling them into the dull water. Each worked with vim, with intensity, as though he alone were the saviour of his cause. Now and then lantern gleams caught the glitter of bayonets or of an epaulet, and high above them, a dim form in the darkness, floated the flag for which Barton was to die—the Stars and Stripes.

Foremost among them worked Mayne Ethicke, Barton's cousin, often enough before the bitter war of brother against brother, a guest in Ethel's father's house. If he but knew—and she struggled incredibly to speak. She would have given her life for a moment's power of speech, but voice and words were denied her. She could only look and watch. Barton died to her a hundred times while the bridge was building, and the great host passing over. To her his life seemed hanging on the stumble of every foot, each slipping of a board, whatever caused delay.

The dawn came at last, haggard and threatening. It looked in on Barton sleeping quietly and woke him. Only a few hours now and for him all mysteries would be unveiled; he was going fast over the little strip of time that separated him from eternity. Solemn excitement possessed him. Something that was almost triumph shone out in his face except when he remembered Ethel; but he put away the thought of her as fast as possible, lest the gush of tenderness with which he looked at and kissed the soft hair lying on his heart might unman him.

On the cool morning air grew a murmur, coming at first with an occasional sigh and sweep of the wind, deepening, nearing, resolving itself at last into a heavy measured tramp of feet and roll of wheels. Suddenly three or four shots sounded out sharply—a rush—a sudden flurry and terror in the streets—a shout,

"The Federals are upon us! Mitchell's advance-guard are already in the town!"

Barton heard indistinctly the tumult surging about his prison, but speculated little about it; it mattered nothing to him. The time dragged on—time that is always in such haste with criminals and dying men! On late in the day the key turned in the lock. His heart gave one mighty bound and stood still. "At last," he said, and rose. The door opened wide, Mayne Ethicke's arms were thrown about him.

"Barton, dear old boy, we were just in time to save you!"

And then a strong hand was laid on his shoulder, and turning he saw Ralph trying to laugh and choking in an extraordinary manner.

"Barton, my dear fellow, I never thought before to rejoice over a Yankee triumph."

Barton's answer was, "Ethel?"

Far away Ethel lay in deep, stirless sleep, so like that of death that her mother, anxiously watching, bent more than once in sudden terror lest the breath had departed. Horses' hoofs rang out on the road, came clattering up the carriage-way.

"Ethel! Ethel!" called a strangely joyful voice in the hall below.

"Is Ralph mad?" murmured Mrs. Herrick, as Ethel opened wide her violet eyes, soft and dark with the sweet mystery of a happy sleep. Some one ran lightly up the stairs—it was Barton's step, his head looked in at the open door. Mrs. Herrick recoiled and shrieked, but Ethel sprang forward with hands outstretched.

"My darling, I knew you were safe and coming back to me."

Half an hour after she said to Mayne Ethicke,

"How you worked when you were building that bridge!"

He looked surprised.

"How did you know? I told no—"

"Oh! I saw," and she recounted her vision.

"An odd dream," said Ralph, musingly.

"But it was not a dream—I saw it," insisted Ethel.

"Easily explained," laughed Barton. "Love in the old days was blind, but in this our modern progressive age he has grown clairvoyant."

THE WAR ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

We devote pages 408 and 409 to illustrations of the War on the Mississippi, from sketches by our artist, Mr. Alexander Simplot. One of the pictures represents the Gun-boat Fight on the Mississippi opposite Memphis. As a contrast to the descriptions by loyal men, we give the following account of this remarkable combat from the pen of the reporter of a rebel paper, the Memphis Argus, of June 6:

As was generally anticipated, several gun-boats of the Lincoln fleet made their appearance around the bend above the city this A.M., arriving below the island a little before 6 o'clock. Their appearance created an immediate movement in our fleet, under the brave Commodore Montgomery, who had been awaiting them, and his boats were at once headed up stream to offer them battle. Our fleet was composed of the General Van Dorn, flag-ship, General Price, General Bragg, Jeff Thompson, General Lovell, General Beauregard, Sumter, and Little Rebel, all rams, under the supreme command of Commander Montgomery. Upon arriving opposite the mouth of Wolf Creek, the Federal boats in the mean time advancing from the island, the order was given to open fire, which was accordingly done by the Little Rebel. Three shots were fired from the Confederate fleet before any reply was made by the enemy, who, however, continued advancing. A short time afterward fire was opened by the advancing boats of the Federal fleet, and a brisk interchange of cannonading was kept up for some time, the shots from both sides generally falling wide of the mark. Up to this time no damage had been done. The engagement had then continued probably twenty minutes.

Several more of the enemy's gun-boats now came in sight. Aware that upon their arrival, which would give the enemy great superiority, he could not continue the engagement at this point with any hope of success, Commodore Montgomery, who was using the Little Rebel as his flag-vessel, ordered the fleet to fall back. The order was reluctantly obeyed, the firing, however, being kept up vigorously.

Our fleet retired to opposite Beal Street, no longer in line of battle, when one of the Federal rams shot ahead of the remainder of the fleet in pursuit. Upon reaching the vicinity of our fleet, preparations were made to receive her. The Beauregard at once prepared to strike, and they both bore down on each other in gallant style. The contest was of short duration, as the Beauregard, avoiding the blow intended for her, struck her adversary forward of her wheel-house. The blow placed the Federal adventurer hors du combat, and she hauled off and made for the Arkansas shore, where she remained during the rest of the engagement.

In the mean time another Federal ram, the Monarch, started to the first's assistance, rapidly passing the city under full head of steam. The Beauregard, having disabled her first adversary, turned about to run into the Monarch. The Price was also moved up, and the three boats were rapidly coming together.

A heavy blow aimed by the Beauregard at the Monarch missed and struck the Price, which was unable to get out of the way. She was struck squarely on the wheel-house, which was torn completely off, leaving the boat nearly a wreck. She at once made for the Arkansas shore, and sunk as deeply as the shallow water would allow. A number of persons on board were killed and wounded by the enemy's sharp-shooters.

Just at this period the four iron-clad gun-boats of the enemy, none of which had yet taken any other part in the engagement than firing at long range as they slowly advanced, moved down for the scene of the action. The cannonading on their arrival was fiercely renewed, and in a short time the General Lovell was pierced by a large shot, which caused her to fill rapidly and settle down. We had by this time lost two boats, and the fighting was at close quarters.

The Little Rebel, which was all the time in the thickest of the fight, was soon afterward struck by one of the Federal shots, and she at once started for the Arkansas side, and stopped near the General Price.

Commodore Montgomery and a majority of the officers and men escaped.

The Beauregard, nothing daunted by the disaster which had befallen the others, still continued vigorously firing. As she retired toward the point two or three of the enemy's large boats closed in on her, pouring in broadside after broadside. She was struck several times by shot which raked her fore and aft. A Federal ram also coming up dealt her a blow, and she commenced sinking rapidly in deep water opposite Jackson Mound. A Federal tug was sent to her assistance, in which the officers and men were conveyed to the Arkansas shore as prisoners of war.

The remaining Confederate boats, the Jeff Thompson, Van Dorn, Sumter, and Bragg, now rapidly moved down the river, aware that their only hope of safety, after the loss of the other four and the arrival of the remainder of the Lincoln fleet, was in further continuing to retreat; they soon rounded the point, and from Memphis could no longer be seen. But our reporter, who witnessed their

GENERAL HEINTZELMAN.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL SAMUEL P. HEINTZELMAN, whose portrait we publish on page 404, was born in Pennsylvania about the year 1806, and is consequently about fifty-six years of age. He entered the army from West Point in 1826. During the Florida war he, as Quarter-master, disbursed $3,000,000, without the loss of a dollar to the Government. During the early part of the Mexican war he was detailed to muster in volunteers on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. But his active duplications he was relieved from that duty, and reported to the commander at Vera Cruz, where he was assigned to the duty of forming the new regiments soldiers, and took up his march for the city of Mexico. His first active service was with the new regiments—a severe one at Huamatta, where Major Walker, of the Texas Rangers, was killed; for this engagement he was brevetted.

At the close of the war Major Heintzelman was sent to the command of the southern district of California, where he remained about five years, having charge of the Indian relations of that State, and made a personal reconnaissance of some two hundred miles of the Colorado River. He put the first steamer on the Colorado River.

During the time he was in command of this district the mutinous conduct of the Mormons in the neighborhood became hostile, and caucussed murderous acts and insurrectionary movements, who were raising the great Southern route to California. Major Heintzelman was charged with the suppression of these movements. This he did it to his own credit and the satisfaction of his Government the following extract from the report of General Hitchcock will show:

"The General commanding congratulates you and the officers of your command on the successful close of your war in the south. To your good judgment and untiring energy and perseverance, combined with your gallantry, he ascribes for its successful termination."

Major Heintzelman left Texas a few weeks previous to the battle of Twigs, Texas, on the Trinity, although "on leave," he was put on duty as Inspector-General at Washington. On the 14th day of July last he was promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, "for service in an Indian campaign in 1851," and on the 15th of the same month to the command of the 17th Infantry, and ordered to the command of a brigade consisting of four regiments of infantry, and one of cavalry, composed of regular cavalry and artillery, at Alexandria.

He was subsequently appointed to the command of the 3d Brigade of the 1st Division of the Potomac under General M'Dowell. At Bull Run he distinguished himself and was severely wounded, but was among the last to leave the field. On the division of the Army of the Potomac into army corps he was assigned to the command of the 3d army corps which suffered most at the terrible battle of Fairoaks. Their performance on that occasion received the highest encomiums from General Sumner. He has taken his place among the heroes of the day.

THE BATTLE AT FRONT ROYAL.

On page 404 we publish a view of FRONT ROYAL, VIRGINIA, and another of the FIELD IN WHICH GENERAL SHIELDS FOUGHT THE BATTLE OF CEDAR RUN. Both are from sketches by an officer who accompanied the forces of Major-General Banks, in his official report of the affair, says:

FRONT ROYAL is in itself an indefensible position. Two mountain ranges, a hilly country and a river lie between it and the south, commanding it by almost inaccessible hills; and the Shenandoah Mountains, with their numerous passes, and other mountain valleys, via Strasburg on the west and Chester Gap on the east.

The only practicable defence of this town would be by the line of the river, which is fordable in many places, and gains noise in advance. Such a defence would require a force of at least 10,000 men. Rebel forces were estimated from the best information we could obtain at from 15,000 to 20,000, and not an organized and well-appointed army that we have encountered.

On the 23d of May it was discovered that the white force was in motion on the mountain road in the valley of the Shenandoah, between the Massanutten Mountain and the Blue Ridge, and Colonel Kenly, of the First Maryland Regiment, had captured a considerable number of our pickets before the information reached us. The General at once made dispositions with the protection of the railroad and bridges bound itself immediately to concentrate his force at the most favorable retreat or a contest with the enemy against overwhelming numbers. Colonel Kenly was ordered to retire on the main force, at whatever cost. He immediately set out with his command, and was successful in the execution of one of the most important movements of the campaign. He brought off his entire command, and maintain a force equal to his own and the best, in the open field, and in the face of a superior force, without losing one man.

The order to fall back on the storm was given that the enemy was advancing on the town in force. The infantry commenced their march at once, and the cavalry left the rear in the rear of the town. Five companies were detached from the First Maryland Regiment, and formed the rear guard of a hill commanding a meadow of some extent, over which the enemy would be obliged to pass. Two companies were posted guarding the regimental camp, nearer to the river, on the left of the town.

The companies, three in number, then in charge of the rear guard, were posted in the following order, upon the main force. There were three four companies on the right of the battery of Captain Knapp, under Lieutenant-Colonel Dudsane, and five companies on the left under Colonel Kenly. The battery, Lieutenant Atwell commanding, opened fire upon the enemy advancing from the hills on the right and left, well supported by the infantry, being much damage. A detachment of the Fifth New York cavalry was ordered to advance upon the road, which was attempted, but did not succeed. The enemy's force held their position, and they were compelled to retreat across the river, which was done in good order, their camp and stores having been first destroyed.

On the opposite side their lines were again formed, and the battery, Captain Knapp, opened its fire upon the enemy while fleeing the river. They were again ordered to move, and fell back, the enemy pressing on in force, numbering about two miles when they were overtaken by the enemy's cavalry, and a fearful fight ensued, which ended in the complete destruction of the command. Colonel Kenly, at the head of his command, was killed in this action. The gun was brought into action and captured. The gun was brought within five miles of Winchester, and about two miles from Mount Atwell only when his horses were broken down. The enemy's force is estimated at eight thousand. The battle was fought principally on the cavalry on the side of the rebels, with active support from the infantry and artillery. Our force was about one thousand nine hundred men. We held their ground manfully, yielding only to the irresistible force of numbers. Colonel Kenly's command sustained since the affair represent that our troops fought with great bravery, and that the conduct of the enemy were base. A flag of truce captured near Martinsburg, who was in the front of the battle, reported that Colonel Kenly fell, as he fell, severely wounded. Lieutenant Atwell reports that of thirteen men in command at his battery but twelve were supported. The cavalry was more formidable, and suffered proportionately more than the infantry. Lieutenant Atwell, the command with yet return, but it impossible to speculate upon the number.

OUR FLEET IN THE JAMES RIVER.

We devote page 405 to illustrations of the operations of OUR FLEET IN THE JAMES RIVER. One of our pictures represents Fort Darling, which was lately attacked by Commander Rodgers with the Galena, Monitor, and other vessels. A full description of his ships engaged said:

The Galena is a vessel of the battery called Fort Darling, situated just beyond a sharp turn in the river, which makes it impregnable to a fleet that moves in the upper part of the river. Her sides are covered with railroad iron, and she mounts seven guns, viz.: two 9-inch guns, two 8-inch guns, one rifled 32-pounder and two 24-pounder howitzers. The fleet now approached in the following order: The Dragon, Lieutenant-Commanding Rhind, opened the battery. The vessel was very narrow, and the channel was so obstructed by reefs in width, that it was obstructive. The vessels, therefore, could not shift positions rapidly, but were compelled to fight in single file and pass onward.

The commencement of the fight, with the details of which our readers are familiar, he adds:

"Too much praise can not be given to Commander Rodgers and the officers of the ironclads engaged. He pilot manner in which the boats were handled, and for the skill and judgment displayed in the fight. Indeed, they were at anchor in a narrow channel to a heavy plunging fire from the enemy's batteries, and were subjected to many hits. The enemy's shot and shell were some of the coolest and the engagement with the gun-boats by—being only 1,000 yards distant from the batteries. The fight was one of the most brilliant actions of the war, and the result has given us the James River."

Of the reconnoissance the author of the sketch which we reproduce says:

On the morning of Friday, May 30, the United States steamers Mohawk, Captain N. B. Harrison, and Jacob Bell, Captain E. P. Miles, ran down the river from our encampment at City Point about eighteen miles, to take and spike the guns of the battery at Fort Powhatan. Having arrived in position, an armed boat, with a small detachment of marines, was sent ashore from the Mohawk, followed by another from the Bell; but the latter, after sealing the bank, which is here about thirty feet high, found the fort deserted, and a few days have been deserted. The battery is partially concealed behind a large wood-pile on the top of the bank. The fort, properly so-called, is on the summit of Fort Powhatan, a Revolutionary ruin of no little interest.

CAMP PUNISHMENTS.

Of page 412 we illustrate two of the punishments adopted in our army. One of the pictures represents the "Wheelbarrow Drill" in the 79th Regt. GENERAL BERNSTEIN'S ARMY. The fellow was marched through the lines between a file of soldiers, each of whom gave him a kick with the word "coward" affixed to his back, while the band played the "Rogue's March." The other picture represents one of the punishments for drunkenness adopted in General Halleck's Army of the Mississippi. "Drunkenness" is made to get into a barrel, which is so suspended that his head and his feet project, and locomotion, if not impossible, is rendered difficult and painful is labeled, "Too fond of whisky." Thus accounted, the miserable fellow is the butt of the jeers of the Army of Tennessee for a day, and learns a lesson which ought to teach him the virtue of temperance for the rest of his life.

THE SIGNAL CORPS.

THE sketches on page 406 will be particularly interesting at this time, when so much is heard of the Signal Corps. Major Myer, the Signal Officer of the Army and Chief of the Corps, was appointed in the Army of the Potomac, and entered the army in 1854. For many years he has worked in assisting his system, now the most complete army system in the world, when he received his commission as Major, indorsed by the highest military talent, and with authority to organize the department as he has now code, it is a noticeable fact that his appointment was violently opposed by Jeff Davis.

With the means now at his disposal, Major Myer can have an uninterrupted line of signals established from the blockade of the Potomac to the extreme right of the army in six hours, each telescope sweeping the field of vision of those on the adjacent stations.

There are now signal officers detailed to the armies in Kentucky, in South Carolina, and with Burnside in North Carolina, and a party will soon be sent to the expeditions on the Mississippi. To prevent such accidents as have occurred, by our troops firing into each other, Major Myer should, without a day's delay, be provided with the means of introducing the countersign signals throughout the whole army. The value and necessity of this system has been fully demonstrated in official reports.

The centre picture of the engraving represents an officer, accompanied by his flagman, at his station on the field of battle, his telescope slung to a tree for steadiness, and a signal flag in square on his flag, denoting that it has already been carried to the rear of the enemy's lines. A particular mention for service on the battle-field. On the left is a party using torch signals. To the right, standing at his ease, above, an officer is represented who has climbed a tree, by the assistance of a lariat, and takes his observations following every movement. In the centre is a signal officer reconnoitring with his glass, his flag kept working out of sight of the enemy; and on the left platforms are erected from to form a station. In the lower compartments an officer standing on a limber gets a view over the line of men moving at the double quick; a party running the gauntlet of the enemy's skirmishers to clear up a position for another party signaling on horseback, the large figures representing signalmen equipped and prepared to go into duty.

In making these sketches I have received valuable assistance from Lieutenant N. Dunick, signal officer, for which mere courtesy I here tender my acknowledgments. WARD.

THE BATTLE AT TRANTER'S CREEK, NORTH CAROLINA.

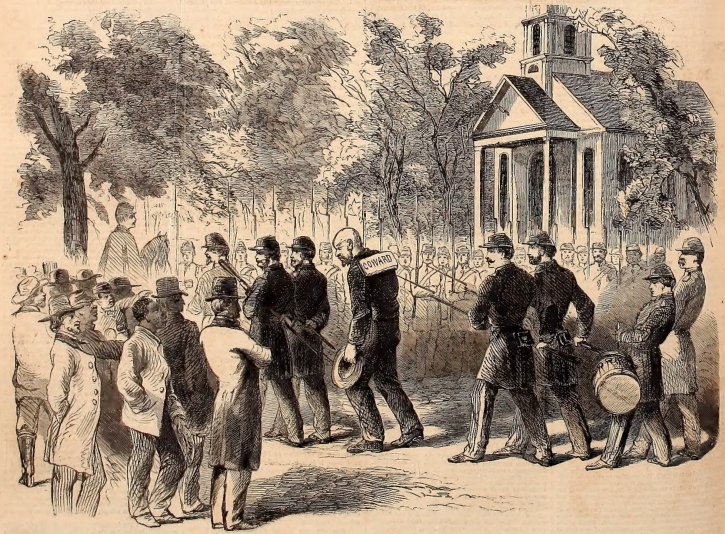
OUR artist with General Burnside's expedition has sent us a sketch of the battle at TRANTER'S CREEK, fought on June 5; we reproduce it on page 413. The enemy it seems had been gathering in force at the old Indian village of Washington, North Carolina, and after awaiting an attack for some time, our officers determined to assume the offensive. The Herald correspondent thus tells the story:

The Union gunboat Commodore Jones, a reconnoissance in force started from here (Washington) and consisted of Lieutenant-Colonel Amory's cavalry, consisting of the Second Massachusetts regiment, accompanied by Colonel Foster of the Third New York, Colonel Hawkins's Union Home Guards, and Major Pendleton, the two latter officers acting as aids to Colonel Amory. Also the Fifth Massachusetts Battalion regiment, Company C of the Third New York regiment, a detachment of Lieutenant Howard's Light Artillery, and a detachment from Colonel Howard's Union Home Guards, under command of Lieutenant Lee.

The infantry and artillery were transported in open barges, formed a junction with the cavalry on the outskirts of the town, when all started on the double quick. Tranter's Creek, which empties into the Pamlico river, is reached by the Washington and Greenville road.

After marching some distance, a sight of the enemy was at length obtained. The same correspondent writes:

In order to understand the progress of the fight, it may be well here give a brief description of the vicinity. Tranter's Creek is a small stream, about twenty-five yards wide, which empties into the Pamlico river by the Tranter's Creek is a small stream, about twenty-five yards wide, which empties into the Pamlico river by the high, chains along by the edge of the creek, which at this point is more narrow, and is crossed by a bridge with a span of trees." On the bridge are a six-mill and cotton gin, also, a grocery store and a few dwelling houses. The rebels had taken up the boards of the bridge between the two buildings, and with them had erected a breastwork, if it might be so called, near the cotton gin.



The colonel, with the cavalry, the artillery with the whole house, and the skirmishers, having demanded the enemy, endeavored to proceed toward the bridge. The advance guard was from Company A, and under command of Lieutenant Lee, and Company C, Third regiment New York, which moved up the inclined plane at the foot of the bridge, and immediately on reaching the top of the bridge, the enemy opened a heavy fire upon them from the cotton gin. Sergeant Shepard and a companion fired, and a heavy discharge of musketry followed, which soon fell at the first fire. The rest of the advance returned the volley, and when fell back to the main body. Lieutenant Lee immediately ordered forward the artillery, and in less time than it takes to record it, the piece was unlimbered, and Sergeant Avery, came dashing down the hill with their guns, took their stations, and opened a heavy fire of shell through the arch of the saw-mill, the other to the left of the bridge, and the cotton gin and the rebel breast-work. The main body of the infantry also came forward on the double-quick. Captain Gardner, of Company A, was among the brave of the hill, ready to charge the enemy at the point of the bayonet, but the enemy, seeing nothing to the nature of the affair. On account of the narrowness of the road, only a few men composing the advance could be brought into action at once, and the rest were disposed of in the rear, where they could not be of any use. With one company in the road, and one on either side, the encouragement of the enemy, a few of the rebels, who had discharged several rounds of shell and canister at the enemy's position, and who had fired the cotton gin, fled, and behind the trees so to be completely out of sight. The enemy's fire was terrific fire several times, and as soon as the bridge, the riddled beams and posts of which scarcely a man could be seen, the order was given to charge. The opportunity was not given, however, for the rebels, on the left of the cotton gin, and were firing very briskly from a dense cover of trees, which effectually kept injured by the building. Others again were discovered concealed in the trees on the right of the cotton gin. Sergeant Avery elevated his pieces, and fired a couple of rounds of shell through the building, whereupon several bodies were seen to fall to the ground, at sight of which heavy, though it is impossible to ascertain the full extent, as they carried off all their dead and wounded except the three bodies above referred to. Some of our artillery on the road fences owing to the heavy fire of the enemy.

Colonel Amory, who was on the opposite side of the bridge with the rebels had thrown up a temporary breast-work of cotton bales in an angular shape, with the corner nearest the approach from the bridge; but it failed to serve him as a means of defence.

Our loss on the battlefield was four killed and twelve wounded; but three of the latter died soon after the fight, so that our loss now stands seven killed and nine wounded.

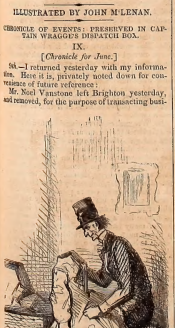
CHRONICLE OF EVENTS: PRESERVED IN CAPTAIN WRAGGE'S DISPATCH BOX.

IX.



[Chronicle for June.]

9th.—I returned yesterday with my information. Here it is, privately noted down for convenience of future reference:

Mr. Noel Vanstone left Brighton yesterday, and removed, for the purpose of transacting business in London, to one of his late father's empty houses in Vauxhall Walk, Lambeth. This singularly mean selection of a place of residence, on the part of a gentleman of fortune, looks as if Mr. N. V. and his money were not easily parted.

Mr. Noel Vanstone has stepped into his father's shoes under the following circumstances. Mr. Michael Vanstone appears to have died, curiously enough, as Mr. Andrew Vanstone died—intestate. With this difference, however, in the two cases, that the younger brother left an informal will, and the elder brother left no will at all. The hardest men have their weaknesses; and Mr. Michael Vanstone's weakness seems to have been an insurmountable horror of contemplating the event of his own death. His son, his housekeeper, and his lawyer, had all three tried, over and over again, to get him to make a will; and had never shaken his obstinate resolution to put off performing the only business-duty he was ever known to neglect. Two doctors attended him in his last illness; warned him that he was too old a man to hope to get over it; and warned him in vain. He announced his own positive determination not to die. His last words in this world (as I succeeded in discovering from the nurse, who assisted Mrs. Lecount) were: "I'm getting better every minute; send for the fly directly and take me out for a drive." The same night Death proved to be the more obstinate of the two, and left his son (and only child) to take the property in due course of law. Nobody doubts that the result would have been the same if a will had been made. The father and son had every confidence in each other, and were known to have always lived together on the most friendly terms.

Mrs. Lecount remains with Mr. Noel Vanstone, in the same housekeeping capacity which she filled with his father, and has accompanied him to the new residence in Vauxhall Walk. She is acknowledged on all hands to have been a sufferer by the turn events have taken. If Mr. Michael Vanstone had made his will, there is no doubt she would have received a handsome legacy. She is now left dependent on Mr. Noel Vanstone's sense of gratitude; and she is not at all likely, I should imagine, to let that sense fall asleep for want of a little timely jogging. Whether my fair relative's future intentions in this quarter point toward Mischief or Money is more than I can yet say. In either case I venture a prediction that she will find an awkward obstacle in Mrs. Lecount.

So much for my information to the present date. The manner in which it was received by Miss Vanstone showed the most ungrateful distrust of me. She confided nothing to my private ear but the expression of her best thanks. A sharp girl—a devilish sharp girl. But there is such a thing as bowling a man out once too often, especially when the name of that man happens to be Wragge.

Not a word more about the Entertainment: not a word more about moving from our present quarters. Very good. My right hand lays my left hand a wager. Ten to one on her opening communications with the son as she opened them with the father. Ten to one on her writing to Noel Vanstone before the month is out.

23*d*.—She has written by to-day's post. A long letter apparently, for she put two stamps on the envelope. (Private memorandum, addressed to myself. Wait for the answer.)

25*th*.—The answer has come. As an ex-military man I have naturally employed stratagem to get at it. The success which rewards all genuine perseverance has rewarded me—and I have got at it accordingly.

The letter is written, not by Mr. Noel Vanstone, but by Mrs. Lecount. She takes the highest moral ground, in a tone of spiteful politeness. Mr. Noel Vanstone's delicate health and recent bereavement prevent him from writing himself. Any more letters from Miss Vanstone will be returned unopened. Any personal application will produce an immediate appeal to the protection of the law, Mr. Noel Vanstone having been expressly cautioned against Miss Magdalen Vanstone by his late lamented father, has not yet forgotten his father's advice. Consider as a reflection cast on the honored memory of the best of men to suppose that his course of action toward the Miss Vanstones can be other than the course of action which his father pursued. This is what he has himself instructed Mrs. Lecount to say. She has endeavored to express herself in the most conciliatory language she could select; she has tried to avoid giving unnecessary pain, by addressing Miss Vanstone (as a matter of courtesy) by the family name; and she trusts these concessions, which speak for themselves, will not be thrown away.—[Such is the substance of the letter—and so it ends.]

"NO BUZZING IN MY HEAD! NO CAPTAIN TO SHAVE TO-MORROW!"

I draw two conclusions from this little document. First, That it will lead to serious mischief. Secondly, That Mrs. Lecount, with all her politeness, is a dangerous woman to deal with. I wish I saw my way safe before me. I don't see it yet.

29th.—Miss Vanstone has abandoned my protection, and the whole lucrative future of the dramatic Entertainment has abandoned me with her. I am swindled—I, the last man under Heaven who could possibly have expected to write in those disgraceful terms of myself. I AM SWINDLED.

Let me chronicle the events. They exhibit me, for the time being, in a sadly helpless point of view. But the nature of the man prevails; I must have the events down in black and white.

The announcement of her approaching departure was intimated to me yesterday. After another civil question about the information I had procured at Brighton, she hinted that there was a necessity for making our agreement of Friday last further. I immediately offered to undertake them, as before. "No," she said: "they are not in your way this time. They are more delicate than to a woman, and I mean to make them myself." Feeling my entire confidence in her to be unshaken, I again pointed straight at Mrs. Lecount, I tried a few innocent questions on the subject. She quietly declined to answer them. I asked politely if she proposed to leave? She would leave on the twenty-eighth, for what destination? She declined. For long? Probably not. By herself? No. With me? No. With whom then? With Mrs. Wragge, I had no objection. Could I be useful for what possible purpose? For the purpose of getting a respectable lodging, which she could hardly expect to accomplish unless she was accompanied by an elderly female friend. And was I, in the capacity of elderly male friend, to be left out of the business altogether? Impossible to say at present. Was I not even to forward my letters? Which might come by the first present address? No; she would make the arrangement herself at the proper time. And she would ask me at the same time for an address, at which I could receive a letter from her, in case of necessity for future communication with me. In her inquiries, after this last answer, could lead to nothing but waste of time. I saved time by putting no more questions.

It was clear to me that our present position toward each other was what our position had been previously to the event of Michael Vanstone's death. I accepted the position, to my choice of alternatives. Which way did my immediate interests point? Toward trusting the chances of her winning me again? Toward communicating at once with the interference of her relatives and friends? Or toward making the information which I possessed a marketable commodity to the rich, wealthy branch of the family and myself? The last of the three was the alternative I adopted, in the case of the father. I chose it once more in the case of the son.

The time I wanted for London nearly four hours since, and took her away in it, accompanied by Mrs. Wragge. My wife is a fool, a born fool, not to be actively valuable in the present emergency; but she will be passively useful in keeping up Miss Vanstone's connection with me—and, in consideration of that circumstance, I consent to brush up my temper, leave my own chin, and submit to the other inconveniences of waiting on myself for a limited period. And that glimmering of sense which Mrs. Wragge may have formerly possessed appears to have so entirely taken their leave of her. On receiving permission to go to London, she favored us immediately with two inquiries: Might she do some shopping? and might she take her cookery-book behind her? Miss Vanstone said Yes to one question, and I said Yes to the other; and from that moment Mrs. Wragge has vanished in a state of perpetual laughter. I am still hoarse with windy-expended ejaculations of surprise stimulant; and I left her in the railway carriage, to my inexpressible disgust, with both shoes down at her feet. Under ordinary circumstances these absurd particulars would not have dwelt on my memory. But, as matters actually stand, my unfortunate wife's imbecility may, in her present position, lead to consequences which we men of the business, like to notice. Is she to be more than a grownup child; and I can plainly detect that Miss Vanstone trusts her as a woman who not have trusted a sharper woman on that very account. I know children, little and big, rather better than my fair relative does; and I am not aware of all forms of human innocence when it happens to be your interest to keep a secret to yourself.

Let me return to business. Here I am, at two o'clock on a fine summer's afternoon, left entirely alone, to consider the safest means of approaching Mr. Noel Vanstone on my own account. My private suspicions of his moral character produce no discouraging effect on me. I have extracted cheering practical results in my time from people quite as fond of their money as he can be. The real difficulty to contend with is the obstacle of Mrs. Lecount. If I am not mistaken, this lady merits a little serious consideration on my part. I will close my chronicle for to-day, and give Mrs. Lecount her due.

Three o'clock.—I open these pages again, to record a discovery which has taken me entirely by surprise.

After completing the last entry, a circumstance revived in my memory which I had noticed on entering the ladies this morning to the railway. I then remarked that Mrs. Lecount had only taken oneof her three boxes with her, and it now occurred to me that a private investigation of the luggage she had left behind might possibly be attended with beneficial results. Having at command a key which has made a habit of cultivating friendly terms with strange locks, I found no difficulty in unlocking myself on a familiar footing with Miss Vanstone's boxes. One of the two presented nothing to interest me. The other—devoted to the preservation of the costumes, articles of toilet, and other properties used in the dramatic Entertainment—proved to be better worth examining, for it led me straight to the discovery of one of its owner's secrets.

I found all the dresses in the box complete—with one remarkable exception. That exception was the dress of the Fourth-century lady: the character which I have already mentioned as the best of all my pupil's impersonations. It modeled in voice and manner on her old governess, Miss Garth. The wig; the eyebrows; the bonnet and veil; the shawl—all made inside to disfigure her back and shoulders; the paints and cosmetics used to age her mother's face and complexion—were all gone. Nothing but the gown remained; a grossly flowered silk, useful among her other properties as a means of exaggerating in color and pattern to her inspection by daylight. The other parts of the dress are sufficiently quiet to pass muster. The gown and veil are only old-fashioned, and the cloak is of a lively color. But one of the articles must have been drawn from such a discovery as this. As certainly as I sit here, she is going to open the campaign against Mrs. Lecount with a Miss Garth, in a character which neither of those two persons can have any reason to suspect assuming at the outset—the character of Miss Garth.

What course am I to take under these circumstances? Having got a clew, am I to keep it to myself, or to work it? These are awkward considerations; I am rather puzzled how to deal with them.

It is something more than the mere fact of her choosing to disguise herself to forward her own private ends that is startling to my sense of propriety. Hundreds of girls take fancies for disguising themselves; and hundreds of instances of it are related, year by year, in the public journals. But my ex-pupil is not to be considered, for one moment, in the light of one of the ventures of the newspapers. She is capable of going a long way beyond the limit of dressing herself like a man, and of acting in a man's voice and manner. She has a natural gift for assuming a character, and for sinking her own identity. A girl who takes the sharpest people unawares by using such a capacity as this to help her own ends in private life, and who develops that capacity by a determination to fight her way to her own purposes with a high hand, is a very different thing before it, so to this time, is a girl who tries an experiment in deception, new enough and dangerous enough to lead, one way or the other, to very serious results. This is my conviction, founded on a knowledge of the girl's past life and posing on my fellow-creatures. I say of my fair relative's enterprise what I never said or thought of it till I contemplated opening the inside of her box. The chances for and against her winning the fight for her lost fortune, single-handed and unbalanced, that I can not for the life of me see on which side the scale inclines. All I can discern is, that it will be certainly, one way or the other, on the day when she passes Noel Vanstone's door—and not before.

Five o'clock.—I have effected a masterly compromise; I have decided on turning myself into a sick-nurse by the bedside.

By to-day's post I have dispatched to London an anonymous letter to Mrs. Wragge. The letter will be forwarded to its destination by the same means which I successfully adopted to mystify Mrs. Pendril; and it will reach Mrs. Wragge, at Lambeth, by the afternoon of to-morrow at the latest.

The letter is short, and to the purpose. It warns Mr. Noel Vanstone in the most alarming language that he is going to be made the victim of a conspiracy, and that the prime mover in the business is a young lady who has already held serious communication with his father and himself. It offers him the information necessary to secure his own safety on conditions which it makes it worth the writer's while to run the serious personal risk which such a disclosure will entail on him; and it ends by stipulating that the answer shall be advertised in the Times, shall be addressed to "Fair Play," and shall briefly shall state plainly what remuneration Mr. Noel Vanstone offers for the priceless service which it is proposed to render him.

Unless some unexpected complication occurs, this letter places me exactly in the position which it is my present interest to occupy. If the advertisement appears, and if the remuneration offered is large enough to induce me to go over to the camp of the enemy, over I go. If the advertisement appears, and if Mr. Noel Vanstone rates my invaluable assistance at too low a figure, here I remain, biding my time till my fair relative wants me, or till I make her want me, which comes to the same thing. If the anonymous letter falls by any accident into her hands, she will find disparaging allusions in it to myself, purposely introduced to suggest that the writer must be one of the persons whom I addressed when conducting her inquiries. If Mrs. Lecount takes the business in hand, and lays a trap for me—I decline her tempting invitation, by becoming totally ignorant of the whole affair the instant any second person appears in it. Let the end come as it may, here I am ready to profit by it; here I am, facing both ways with perfect ease and security—here, agriculturist, with his eye on two crops at once, and his swindler's sickle ready for any emergency.

For the last week to come the newspaper will be more interesting to me than ever. I wonder which side I shall eventually belong to?

THE THIRD SCENE.

VAUXHALL WALK, LAMBETH.

CHAPTER I.

THE old Archiepiscopal Palace of Lambeth, on the southern bank of the Thames—with its Bishop's Walk and Garden, and its terrace fronting the river—is an architectural relic of the London of former times, precious to all lovers of the picturesque in the nineteenth London of the present day. Southward of this venerable structure lies the street labyrinth of Lambeth; and nearly midway in that part of the town are houses which is placed nearest to the river runs the dingy district called Vauxhall Walk. In former days, known by the name of Vauxhall Walk.

The net-work of dismal streets stretching over this surrounding district presents a strong population for the most part of the poorer order. In the thoroughfares, even those frequented the social struggle with poverty shows itself unreservedly on the filthy pavement, gathers its forces through the day, and, intensifying itself in a tumult on Saturday night, sees the Sunday morning dawn in murky gaslight. Miserable women, slipshod and slatternly, haunt the butchers' shops in such London localities as these with little of the money in their pockets but the public house clutched fast in their hands, with eyes that devour the meat they dare not buy, with eager fingers that grope covetously, in the lappets of their ticker sisters touch a precious stone. In this district, in one respect, it resembles also the wealthy quarters of the metropolis, the hideous London vagabond—with the filth of the street contrasted in his squalid person, the mud of the street outdirted in his clothes—lounges, lowering and brutal, at the street corner and in the gin-shop door. The public disgrace of his country, the unceasing warning of social treason, the peril of the State, find but little welcome reception at the hands of Progress—which has reformed so much in manners, and altered so little in men—among the dregs of humanity that scatters its pestiferous to the winds. Here, while the material prosperity flows like another Pelshazzar, on the spectacle of its own magnificence, is the Writing on the Wall, which warns the proud nation that it is found wanting in the balance, and his power found wanting.

Situated in a neighborhood which in former days hall Walk gains by comparison, and establishes claims to respectability which no impartial observation can deny. The main feature in the prosperous section of the Walk is still composed of private houses. In the scattered situations where shops appear, those shops are not thronged by the crowds of more populous thoroughfares. Commerce is not outwardly there, nor is the public money besieged by loud invitations to "buy. Bird-fanciers have sought the congenial tranquillity of this scene; and have established a singing-school in Vauxhall Walk. Second-hand carts and cabs, friends of all weathers, and second-hand carriage wheels for those who may want one to make up a set, are all to be found here in the same repository. One house, and one only, turns its back on the other, on the day when she passes Noel Vanstone's door—the house in question.

Vauxhall Walk is the most charming of all Walks in the city of Lambeth. Here, in the days when the Archbishops of Canterbury were the great people of the district, the dignitaries of the Archiepiscopal Palace were accustomed to take their pleasure during the summer seasons of a century—spreads, at this day, an awful stillness of mud and rubbish. Only the second half of Vauxhall Gardens meandering in the open air.

On the same day when Captain Wragge completed the last entry in his Chronicle of Events, a woman appeared at the western door of the houses in Vauxhall Walk, and removed from the glass a printed paper which had been tendered to it, announcing that Apartments were to let. The apartments consisted of two rooms on the first floor. They had just been cleaned, as a word certain, by two ladies who had paid in advance. Those two ladies being Magdalen and Mrs. Wragge.

As soon as the mistress of the house had left the room, Magdalen looked at the paper which she cautiously looked out from it at the row of building opposite. They were of superior pretension in size and appearance to the other houses in the Walk: the date at which they had been erected was inscribed on one of them, and was stated to be the year 1759. They stood back from the pavement, separated from it by little strips of garden ground. The peculiarity of position, added to the breadth of the roadway interposed between them and the houses on the opposite, made it impossible for Magdalen to see any one who might come to the windows from the bare general outline of dress and figure. Nevertheless there she stood, anxiously fixing her eyes on one house in the row, nearly opposite to her—the house she had looked for before, entering the neighborhood; the house inhabited at that moment by Noel Vanstone and Mrs. Lecount.

After keeping watch at the window in silence, for ten minutes or more, she suddenly looked back into the room, to observe the effect which the prospect might have produced on the hurrying companion.

The slightest cause appeared for any apprehension in that quarter. Mrs. Wragge was seated at the table, absorbed in the arrangement of a series of cookery-books, with their prize lists, issued by advertising tradespeople, and flying in at the pub-inviting doors as they left the London terminus. "I've often heard tell of the cooking," said Mrs. Wragge, resitously shifting the positions of the cookeries, as a child resitously shifts the positions of a new set of toys. "Here's bath reading printed in pretty colors. Here's all the Things I'm going to buy when I'm up shopping to-morrow. Lend us a pencil, please —you don't be angry, will you?—and let me do so with to mark 'em off." She looked up at Magdalen, knocked joyfully over her own altered circumstances, and beat her pencil-handle on the table in irrepressible delight. "O No cookery-book!" cried Mrs. Wragge. "No Burning in my bed: no Captain to shave to-morrow! I'm all bed, at bed; my cap's on one-side; and nobody bein' by, I'm a-going to practise a little swearing for mistake!" Her handkerchief to drum again on the table before she could put Magdalen quite ed them by presenting her with a pencil. Mrs. Wragge instantly recovered her dignity, squared herself to the table, and began to write like a legitimary shopping for the rest of the evening.

Magdalen left the window. She took a chair, seated herself behind the fugitive, and steadily fixed her eyes once more on the house opposite.

The blinds were down over the windows of the first floor and the second. The window of the ground floor was open, but only partially screened by curtains of the commonest material and partly open, but no living creature came near it. Doors opened, and people came out from the houses on either side; children by the dozen poured out on the pavement to play, and invited the whole neighborhood to the entertainment by balls and shuttlecocks; streams of people passed backward and forward incessantly; heavy wagons, piled high with goods, lumbered along the road, on their way to, or their way from, the railway station at the end of the Walk; but the district stirred with its ceaseless activity in every direction but one. The house passed—and there was the house opposite with its blinds down, still not a sign of human existence, inside or out. The one object which had attracted Magdalen's personally venturing herself in Vauxhall Walk—the object of studying the looks, manners, and habits of the living people of the house from a post of observation known only to herself—was, thus far, entirely baffled in its purpose.

Shortly after six o'clock the landlady dated Mrs. Wragge's attention to the preparations for tea for dinner. Magdalen placed herself at the table, in a position which still enabled her to command the view from the window which Mrs. Wragge's ed. The dinner came to an end; Mrs. Wragge (lulled by the sarcastic influences of anointing herself with the contents of a pint pot) was in appetite sharpened by the captain's absence) with drew to set about it, and Magdalen was in attitude which would have caused her husband the acutest mental suffering; seven o'clock struck in shadow on the pavement, and the shadow crept stealthily on the gray pavement and the brown house window and still the blinds opposite remained shut; still the one window open showed nothing but the black blank of the room in the background, and still not a living head was seen a tomb.

Mrs. Wragge's meek snoring deepened in tone: the evening wore on drearily; it was close on eight o'clock—when an event happened at last to break the monotony which enclosed the position of the house opposite.

The window of the first floor was thrown open. Two servant-girls appeared on the balcony. The first came to her shoulders, and looked like a servant. She had a large door-key in her hand, and was evidently going out on an errand. She stood. Roused, partly by curiosity—partly by the impulse of the moment, which urged her always to use natural means of relief from the constant existence of many hours past—Magdalen ventured to open the door, and encouraged by a look from the servant to her destination, wherever it might be.

The woman led her to the great thoroughfare at the end of the Walk, called Vauxhall Walk. After proceeding some little distance, and hearing about her with the bustling noise of a busy street, well acquainted with the neighborhood, the servant crossed the road, and entered a stationer's shop. Magdalen crossed the road after her, and followed her in.

The inevitable delay in entering the shop under these circumstances made Magdalen too late to hear what the woman asked for. The first words spoken which reached her ears were from the counter reached her ears, and informed her that the servant's object was to buy a railway Guide.

"Do you mean a Guide for this month? or a Guide for July?" asked the shopman, addressing his customer.

"Master didn't tell me which," answered the woman. "All I know is, he says he's going to-morrow by the first train."

"The day after to-morrow is the first of July," said the shopman. "The Guide your master wants is the Guide for the new month. It won't be published till to-morrow."

Engaging to call again on the next day the servant left the shop and took the way that led to Vauxhall Walk.

Magdalen purchased the first trifle she saw on the counter, and hastily returned in the same direction. The discovery she had just made was of very serious importance to her; and she felt the necessity of acting on it with as little delay as possible.

On entering the front room at the lodgings she found Mrs. Wragge just awake, lost in drowsy bewilderment, with her cap full of her own shoulders, and with one of her shoes missing altogether. Magdalen endeavored to persuade her that she was tired after her journey, and that her wisest proceeding would be to go to bed. Mrs. Wragge was perfectly willing to profit by this suggestion, provided she could find her shoe first. In looking for the shoe she unfortunately discovered the circulars, put by on a side-table, and forthwith recovered her recollection of the earlier proceedings of the evening.

"Give us the pen-oil," said Mrs. Wragge, shuffling the circulars in a violent hurry. "I can't go to bed yet—I haven't half done making down the things I want. Let's see; where did I leave off? Try Finch's feeding-bottle for Infants. No! there's a cross against that: the cross means I don't want it. Comfort in the Field. Buckler's Waterproof Hunting Breeches. Oh, dear, dear! I've lost the place. No, I haven't! Here it is; here's my mark against it. Elegant Cashmere Robes: strictly retail, very great quantity to be run passed, nineteen, and sixpence. Die in time, Only three left. Only three! Oh do lend us the money, and let's go and get one!"

"Not to-night," said Magdalen. "Suppose you go to bed now, and think the matter to-morrow? I will put them by the bedside for you; and you can go on with them in the morning." She rose as she spoke, and began to collect the circulars.

This suggestion met with Mrs. Wragge's immediate approval. Magdalen took her up the next room, and put her to bed like a child—with her tory by her side. The room was so narrow and the bed was so small, that the latter, being arraged in the white apparel proper for the occasion—with her mouse-like frizzled cap on, and spacious halo of night-cap—looked so hugely and disproportionately large, that Magdalen, anxious as she was, could not repress a smile at the grotesque of her traveling companion for the night.

"Ah!" cried Mrs. Wragge, suddenly, "how well have that Cashmere Robe to-morrow. Come here! I want to whisper something to you. Just you look at me—I'm going to sleep, I suppose, and the captain's not here to bawl at me?"

The front-room at the lodgings contained a sofa-bedstead, which the landlady arranged before for the night. This done, and the night-cap brought in, Magdalen was left alone to shape her future course as her own thoughts counseled her.

The questions and answers which had passed in her presence that evening at the stationer's shop had plainly to her mind's eye pointed out the more would bring Noel Vanstone's present term of residence in Vauxhall Walk to an end. Her first cautious inquiries had been directed to whether in unsuspected observation of the house opposite before she was exposed openly inside was entirely frustrated by the turn events had taken. She was placed in the dilemma of running all risks heading on the best way—of not knowing what the future opportunity, which might never occur. There was no middle course open to her. Once she had seen Noel Vanstone with her own eyes, and had discovered the worst there was to fear from Mrs. Lecount—until she had learned all that doubt, with the needful precaution of keeping her own identity carefully in the dark—at a step could she advance with safety to the accomplishment of the purpose which had brought her to London.

One after another the minutes of the night passed away; one after another the thronging thoughts followed each other over her wakeful mind—and still she reached no conclusion; still she faltered and doubted, with a helplessness new to her in her experience of herself. At last she passed the room impatiently, to seek the trivial relief of looking for trunk, and of opening it—at the few things that she wanted for the night. Captain Wragge's sanguine had not deceived him. There, hidden between two dresses, were the articles of costume which he had missed from her box at Birmingham. She turned them over, one by one, to satisfy herself that nothing she wanted had been forgotten, and returned once more to her post of observation by the window.

The house opposite was dark down to the parlor. There, the blind, previously raised, was now drawn over the window: the light burning behind it showed her for the first time that the room was inhabited. Her eye brightened, and her color rose as she looked at it.

"There he is!" she said to herself, in a low, angry whisper. "There he lives on our money, in the house, with his father's warning his closed against me!" She dropped the blind, and, with her head raised to look out, returned to her trunk, and took from it the gray wig which was part of her dramatic costume in the character of the North-country lady. The wig had been crumpled in packing: she put it on, and went to the table to comb it out. "His father has warned him against Magdalen Vanstone!" she said, repeating the passage in Mrs. Lecount's letter, and laughing bitterly as she looked at herself in the glass. "I wonder whether his father has warned him against Miss Garth? To-morrow is sooner than I bargained for. No matter, to-morrow shall show."

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 75; Leather, $3 00; Half Calf, $3 50; Roan with Tucks, $3 50.

The object of this work is to give a clear and distinct outline, or a skeleton tour through the different cities and countries of Europe and the East, with the names of the principal works of art by the leading masters in all the galleries, and the routes to be taken, the distances, &c. Its success has been unprecedented, and from the test of traveling the different routes and the time allowed, it is found to be a reference without knowledge of language, and the innumerable number of small charges which tend to make up the sum of the heavy expense, so that travellers may not only be able to travel without fatigue, but may thereby travel for a much less sum. It has been found in this work a fund of entertainment; the first, to be read in anticipation of the tour, the next, and the second, what they ought to have done.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1862.

BEFORE RICHMOND.

IN all human probability the decisive battle of the war will be fought before Richmond before this paper reaches our subscribers. On Friday last, 20th, General M'Clellan was ready. He had his works complete, and his artillery massed. He was prepared at any moment to open an artillery fire upon the rebels which they could not answer. Every soldier in the army of the Potomac knew well that day that the battle was only a few hours distant.

Most of the correspondents appear calmly confident of the result. The army is in such splendid condition, it is led by a commander who inspires such unbounded confidence, it is accompanied by so enormous a force of artillery, and it is so thoroughly impressed with the fact that we are sincere, that officers, men, and newspaper-writers all predict a triumph—bloody, it may be, but decisive. We need not say that we most earnestly and prayerfully trust these hopeful presages may be fulfilled.

In the event of success before Richmond, the war on the Atlantic, like the war on the Mississippi, will virtually be over. There will still remain small armies to be dispersed and overcome, forts to be taken, guerrillas to be shot, but the critical question of the division of the country will have been determined.

For there is no section of country south of Virginia and Tennessee in which the rebels can embody such an army as could begin to resist the Union forces. Davis and Lee, retreating into North Carolina or the Gulf States, will perish in a given period of time from want of subsistence and, just as Beauregard's army is scattering in Mississippi from the same cause, the corresponding disbandment contracted for the army to fly in Mississippi, of 200,000 head of cattle and sheep from the States lying north of the Gulf coast. It is in effect to protect these cattle across the river that Vicksburg is so resolutely holding out. By this time Farragut has probably given a good account of that obstinate city, and not another head of cattle will cross the river.

The result will be the same if the rebels should evacuate instead of fighting before Richmond. If they are going to carry on this war, they must begin the organization of enormous granary and great country to subsist a large army. This involves, as a necessity, a continued and undisputed rebel occupation of the plains and valleys of Virginia.

IMPORTANT POLITICAL MOVEMENT.

We have obtained information of a very important political movement which has taken place in this city, and which is likely to exercise no small influence upon the destinies of this State and the Union. It seems that, a few evenings since, a select party of bankers, shipping-merchants, publishers, lawyers, and editors met in a private room at one of our hotels, and resolved to organize a new party to be known as THE ANTE-BELLUMS.

A PROMINENT BANKER observed that, in his opinion, things were going from bad to worse for many years. The encroachments of the executive were becoming intolerable: witness the expedition of the navy yard to Port Royal. He believed in leaving rebeldom entirely free, and if a man was found in arms against the Union as his condition; it was necessary that the spiritual condition of the slaves in South Carolina was for superior to the bodily welfare of the negroes in Ashantee. He went in for saving souls where he could. He thought the legislature of South Carolina was right, and advised a recurrence to the old colonial laws, under which his ancestors in Rhode Island had done uncommonly well for several generations.

AN EDITOR, in reply, wished to say that he was for the speedy termination of the war. But he wished to proceed with some regard to humanity. He was opposed to the shedding of blood, especially on the part of our young men, the Native States. He could wish that General M'Clellan should be driven to his sweet retirement on Hawk earthquake in the direction of Richmond, after which a deputation should be sent to Jeff Davis to offer him the command of the Presidency over the river of peace. His blood boiled when he thought of the murder of those who had escaped from their masters during the present war. He understood that General Lee, whom he was proud to call his friend, had offered to shoot any of his own slaves. Why were they not returned? Was the Government a common thief? He was not a churchman himself, but he had a friend who went regularly to meeting and who informed him that in Deuteronomy—

Here the SPEAKER was interrupted by a boy, who came in with a list of our killed and wounded at Fairoaks, which the editor began to copy for his paper.

A LAWYER remarked that the authors of the war were the people of New England, and that they were the real disunionists. A popular impression existed that it was the people of South Carolina who fired the first gun in the war. This was a mistake. It was Buchanan's administration which gave arms to the people of South Carolina. He was bound to admit that the former had sent a few troops to support the President, while the latter had dispatched her volunteers against Sumter. But appearances were often deceitful. The South Carolinians were a whole-souled people, incapable of dishonest dealing; whereas he knew from experience that the New Englanders were rogues. He had a case—

Here he was called to order by THE CHAIRMAN, who remarked, that while he was glad to hear that their friend the Lawyer had got a case at last, it had nothing to do with the object of the meeting. They had met there to see if something could not be done to save the life of human civilization, which was sweeping before it the whole-hearted citizens, and the whole country in which they all naturally clung. He would call upon his neighbor, the Banker, to ventilate his opinions.

THE BANKER remarked that the great trouble in this country was its extraordinary financial inaccuracy. His friend, Lord Timgumbob, had told him so when he met him in Pall Mall, and he was convinced of the fact. In England, where the large slave-owners constituted an aristocracy; not to build a house was to be wicked, to defraud, and many of the young men at the Bath were apt to gamble away their niggers: he had himself won a yellow girl at poker, and sold her six months afterward for $2500 (ha! ha!); but still the South had an aristocracy, and this was the secret of the disinclination of Southern men to Northerners. He was decidedly in favor of the organization of a new party at the North headed by Governor Seymour. He thought the United States required a hereditary aristocracy selected from the . . . bankers, merchants, . . . bankers, lawyers, . . . gentlemen of property, and so forth. If a plank to this effect were inserted in the platform of the new party they might count him in.

A POLITICIAN congratulated the meeting upon the unanimity of the views expressed by his speakers, and the firm front they proposed to present to the pernicious principles of the day. The present disastrous crisis of the country he had taken his side some time since, and proposed to stand by it. He was in favor of the war. He was for the way he wanted the stein qua non fathom absolutely required. He wished to see his friend Governor (now General) Toombs, of Georgia, in his place in the Senate; his friend and correspondent Senator Mason, now abroad in Europe, at the head of the Senate Committee on foreign relations; his old acquaintance, Mr. Slidell, in the position of chief control of the Committee on Military Affairs, which his experience during the present war will so admirably fit him; and Judge Campbell re-appointed United States Commissioner of Lotteries, with a large percentage on the sale of policies. He agreed with his friend the Lawyer in the opinion that the North was at least as largely responsible for the war as the South. He could see no difference himself between an Abolitionist and a Secessionist—a friend of freedom and a friend of slavery—a friend of the Government and a traitor. They were all one to him. With these few remarks he moved the following resolutions:

Whereas, the rascality and diabolical conduct of the North, are States, and especially Massachusetts, Vermont, and Michigan, have plunged this country into a horrible civil war; and whereas the blood-thirsty representatives from these States openly proclaim by votes and by speech, during the advice of such pure patriots as Breckinridge, Vallandigham, and Fernando Wood, giving up every thing demanded by the Southern people:

And whereas, The Southerners have already proved their valor, and the superiority of subjugating them by force of arms:

Be it resolved, 1. That the times call for the establishment of a new Northern party consisting of all the virtue and worth, and the whole property of the North, to stand out and keep down the rascally, Jacobinical, radical faction.

2. That the cardinal principle of this party be THE NEGATIVE OF WHAT WE ARE OPPOSED TO, viz., Slidell, Breckinridge, Davis, and Buchanan, in the Senate, Fryer, Pendleton, and Vallandigham in the House, Seymour in law in full operation throughout the North, and slavery in all the Territories present and future.

3. That with a view to conciliate the Southern brethren, the officers of the Southern army should be admitted into the United States army on the footing they were before the war, and that the supreme command be given to General Beauregard, who should be appointed Lieutenant-General for life.

4. That Major-General Lovell be invited to resume his position as Street-Inspector in this city.

5. That the Legislature be called for treason, and, if possible, hanged.

6. That a monument be raised in the city of Boston to the memory of the late Preston Brooks, whose Christian character was so beautifully prototype of the conduct of the Southern friends during the present crisis.

7. That Robert Smalls, the nigger who ran away from his owners in South Carolina with a valuable vessel, be returned under a flag of truce, and Commodore Dupont, who detained him in the service of the United States, be dismissed from the service.

8. That the negro who gave Colonel Ready information of the approach of the enemy at Front Royal receive one hundred lashes well laid on from the cowhide of his particular pet.

9. That the true object of the establishment of the Government of the United States was the protection and maintenance of the rights of the Southern people, and whereas a law of Congress should render it penal, from whatever motive, to speak censoringly; in any public discourse, of freedom of thought, of the press, of religion, or of secret should be appointed by Congress, on each Fourth of July, to explain to the people the true principles of the claims of the whipping-post, the advantages of the iron collar, the merits of the branding-iron, the virtues of the cowhide, and the general common sense of making people work without wages.

10. That Russia having announced the emancipation of her serfs, Alexander should no longer be looked upon as that Spain be warned that if she carries out the project of her leading statesmen for the emancipation of the negroes in Cuba and Porto Rico, the United States will consider it a casus belli; and that any and case treaties of friendship and amity be concluded with the Emperor of Dr. til, the King of Dahomey, and the Sultan of Turkey.

11. That it being the deliberate sense of the members of this party that the world is going headlong to rot—that civilization is a failure—that Christianity is chaotic—we take the name and title of THE ANTEDILUVIANS.

These resolutions, having been put to the vote, were carried now-nem. con.; and the meeting separated in high good-humor.

THE LOUNGER.

A LOOK IN THE LULL.

SINCE the battle of Fairoaks there has been a lull. It may be broken at any moment, and may occupy Richmond either by the evacuation of the enemy or by a bloody engagement.

Yet one thing is now so clear that it should be included in every estimate of the future. It is that the rebellion will exist with an organized power, or state, or government, which, when it has lost its capital and is universally defeated, proposes terms of submission. Even with a vast horde of bandits. Practically they are that. They are none too hard for civilization to crush in arms. If they derive from one point, as at Corinth, they reappear, either together or separately, elsewhere. At this every intelligent mind will be surprising to see that the large slave-traders now Orleans, or has reinforced Charleston, or Richmond, or Jackson in the Shenandoah Valley. If they retire from Richmond they may secretly and rapidly withdraw to the Gulf States, and reappear before them at Jackson drove Banks. How do we know that fifty thousand men have not been sent to Jackson while the remainder hold the attention of M'Clellan? At any moment we should not be surprised at a rebel force, and for a fall retreat. In Congress he was a vehement slavery agitator, defending slavery in America at zealously as he had defended liberty in France. Now he has been sent home as Minister to Spain.

In Madrid he shot the French Embassador in a duel; helped the insurrection of August, 1854; went to Ostend, and prepared the manifesto which, in that hole, Pierce, Buchanan and Mason, with the scope of which was to justify stealing Cuba from Spain. That could not be bought in order to secure the dominance of the slaveholding interest in the government of the country. Meantime, but the American people would feel about Mr. Soulé Spain, and be unwilling to commit so infamous an injustice even for the advantage of the Northern interest. Mr. Soulé consulted from the State Department a reciprocity treaty of trade between the United States and Cuba which, during the absence of the Minister, the Secretary, the Lieutenant Chargé d'Affaires—had negotiated with the foreign Government. In 1857 Mr. Soulé returned. When the rebellion broke out he was said to be opposed to the secession of Louisiana. But upon the capture of New Orleans he was found to be a chief of the rebels.

Mr. Soulé must be nearly sixty years old.

CONCILIATION AND EXASPERATION.

WHILE we are fighting the rebels let us fight as fiercely as we can. When we have conquered them we may be as lenient as we will. The nation may then afford to be generous. But while they are in rank and file; but that is no reason, while she still fighting for success, that it should not miss and the most effective. Suppose that all of every individual rebel which it may need.

The letter from the army before Richmond have seemed with studious care to expurgate all who openly and scornfully announced their treason and their purpose to protected the rebels and our soldiers lay dying in agony upon the roads and fields from wounds received from the friends of such traitors. Is that right? From the correspondence. If these stories are true it is a sad business. It is not to be charged, and it is very ill to be believed. The presence of the National army teaches such a property-holder only contempt for the Government. It is not to be made to find the courage of rebellion? Yes, and in what way is it dangerous to be made? Does one doubt that, if the rebels be occupied every house upon the road and put the overs under the strictest surveillance, the main communications of M'Clellan would be secure? would not have been almost cut off. If the rebels are not taught to fear us, they never certainly will see us respect us in peace. Ravages from their own men they forgive from sympathy with the cause. Our conciliation is contempt. Our war is severe. In fact. Do you think another kind of treatment would "exasperate" them? Will suppose they were exasperated, would they "conciliate" us? Was a more desperate and ferocious war than they are waging now?

When they are conquered, you may do what you will. But you can not conquer them so long as they think you can. Then you conquer the war of fire-arms at all, it requires that they shall be beaten till hall and cannot fight any more. A soldier who means to aim ever fires over the head of his enemy. In Winchester, when a Union lady was remonstrated with upon the rebels in the hospital, she asked him if he did not think the rebel wounded in our hands were not well treated. He replied fiercely, "Of course, you don't dare to treat us otherwise."

The wounded and sick whether loyal or false, can not be too carefully treated. But why should they be rebels, when they have to be such enemy goes straight to the support of the rebel army, have their houses carefully protected and their clover fields scrupulously respected?

HANGING.

DURING the early spring, just after we had occupied Nashville, a Union man from the Border States was talking in a circle of persons of secession sympathies in a hotel in the city. "Very well," said he, "I am glad we have got so far; but I don't think our Generals understand how to develop Union sentiment. I know an infallible method."

The round table turned their inquiring eyes upon the speaker, and one of them asked the recipe.

"It's very simple," was the answer. "I would take military possession, for instance, of Nashville. The moment I was established I would order an election. The ballots should be printed 'Union' and 'Disunion.' The election should be absolutely free. No coercion should be attempted. Every man's name should be recorded as he delivered his ballot, and his vote with it. Then I would carefully examine them all; and every man who voted for disunion should be hung—every man."

Secesh listened with open mouths.

"Then," continued he, "I would advance to the next city, and pursue the same method. The third city would be unanimous for the Union before I reached it."

General Butler evidently proposes to develop Union sentiment in New Orleans in a somewhat similar manner; not indeed by indiscriminate hanging, but by showing no fear of resorting to that extremity upon proof of dangerous guilt.

War is tragical business. Whoever appeals to it as a remedy must be very sure that his grievance hurts more than the cure. This is the lesson General Butler is teaching. War, at its best, has no amenities. What are called so are actions that are not warlike. War is essentially brutal; it is the appeal to superior physical force. The amenities of war are the interpolations of humanity, because men can not be altogether brutes.

It is a terrible thing that a criminal should be hung, but it is much more terrible that thousands of brave and honest men should die of ghastly wounds and frightful pestilence because that criminal, and men like him, have, without a decent pretext even, drawn the sword and forced society to defend itself. A man hanging from a window is an argument such persons can understand. Loss of life, of limb, of property, of liberty—this is war, this is the tribunal to which these persons appealed. It is for wisdom to determine how much life, limb, property, and liberty shall be lost. Human experience shows that a fierce rebellion once subdued by arms is finally most effectually suppressed by punishing the leaders and pardoning the followers. Mumford was hung for precisely the same reasons that Davis, Beauregard, Cobb, Benjamin, Floyd, Walker, Randolph, Lee, and the rest would be hung. If they should be pardoned, Mumford should have been.

JOHN BULL BACKING A FRIEND.

The London Times is confessedly the peculiar organ of John Bull. It defended and justified this rebellion in every way so long as it had a chance of success. The rebels were taken at their own valuation. They were a high-spirited, refined, and generous people, struggling for liberty against a brutal lust of power. The day of darkness for the insurrection comes, and behold the value of John Bull's sympathy! Contemplate the high-spirited, refined, and generous soldiers of liberty (see A. H. Stephens's speech) as now painted by their great ally the Times:

"Thus have fared the secession agents in their own chosen field of action—European agitation. Their adversity is entirely unconnected with the fortunes of war. Their manœuvres began at least half a year before any State seceded; and this correspondence bears earlier dates than that of any Confederate reverse in the war. They are a set of ignorant, narrow-minded, conceited slaveholders, and agents of slaveholders—infirm in judgment and reckless about truth, as slaveholders get to be in all countries and all times. They despised the strength of the Free States, not understanding the causes of that strength; and they partly blinded themselves, in the desire to blind others, to the weakness of their own enterprise. Though their defeats in the field had not begun, they must have been more or less discouraged by their own failure to obtain support in Europe, even by such reckless promises and such delusive representations as they did not scruple to offer; and now the exposure of their correspondence through the press must crown their mortifications."

Is it wonderful that every nation in the world so dearly loves John Bull?

OBEYING LAW.

Those who are so profoundly troubled at the eternal difficulty in executing the Fugitive Slave Law would profitably spend a moment in answering the question, Why is it always so difficult? There are people who seem to think that no man can possibly have a real love of his country, of the Union, and of constitutional liberty, if he does not rush with the utmost glee to the enforcement of this law. A hundred years ago it was the English law in Ireland that if a son informed against his father as a papist, his property should be taken from him and given to the son. It was the law of Herod that all children under two years of age should be murdered. Don't you think the people of Jerusalem would have shown their good citizenship by running round and stabbing each other's children?

There is no need of taking leave of common-sense in any question. A law is not necessarily a good or wise or honorable regulation because it is law; and wherever it violently contravenes the moral instincts of the people it will become obsolete, even if it be not repealed. Cruel or unjust laws—those which the popular heart rejects—can never be easily enforced. In a despotism or monarchy they will lead to rebellion if the attempt is persistently made. In a popular government like ours they will fall into desuetude by common consent, and will at last be repealed.

To return a helpless, hopeless, innocent man to a worse condition than that which he risks his life in trying to escape, can not possibly be made decent, honorable, gentlemanly, humane, or manly. But it may be law—and obedience to law is essential to the peaceful existence of civil society. What, then, is to be done? How are we to maintain the authority of law and yet avoid doing a mean injustice? This is the question that has perplexed many a sincere and candid youth in this country—in Boston, say, ten years ago, when he shouldered his musket and, with crimson cheek and accusing heart, escorted Anthony Burns back to the slave-whip. It is a terrible law, he said; but if law is not enforced where are we?

And yet the solution is easy. Law is obeyed either by following its behest or suffering its penalty; and in this country, where discussion is free and the people make the laws, if there be a bad law—not an inconvenient law, but a wicked one—the duty of a good citizen is, not to invoke anarchy by violent resistance to it, but while he bears the penalty of disobedience, to exhort other citizens to do the same, and to show why the law should be changed. Thus he shows respect for the authority of law, yet keeps his hands and heart pure.

Take the Fugitive Slave Law as an illustration. Of course every honorable man would as soon strike his mother because the law ordered it as run after a fugitive. If he were summoned he would say, as Henry Clay did, that he was a man not a bloodhound. If he were charged in the name of the law to assist, he would say, "I yield to the penalty, and so acknowledge the authority of law." If he were imprisoned, and the law were executed by protesting soldiers, how long before a law which honorable men repudiated, and which only military force could execute, would be repealed or become obsolete? Washington once sought to recover a fugitive slave, but finding that the claim produced popular excitement, he begged that it might not be pressed. Why? Because he knew that this law, unlike other laws which affect only material interests, touched the moral instincts.

If those people at the North who own no slaves, and who think that the eager return of fugitives is the grand bond of union in this nation, were as wise as Washington, who did own them, and in this case reclaimed one, they would see why it is so difficult to execute such a law. It is a matter of feeling which every honorable man understands. Among an intelligent, prospering, moral, free, and therefore law respecting, people, the execution of a cruel law is constantly more and more impracticable, and that fact is an unerring sign of the stability and security of that people.

PARSON BROWNLOW'S BOOK.

This book is as remarkable as the speech of the author at the Academy of Music, of which we have already spoken in these columns. It is the fiery record of the sufferings of a true-hearted American citizen guilty of loving his country, and reveals the essential character of the rebellion. It also shows in its trenchant vituperation, its deep, bitter craving for retaliation, the influence and consequence of the social condition in which the writer was born and has lived. No man can read it without a renewed vow that this unholy insurrection against law, humanity, and liberty, shall be utterly crushed at any cost. Nor is there any work whose universal circulation among the mass of Northern and loyal citizens would be more inspiring and valuable than Parson Brownlow's book.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Pitts's Proposal.—Pitts is a fast man, a sharp man, and a man of business tact. When Pitts goes to make a purchase, he always gets the lowest cash price; and then says, "Well, I'll look about, and if I don't find any thing that suits me better, I'll call and take this." Pitts, like all fast men, is partial to the ladies, young ones in particular. Now, lately, Pitts says to himself: "I am getting rather long in years, and so I'll marry." His business qualities wouldn't let him wait; so off he travels, calls upon a lady friend, and opens conversation by remarking that he would like to know what she thought about his getting married. "Oh, Mr. Pitts, that is an affair in which I am not very greatly interested, and I prefer to leave it with yourself." "But," says Pitts, "you are interested; and, my dear girl, will you marry me?" The young lady blushed very red, and hesitated; finally, as Pitts was very well to do in the world, and of good standing in society, she accepted him. Whereupon the matter-of-fact Pitts responded: "Well, I'll look about, and if I don't find any body that suits me better, I'll come back."

"Before rising in the morning, she says, 'O dear, I must get up! but I don't want to.' After breakfast she adds, 'Well, I suppose I must go to work, but I don't want to;' and she goes to bed, saying, 'There, I have been passing all day, and haven't done any thing!'"

Four Words to Three.—A Gascon officer, who had served under Henry IV. without receiving any pay for a considerable time, came to the king, and confidently said to him, "Sir, three words with you, money or discharge!" "Four with you," answered his Majesty; "neither one nor other!"

A bad Spell.—"Thomas, spell weather," said a schoolmaster to one of his pupils. "W-i-e-a-t-h-i-o-u-r, weather." "Well, Thomas, you may sit down," said the teacher. "I think this is the worst spell of weather we have had since Christmas."

"Isn't your hat sleepy?" inquired a little urchin of a gentleman with a "shocking bad one." "No; why?" inquired the gentleman. "Because I think it's a long time since it had a nap," was the answer.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, June 17, in the Senate, the Military Committee reported back the bill providing for an increase of the medical corps of the army. Senator Chandler, of Michigan, offered a resolution, which was laid over, that the amount of legal tender notes already authorized by law shall never be increased, but the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to issue "ten-day certificates," bearing five per cent. interest, in addition to the fifty millions already authorized by law. The Pacific Railroad bill was then taken up. After some discussion, an amendment was agreed to fixing the point of commencement of the road on the one hundredth parallel of longitude, within the Territory of Nebraska.——In the House, the Select Committee on Confiscation reported to the House Mr. Potter's bill, designating what classes of rebels shall forfeit their slaves; but no further action was taken on the subject. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the issue of additional Treasury notes, and Mr. Spaulding, of the Committee of Ways and Means, explained its provisions. The House concurred in the Senate's substitute for Mr. Arnold's bill, which forever prohibits slavery in the Territories now existing, or which may at any time hereafter be formed or acquired. The Senate bill donating lands to the States and Territories for the establishment of colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts was passed by a vote of eighty-nine to twenty-five. The House then adjourned.

On Wednesday, June 18, in the Senate, the bill for the better government of the navy was reported back by the Naval Committee. A joint resolution, that Congress finally adjourn on 30th inst., was laid over. Senator Hale introduced a bill providing that, when necessary to make further enlistments, the President is authorized, by proclamation, to call on all persons, without distinction of race, color, or condition, to enlist in the army. The bill further provides that every slave enlisted under such proclamation of the President shall be ever thereafter free, and entitled to all the bounties, privileges, etc., of other soldiers in the army. Referred. The bill to prevent a further issue of legal tender notes, and authorizing the issue of one hundred millions of ten-day certificates, bearing five per cent. interest, was referred to the Finance Committee. The Pacific Railroad bill was then taken up and discussed until the adjournment.——In the House, the Senate joint resolution giving a bounty of two dollars each for every enlisted soldier, and the first month's pay in advance, was adopted. The bill emancipating the slaves of certain rebels was passed by a vote of eighty-two against fifty-four. In Committee of the Whole the bill authorizing an additional issue of Treasury notes was discussed till the adjournment.

On Thursday, June 19, in the Senate, the House bill to change the port of entry of Brunswick, Georgia, was passed. A motion to take up the resolution fixing the time for the final adjournment of Congress was disagreed to by a vote of 14 against 22. The bill fixing the pay and emoluments of officers of the army was taken up, and the House amendment, striking out the section deducting ten per cent. from the pay of all military and civil officers of the government during the war, and reducing the mileage of Congressmen fifty per cent., was concurred in by a vote of 29 to 12. The consideration of the Pacific Railroad bill was then resumed, and continued till the adjournment.——In the House, Mr. Lehman tendered to the government, as a free gift, on behalf of the city of Philadelphia, League Island, as a site for a navy-yard. The property cost $310,000. A resolution that Congress finally adjourn on the 30th inst. was adopted by a vote of 103 against 28. The Select Committee on the Defense of the Northern Lakes reported a bill establishing a national foundry at Chicago, and naval dépôts and yards on Lakes Erie, Michigan, and Ontario. Referred.

On Friday, June 20, in the Senate, a bill granting the proceeds of certain lands to the Pacific Railroad Company was referred. The Pacific Railroad bill was taken up. A motion to strike out the section providing for four branch lines at the eastern terminus was rejected—15 to 25—and the bill passed by a vote of thirty-five against five. The Senate then adjourned.——In the House, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill increasing temporarily the duties on imports and for other purposes. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and made the special order for Wednesday. Several private bills were passed, and the House adjourned till Monday.

On Saturday, June 21, in the Senate, several petitions in favor of a bankrupt law were presented and referred. A bill opening post-offices in the insurrectionary districts was passed. The House bill prescribing the oath to all persons holding office under the Government was taken up and discussed till the adjournment.——The House was not in session.

On Monday, June 23, in the Senate, petitions in favor of the passage of a bill confiscating the property of rebels, and asking Congress to extend the protection of the Government over all loyal people in the rebel States, without regard to color, were presented and referred. The Committee on Territories reported a bill for the admission of Western Virginia into the Union. The bill prescribing an additional oath of office to all persons in the service of the Government, except Members of Congress and the Vice-President, was passed. The report of the Conference Committee on the Tax bill was agreed to. The House Confiscation bill was then taken up. A motion was made to substitute the Senate bill, as reported by the select committee on the subject, and pending the question the Senate went into executive session, and subsequently adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Lovejoy asked leave to introduce a bill amendatory of the District of Columbia Emancipation act; but objection was made, and the subject was laid over. The resolution declaring Charles Henry Foster not entitled to a seat as representative from North Carolina was adopted. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the Treasury Note bill. An amendment to the first section, providing for the issue of $150,000,000 of United States notes, not bearing interest, payable to bearer, $100,000,000 of which may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be of a lower denomination than five dollars, was adopted by a vote of fifty-seven against forty-five. The Committee then rose, and Mr. Stevens presented to the House the report of the Conference Committee on the Tax bill, and the report was agreed to. The House then adjourned.

THE ATTACK ON CHARLESTON.

From the papers of Richmond and Charleston we have accounts of a terrible battle fought near Charleston, on James Island, within four miles of that city, on Monday 16th, in which a body of Union troops and some gun-boats were engaged. Judging from the statements of these journals we think that there can be little doubt that the battle at James Island was a great Union victory, which will result in the capture of Charleston before long. The Charleston Mercury, in recounting the story of this battle, represents it as an utter defeat of the Union troops. But it also predicts the fall of the city, and has sent its own printing-press to Columbia, South Carolina.

BATTLE ON THE WHITE RIVER.

The expedition which proceeded up the White River from Memphis, several days since, for the purpose of removing the obstructions to its navigation, has been heard from. The expedition consisted of the gun-boats St. Louis, Lexington, Conestoga, and Mound City, and the Forty-third and Forty-sixth Indiana regiments, commanded by Colonel Fitch. On the 17th the expedition reached St. Charles, 85 miles above the mouth of the river, where two rebel batteries were found, mounting seven guns, and supported by a force of infantry. The gun-boats engaged the batteries, while Colonel Fitch landed his forces some two and a half miles below, and advanced to make an attack. During the action a rifled shot from one of the rebel batteries penetrated the steam drum of the Mound City, and the escaping steam killed and disabled most of her officers and crew. Colonel Fitch then signaled the fleet to cease firing while he made an assault, and the batteries were carried by his troops in the most dashing and gallant manner, and with no loss of life. The rebel infantry were driven from the support of the guns, the gunners were shot at their posts, their commanding officer, Freye (formerly of the navy), was wounded and taken prisoner, and eight brass and iron guns, with ammunition, were captured. The enemy's loss in killed and wounded is estimated at 125. Our loss was caused solely by the escaping steam on board the Mound City. The boat was expected to be repaired and ready to proceed with the expedition the next day.

CUMBERLAND GAP OCCUPIED.

The Secretary of War received a dispatch on 19th from General George W. Morgan, dated at camp near Cumberland Gap, June 18, eight o'clock in the evening, which states that his army commenced its march at one o'clock that morning to attack the enemy at Cumberland Gap; but on their arrival it was found he had evacuated that very important position, his rear-guard having left only about four hours before the arrival of our advance. General Morgan praises the conduct of his division, in its arduous march through an extremely difficult country, and says that his cannon were dragged up the precipitous sides of the Pine and Cumberland mountains by the aid of block and tackle, two hundred men being employed on the ropes of a single piece. In his progress considerable skirmishing with the enemy had taken place; but without any loss on our side. This important position, which has been held by the rebels since the beginning of the war, is now in possession of our troops.

WHERE IS BEAUREGARD?

The latest reports from the vicinity of Corinth state that General Beauregard's army was at Okolona, 80,000 strong. Twenty thousand men, under General Kirby Smith, are at Chattanooga. Fifteen thousand men, under General Price, are at Fulton; and General Van Dorn, with a small force of cavalry, is at Grenada.

The Richmond papers of Saturday publish a dispatch from Montgomery, Alabama, dated the 17th inst., stating that General Beauregard and his staff had arrived there on his way to Richmond, and that a large portion of the army of the Mississippi was to follow him, leaving a considerable force behind under General Bragg.

ANOTHER SKIRMISH ON THE JAMES RIVER.

The rebel batteries at City Point, on the James River, below Fort Darling, opened fire on our fleet on 17th; but the gun-boats returned it so briskly with shell and shrapnel that the batteries were soon silenced, and the rebels retired.

AFFAIRS AT MEMPHIS.

General Lewis Wallace is in military command of Memphis, Tennessee, and has taken possession of the Argus office, a notorious rebel sheet. He has placed two competent men to supervise its future editorials. The vicinity of the city is infested with guerrillas, many of whom are engaged in burning cotton in the southern counties of Mississippi and other points. Trade in Memphis is rapidly improving. Boats going north are filled to their utmost capacity with passengers and freight.

AT NEW ORLEANS.

A Union meeting was held on the 14th inst. in the Lyceum, City Hall building, New Orleans, which was attended by all that the room could accommodate, and was addressed by old residents of the city. After the meeting a procession was extemporized, headed by a band of music and the national flag, and proceeded to the head-quarters of General Butler, where three cheers were given, and the General called out to address the crowd. The Stars and Stripes had also been raised at Gretna, on the other side of the river. Business affairs were gradually improving.

EXECUTION OF MUMFORD.

Letters from New Orleans contain an account of the execution of William B. Mumford, the man who pulled down the American flag on the day of the arrival of our fleet before New Orleans, after it had been run up on one of the Government buildings by some of Commodore Farragut's men. The execution was witnessed by a large concourse of people, who, at its conclusion, retired quietly to their homes.

GUERRILLAS IN MISSOURI.

General Schofield has taken stringent measures to repress the guerrillas in Missouri. He has issued an order holding the rebel sympathizers in that State responsible in their property and persons for all damage done to citizens by marauding parties. He announces that $5000 will be exacted for every Union soldier or loyal citizen killed, and from $1000 to $5000 for every one of either class wounded by any guerrilla party. The full value of all the property destroyed will be assessed and collected from the secessionists residing in the locality where the outrage may be committed.

UNIONISM IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The Newbern Progress states that six regiments in the rebel army from North Carolina have been disbanded at Richmond for their loyalty to the Union, and are at present under guard as traitors to the Jeff Davis bogus Government. Before being disbanded it appears that they hung the brigadier-general who commanded them.

A NEW MILITARY DEPARTMENT.

General Halleck, by General Order No. 33, dated June 12, constitutes the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, east of the Tennesse River, except Forts Henry and Donelson, and such portions of North Alabama and Georgia as are, or may be occupied by our troops, into the District of Ohio, under General Buell, who is ordered to relieve the troops of General Grant's command at Clarksville. The District of West Tennessee will include all that portion of the State west of the Tennessee River, and Forts Henry and Donelson.

NEGRO REGIMENTS.

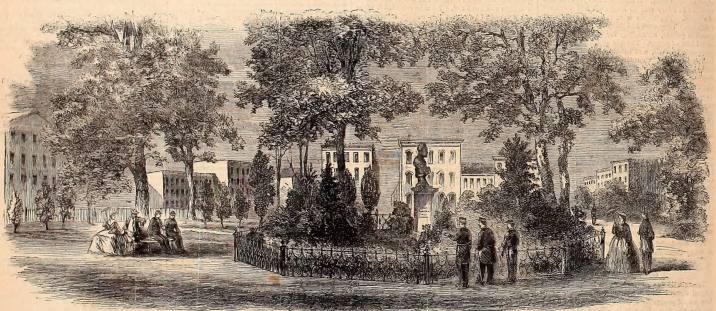
In answer to a resolution passed several days ago by the House of Representatives, inquiring whether General Hunter had raised a negro regiment, Secretary Stanton says that the Department has no official information on the subject. He further says that General Hunter has not been authorized to raise such a regiment, and that, in order to ascertain whether the information is true, a copy of the House resolution has been transmitted to him to report upon.

PREMIUM TO VOLUNTEERS.

The Secretary of War has issued a bulletin giving effect to the law recently passed by Congress, granting a premium for enlisted men, regular or volunteer, and one month's pay in advance to each recruit.

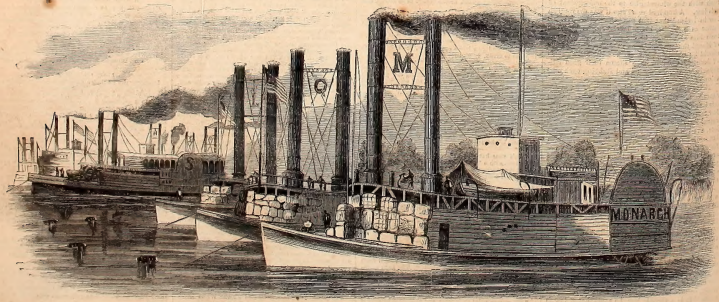
JACK TAR IN LUCK.

Key West correspondence shows that the value of the British and "secesh" ships and cargoes captured by the United States blockading squadron, during the twelve months past, runs up to nearly $2,000,000, an item which will go some length to counterbalance the cost of carrying on the war on the coast, and to recompense our gallant tars.



PERSONAL.

An important change has been made in the Medical Staff of the Army of the Potomac by the appointment of Surgeon Litterman, a skillful physician, as Medical Director of General M'Clellan's army.



A dispatch from Boston yesterday announced that Pierre Soulé and the late Sheriff of New Orleans had arrived there, and had been confined in Fort Warren. Our local columns, however, contain the account of the incarceration of the two persons in question in Fort Lafayette, in New York harbor.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL HOOKER.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL JOSEPH HOOKER, whose portrait we give below, commands a division of the army of the Potomac, and has distinguished himself exceedingly at the Battle of Fairoaks and the other conflicts of the campaign in Virginia.

He was born in Massachusetts about the year 1817, and is consequently about 45 years of age. He entered West Point in 1833, and graduated in the artillery in 1837. At the outbreak of the war with Mexico he accompanied Brigadier-General Hamer as Aid-de-camp, and was brevetted Captain for gallant conduct in several conflicts at Monterey. In March, 1847, he was appointed Assistant-Adjutant-General, with the rank of Captain. At the National Bridge he distinguished himself, and was brevetted Major; and at Chapultepec he again attracted attention by his gallant and meritorious conduct, and was brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel.

At the close of the war with Mexico he withdrew from the service, and soon afterward emigrated to California. The outbreak of the rebellion found him there, and he was one of the first of the old West Pointers who offered his services to the Government. He was one of the first batch of Brigadier-Generals of Volunteers appointed by President Lincoln on 17th May, 1861; and was, on his arrival, placed in command of a brigade of the army of the Potomac, and subsequently of a division. From July, 1861, to February, 1862, he was stationed in Southern Maryland, on the north shore of the Potomac, his duty being to prevent the rebels crossing the river, and to ensure them with their river blockade while M'Clellan was getting his army into trim. This difficult duty he performed admirably.

CHAPTER II.

THE early morning, when Magdalen rose and looked out, was cloudy and overcast. But as time advanced to the breakfast hour, the threatening of rain passed away; and she was free to provide, without hindrance from the weather, for the first necessity of the day—the necessity of securing the absence of her traveling companion from the house.

Mrs. Wragge was dressed, armed at all points with her collection of crinolines, and eager to be away by ten o'clock. At an earlier hour Magdalen had provided for her being properly taken care of by the landlord's eldest daughter—a quiet, well-conducted girl, whose interest in the shopping excursion was readily secured by a little present of money for the purchase, on her own account, of a second and a much smaller bonnet. Shortly after ten o'clock Magdalen dismissed Mrs. Wragge and her attendant in a cab. She then joined the landlady—by way of keeping in setting the rooms in order up stairs—with the object of ascertaining, by a little well-timed gossip, what the daily habits might be of the inmates of the house.

She discovered that there were no other lodgers but Mrs. Wragge and herself. The landlady's husband was away all day, employed at a railway station. Her second daughter was charged with the care of the kitchen, in the elder sister's absence. The young gentlemen were at school, and would be back at one o'clock to dinner. The landlady herself "got up fine linen for ladies," and expected to be occupied over her work all that morning, in a little room built out at the back of the premises. Thus there was every facility for Magdalen's leaving the house in disguise, and leaving it unobserved, provided she went out before the children came back to dinner at one o'clock.

By eleven o'clock the apartments were set in order, and the landlady had retired to pursue her own employments. Magdalen softly locked the door of her room, drew the blind over the window, and entered at once on her preparations for the perilous experiment of the day.

The same quick perception of dangers to be avoided, and difficulties to be overcome, which had warned her to leave the extravagant part of her character costume in the box at Birmingham, now kept her mind fully alive to the vast difference between a disguise worn by gaslight for the amusement of an audience, and a disguise assumed by daylight to deceive the searching eyes of two strangers. The first article of dress which she put on was an old gown of her own (made of the material called "alpaca"), of a dark-brown color, with a neat pattern of little star-shaped spots in white. A double flounce running round the bottom of this dress was the only millinery ornament which it presented. She ornament not at all out of character with the costume appropriate to an elderly lady. The disguise of her head and face was the next object of her attention. She fitted and arranged the gray wig with the dexterity which constant practice had given her; fixed the false eyebrows (made rather large, and of hair darker than the wig) carefully in their position, with the gum mucilage with her for the purpose; and stained her face with the customary stage materials, so as to change the transparent fairness of her complexion to the dull, faintly opaque color of a woman in ill health. The lines and markings of age followed next; and here the first obstacles appeared themselves. The art which succeeded by gaslight failed by day: the difficulty of hiding the plainly artificial nature of the marks was almost insuperable. She turned to her trunk, took from it two veils, and putting on her old-fashioned bonnet tried the effect of them in succession. One of the veils (of black lace) was too thick to be worn over the face at that summer season without exciting remark. The other, of plain net, allowed her features to be seen through it, but sufficiently enough to permit the introduction of certain lines (many fewer than she was accustomed to use) which completely altered the character of the face, and at the sides of the mouth. But the obstacle thus set aside only opened the way to a new difficulty—the difficulty of keeping her veil down while she was speaking to other persons, without any apparent reason for doing so. An instant's consideration, and a chance look at her little china pallet of stage colors, suggested to her ready invention the production of a visible excuse for wearing her veil. She deliberately disarranged herself by artificially reddening the insides of her eyelids, so as to produce an appearance of inflammation which no lingerer—not but a doctor—and that doctor at close quarters—could have detected as false. She sprung to her feet and looked triumphantly at the hideous transformation of herself reflected in the glass. Who could think it strange now if she were her veil down, and if she begged Mrs. Lecount's permission to sit with her back to the light?

Her last proceeding was to put on the quiet gray cloak which she had brought from Birmingham, and which had been padded inside by Captain Wragge's own experienced hands, so as to hide the youthful grace and beauty of her neck and shoulders. Her costume being now complete, she practiced the walk which had been originally taught her as appropriate to her character—a walk with a slight limp—and returning to the glass, after a minute's trial, exercised herself next in the display of her voice and manner. This was the only part of the character in which it had been possible, with her physical peculiarities, to produce an imitation of Miss Garth; and here the resemblance was perfect. The harsh voice, the blunt manner, the habit of accompanying certain phrases by an emphatic nod of the head, the Northumbrian burr expressing itself in every word which contained the letter "r"—all these personal peculiarities of the rich old north-country gentlewoman reproduced to the life. The personal transformation thus completed was literally what Captain Wragge had called it—a work of genius in the art of self-disguise. Excepting the one case of seeing her face reversed in a looking-glass, no accident could have baffled Magdalen could have suspected for an instant that she was other than she seemed. Her whole stature appeared to fifty years old at least.

Before unlocking the door she looked about her carefully, to make sure that none of her stage materials were exposed to view in case the landlady entered the room in her absence. She had been accidentally pushed under the looking-glass while she was trying on her bonnet. Before she took up the letters to put them away she thought struck her for the first time, "Would Norah know me now if she met me in the street?" She looked in the glass and smiled gayly. "No, indeed, not even Norah!"

She unlocked the door after first looking at her watch. It was close on twelve o'clock. There was barely an hour left for her to make her rate experiment and to return to the lodging before the landlady's children came back from school.

An inward listening on the landing assured her that all was quiet in the house. She noiselessly descended the stairs, and gained the street without having met any living creature in any part of the house. In another minute she had crossed the road and had knocked at Mrs. Lecount's door.

The door was opened by the same woman servant whom she had followed on the previous evening to the minister's shop. With momentary tremor, which recalled the memorable first night of her appearance in public on the London stage (in Miss Garth's voice, and with Miss Garth's manner) for Mrs. Lecount.

"Mrs. Lecount has gone out, ma'am," said the servant.

"Is Mr. Vanstone at home?" asked Magdalen, her resolution asserting itself at once against the first obstacle that opposed it.

"My master is up yet, ma'am."

Another check! A weaker nature would have accepted the warning. Magdalen's nature rose in revolt against it.

"What time will Mrs. Lecount be back?" she asked.

"About one o'clock, ma'am."

"Say, if you please, that I will call again at soon after one o'clock as possible. I particularly wish to see Mrs. Lecount. My name is Miss Garth."

She turned and left the house. Going back to her own room was out of the question. The servant (as Magdalen knew by not hearing the door close) was looking after her; and, moreover, she would expose herself, if she went indoors, to the risk of going out again exactly at the time when the landlady's children were sure to be about the house. She turned mechanically to the right, walked on until she reached Russell Bridge, and waited there looking out over the river.

The interval of unemployed time now before her seemed nearly an hour. How should she occupy it?

As she asked herself the question, the thought which had struck her when she put away the packet of Norah's letters rose in her mind once more. A sudden impulse to test the miserable completeness of her disguise mixed with the higher and purer feeling at her heart, and strengthened her natural longing to see her sister's face again, though she dare not discover herself and speak. Norah's later letters had described in the fullest detail her life as a governess—her hours for teaching, her hours of leisure, her hours for walking out with her pupils. There was just time, if she could find a vehicle at once, for Magdalen to drive to the house of Norah's employer, with the chance of getting there a few minutes before the hour when her sister would be going out. One look at her will tell me more than a hundred letters!" With that thought in her heart—with the one object of following Norah on her daily walk, under protection of the disguise—Magdalen hastened over the bridge and made for the northern bank of the river.

At the turning-point of her life—why, in the interval before she took the irrevocable step, and passed the threshold of Noel Vanstone's door—the forces of Good triumphing in the strife for her own the forces of Evil, turned her back on the scene of her projected deception, and left her rich her mercifully farther and farther away from the fatal house.

She stopped the first empty cab that passed her; told the driver to go to New Street, Spring Gardens; and promised to double his fare if he reached his destination by a given time. The man earned the money—more than earned it, as the event proved. Magdalen had not taken two steps in advance along New Street, walking toward St. James's Park, before the door of a house beyond her opened and a lady in mourning came out accompanied by two little girls. The lady also took the direction of the Park, without turning her head toward Magdalen as she descended the house-step. It mattered little: Magdalen's heart looked through her eyes, and told her that she saw Norah.

She followed them into St. James's Park, and thence (along the Mall) into the Green Park, venturing closer and closer as they reached the grass and ascended the rising ground in the direction of Hyde Park Corner. Her eager eyes devoured every detail in Norah's dress, and detected the slightest change that had taken place in her figure and her bearing. She had become thinner since the autumn; her head drooped a little; she walked wearily. Her mourning dress, worn with the modest grace and neatness which no misfortune could take from her, was suited to her altered station; her black gown was made of stuff; her black shawl and bonnet were of the plainest and cheapest kind. The two little girls walking on either side of her were dressed in silk. Magdalen instinctively hated them.

She kept the wide circuit on the grass, so as to turn gradually and meet her sister, without exciting suspicion, that the meeting was contrived. Her heart beat fast; a burning heat glowed in her as she thought of her false hair, her false face, her false dress, and saw the dear familiar face coming nearer and nearer. They passed each other close. Norah's dark gentle eyes looked up, with a deeper light in them, with a sadder beauty than of old—rested all unconscious of the truth on her sister's face—and looked away from it again, as from the face of a stranger. That glance of an instant struck Magdalen to the heart. She stood rooted to the ground after Norah had passed by. A horror of the vile disguise that concealed her from a sister rang to burst its trammels and hide her shameful painted face on Norah's bosom, took possession of her body and soul. She turned and followed her.

Norah and the two children had reached the higher ground, and were close to one of the gates in the iron railing which fenced the Park from the street. Drawn by an irresistible fascination, Magdalen followed them again, closing on them as they reached the gate, and heard the voices of the two children raised in angry dispute which way they wanted to walk next. She saw Norah take them through the gate, and then stoop and speak to them, while waiting for an opportunity to cross the road. They only grew the louder and the quarrel grew what she said. The youngest—a girl of eight or nine years old—flew into a child's vehement passion, cried, screamed, and even kicked at the governess. The people in the street stopped and laughed; some of them pointedly advised a little wholesome correction; one woman asked Norah if she was the child's mother; another pitied her for having the child's governess. Before Magdalen could push her way through the crowd before her all-maternal anxiety to help her sister had blinded her to every other consideration, and had brought her, self-betrayed, to Norah's side—an open carriage passed the pavement slowly, hindered in its progress by the press of vehicles before it. The old lady seated inside heard the child's cries, recognized Norah, and called to her immediately. The footman parted the crowd, and the children were put into the carriage. It's lucky I happened to pass this way," said the old lady, beckoning contemptuously to Norah to keep her place on the front seat; "you never could manage my daughter's children, and you never will." The footman put up the steps—the carriage drove on with the children and the governess—the crowd dispersed and Magdalen was alone again.

"So be it!" she thought, bitterly. "I should only have distressed her. We should only have had the misery of parting to suffer again."

She mechanically retraced her steps; she returned, as in a dream, to the open space of the Park. Arming itself treacherously with the strength of her love for her sister, with the vehemence of the indignation that she felt for her sister's sake, the terrible temptation of her life descended like a cloud on her mother's better part. Through all the pain and disfigurement of the disguise, the fierce despair of that strong and passionate nature burned fiercely to the surface. Norah made an object of public curiosity and amusement! Norah reprimanded in the open street; Norah the hired victim of an old woman's insolence and a child's ill-temper—and the same man to thank for it who had robbed Frank to China!—and that man's son to thank after him! The thought of her sister, which had turned her from the scene of her meditated deception, which had made the consciousness of her own disguise hateful to her—was now the thought which sanctioned that means, or any means, to compass her end; the thought which set wings to her feet, and turned her back nearer and nearer to the fatal house.

She left the Park again, and found herself in the streets, without knowing where. Once more she thought of the first course that presented itself, and the next time she left her own room, stepped she-driver at the first pastry-cook's shop which she passed, and there obtained the means of consulting a looking-glass before she returned back to Vauxhall Walk.

Her gray head-dress was disordered, and the old-fashioned bonnet was a little on one side. Nothing else had suffered. She set right the few defects in her costume and returned to the cab

"THE YOUNGEST—A GIRL OF EIGHT OR NINE YEARS OLD—FLEW INTO A CHILD'S VEHEMENT PASSION, CRIED, SCREAMED, AND EVEN KICKED AT THE GOVERNESS."

It was half past one when she approached the house and knocked, for the second time, at Noel Vanstone's door. The woman-servant opened it, as before.

"Has Mrs. Lecount come back?"

"Yes, ma'am. Step this way, if you please."

The servant preceded Magdalen along an empty passage, and leading her past an unoccupied staircase, opened the door of a room at the back of the house. The room was lighted by one window looking out on a yard: the walls were bare; the boarded floor was uncarpeted; a bedroom stand stood against the wall, and a kitchen table was placed under the window. On the table stood a glass tank filled with water, and ornamented in the middle by a miniature pyramid of rock-work, interlaced with weeds. Snails climbed up the sides of the tank; tadpoles and tiny fish swam swiftly in the green water; slippery eft and slimy frogs found a comfortable home in and out of the weedy rock-work; and on the top of the pyramid basked a solitary toad, cold as the stone, brown as the stone, motionless as the stone, a little bright-eyed toad. The art of keeping fish and reptiles as domestic pets had not at that time been popularized in England; and Magdalen, on entering the room, started back in irrepressible astonishment and disgust from the first specimen of an Aquarium that she had ever seen.

"Don't be alarmed," said a woman's voice behind her. "My pets hurt nobody."

Magdalen turned and confronted Mrs. Lecount. She had expected—founding her anticipations on the letter which the housekeeper had written to her—to see a hard, wily, ill-favored, insolent old woman. She found herself in the presence of a lady of mild, ingratiating manners, whose dress was the perfection of neatness, taste, and matronly simplicity; whose personal appearance was little less than a triumph of physical resistance to the deteriorating influence of time. If Mrs. Lecount had actually numbered her sixteen years off her real age, and had asserted herself to be eight and thirty, there would not have been one man in a thousand, or one woman in a hundred, who would have hesitated to believe her. Her dark hair was just touched with gray, and no more. It was plainly parted under a spotless lace cap, sparingly ornamented with mourning ribbons. Not a wrinkle appeared on her smooth white forehead or her plump white cheeks. Her delicate chin was dimpled; and her eyes were marvels of whiteness and regularity. Her lips might have been critically considered as too thin, if they had not been accustomed to make the best of their defects by means of a pleading and persuasive smile. Her large black eyes might have looked full even if they had been set in the face of another woman: they were rich and brilliant in the face of Mrs. Lecount; they were tenderly interested in everything she looked at—in Magdalen; in the toad on the rock-work; in the back-yard; in nothing in the window; in her own plump, fair hands, which she rubbed softly over the warm foreign black gown in which she mourned the memory of Michael Vanstone—as long a memory as was a well-made compliment paid to Death. Her innocent white muslin apron was a little domestic touch in itself. Her jet chain was worn so modest in their pretensions that a coquette might have looked at them and commended them. The modest simplicity of her face was matched by the comely plumpness of her figure: it gilded amazingly over the ground; it bowed in infinite undulations when she walked. There are not many men who could have observed Mrs. Lecount entirely from the Platonic point of view.—Inds in their teens would have found her irresistible—women only could have betrayed their hearts against her, and mercilessly forced their way inward through that fair and smiling surface. Magdalen's first glance at Mrs. Lecount, on the autumn period of female life more than satisfied her that she had done well to feel her ground in disguise before she ventured in matching herself against Mrs. Lecount.

"Have I the pleasure of addressing the lady who called this morning?" inquired the housekeeper, with a bow, pointing to Miss Garth.

Something in the expression of her eyes, as she asked that question, warned Magdalen to turn her head away from the window through which she had turned it yet. The bare doubt whether the housekeeper might not have seen her already on the wrong side a light, gave her self-possession for the moment. She gave herself time to recover it, and merely answered by a bow.

"Accept my excuses, ma'am, for the place in which I am compelled to receive you," proceeded Mrs. Lecount, in fluent English, spoken with a foreign accent. "Mrs. Vanstone is not equal for a temporary purpose. We leave for the sea-side to-morrow afternoon; and it has not been thought worth while to set the house in proper order. Will you take a seat, and oblige me by mentioning the object of your visit?"

She glided imperceptibly a step or two nearer to Magdalen, and placed a chair for her exactly opposite the light from the window. "Pray sit down," said Mrs. Lecount, looking with the tenderest interest at the visitor's inflamed eyes through the visitor's net veil.

"I am suffering, as you see, from a complaint in the eyes," replied Magdalen, steadily keeping her profile toward the window, and carefully pitching her voice to the tone of Miss Garth's. "I must beg your permission to wear my veil down, and to sit away from the light. She said those words with a feeling mistress of herself again. With perfect composure she drew the chair back into the centre of the room beyond the window, and seated herself, keeping the shadow of her bonnet well over her face. Mrs. Lecount's persuasive lips murmured a polite expression of sympathy; Mrs. Lecount's amiable black eyes looked more interested in the strange lady than ever. She placed a chair for herself exactly on a line with Magdalen's, and sat so close to the wall as to force her visitor either to turn her head a little further round toward the window, or to look in politeness by not looking at the person who she addressed. "Yes," said Mrs. Lecount, with a confidential little coup. "I said to what circumstance am I indebted for the honor of this visit?"

"May I inquire, first, if my name happens to be familiar to you?" said Magdalen, turning toward her as a matter of necessity—but only holding up her handkerchief, at the same time, between her eyes and the light.

"No," answered Mrs. Lecount, with another little coup, rather harsher than the first. "The name of Miss Garth is quite unknown to me."

"In that case," pursued Magdalen, "I shall best explain the object of my visit—and it causes me to intrude on you by mentioning who I am—if I tell you that many years ago, when I was a child, I was for a time under the care of Madame Rubens, and I came here in the interest of his orphan daughters."

Mrs. Lecount's hands, which had been smoothly shifting one over the other up to this time, suddenly ceased to move. Her hands were of self-forgetfully shutting up, owned they were true thin as the very output of the interview.

"I am sorry to say that the light out of doors without a green shade," she quietly remarked, leaving the full force of the announcement of herself as completely unnoticed as if she had not spoken at all.

"I find a green shade eyes keeps them too hot at this time of the year," rejoined Magdalen, steadily matching the housekeeper's composure. "May I ask whether you can hear of the poor girl now on the subject of my errand in this house?"

"May I inquire, in return," said Mrs. Lecount, "what way that errand can possibly concern me?" retorted Mrs. Lecount.

"Pardon me," said Magdalen. "I came to you because Mr. Noel Vanstone's intentions toward the two orphans, in my opinion, referred to them in the form of a letter from yourself."

That plain answer had its effect. It warned Mrs. Lecount that the lady before her had been informed than she had at first suspected, and that it might be necessary, under the circumstances, to dismiss her unheard.

"Pray pardon me," said the housekeeper, "if scarcely understood you. I misunderstand now. You are mistaken, ma'am, in supposing that I have any correspondence on that delicate subject in the painful matter. I am the mouth-piece of Mr. Noel Vanstone: the pen he holds in his own hand. I write nothing, nothing more. He is an invalid; and like other invalids he has his bad days and his good. If I am to tell him that anything was written to the young person—shall I call her Miss Vanstone? I will call her Miss Vanstone. If to whom am I to make distinctions, and what is it to me whether her parents were married or not? As I was saying, it was to tell him of Miss Vanstone's bad days when that answer was sent, and there I find it on record in my book. I can produce the want of a letter. If you wish to speak on the subject of those young ladies—shall I call them Vanstone, or any other name?—I am, in all such things, I will call them the Miss Vanstones—if you wish to speak to me about the Miss Vanstones, I will mention your name, and your object in favoring me with this call, to Mr. Noel Vanstone. He is alone in the house. He is not is one of his good days. I have the influence of a long service with him, and I will use that influence with pleasure in your behalf. Shall I go at once?" asked Mrs. Lecount, rising with the friendliest manner, and with the kindest smile.

"If you please," said Magdalen, with grateful alacrity; "and if I am not taking any undue liberty, one of your London cabs—"

"On the contrary," rejoined Mrs. Lecount, "you are taking the very liberty which I myself am permitting me, in my very limited way, to assist the performance of a benevolent action." She bowed, and left the room before the words were spoken.

Left by herself, Magdalen allowed the anger which she had restrained in Mrs. Lecount's presence to break free from her. For want of a nobler object of attack, it took the direction of the Aquarium. She looked at the miniature rock-work, sitting placid on his rock throne, with his bright green staring eyes, and his motionless attitude of every nerve in her body. She looked at the creature with a shrinking intensity of hatred; she whispered to it furiously through her set teeth. "I wonder whose blood runs coldest," she said, "you, you little monster, or that woman's? I wonder which is the slimiest, her heart or your back? You hateful wretch, do you know what I could do to you? I could crush you—is a devil!"

The speckled skin under the toad's mouth mysteriously wrinkled itself, then slowly expanded again, as if he had swallowed the words just addressed to him. Magdalen turned away in disgust from the first perceptible movement in the creature's body, trifling as it was, which varied the dull monotony of his seated herself again a moment too soon. The door opened imperceptibly, and Mrs. Lecount appeared once more.

"Mr. Vanstone will see you," she said, "if you will kindly wait a few minutes. He will ring the parlor-bell when his present occupation is at an end, and he is ready to receive you. Be careful, ma'am, not to depress his spirits, or to agitate him in any way. His heart has been a cause of anxiety to me and to others for many his earliest years. There is no positive disease; there is only a general constitutional degeneration—a want of vital power in the organ itself. His heart will go on well enough if you don't give his heart too much to do—that is the advice of all the medical men who have seen him. You will not forget it, and you will keep a guard over your conversation accordingly. Talking of medical men, have you ever tried the Golden Ointment for that sad affliction in your eyes? It has been described to me as an excellent remedy."

"It has not succeeded in my case," replied Magdalen, sharply. "Before I see Mr. Noel Vanstone," she continued, "may I inquire—"

"I beg your pardon," interposed Mrs. Lecount. "Does your question refer in any way to those two poor girls?"

"It refers to the Miss Vanstones."

"Then I can't enter into it. Excuse me, I really must positively beg your pardon. I am so fond of those two girls, that I can't bear to hear a word said about them. Mr. Vanstone is not kept in my master's presence, and by my master's express permission, when I am in the room myself, she while we are waiting here. Will you notice my glass Tank? I have your reason to believe that it is the finest specimen in England."

I looked at the Tank while you were out of the room," said Magdalen.

"Did you? You take no interest in the subject, I dare say? Quite natural. I took no interest myself, until I was married. My dear husband—dead many years since—formed my tastes, and I cherish his memory. He was the son of the late Professor Lecount, the eminent Swiss naturalist? I am his widow. The English circle in which I have been in my late master's service, (as) Anglicized my name to Lecount. Your gracious country-people will have nicknames. I was about three years ago, when I was a widow. Pray excuse me, I am so fond of my husband—my dear husband, who permitted me to assist him in his pursuits. I have had only one interest since his death—an interest in science. Eminent in many branches of science was great at Geology. I left me his Subjects and his Tank. I had no other legacy. There is the Tank. I am delighted did but this quiet little fellow—this nice little toad! Are you surprised at my liking him? There is no reason to be surprised at. The Professor lived long enough to elevate me above the common prejudices against the reptile creation. Properly understood, the reptile creation is beautiful. Properly dissected, the reptile creation has many claims on the lady. Mr. Vanstone stretched out her little finger and gently stroked the toad's back with the tip of it. "So infinitely to the touch!" said Mrs. Lecount. "So nice and cool this summer weather!"

The bell from the parlor rang. Mrs. Lecount rose, bent fondly over the Aquarium, and chirruped to the toad at parting as if it had been a bird. "Mr. Vanstone is ready to receive you. Follow me, if you please, Miss Garth." With those words she opened the door and led the way out of the room.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE EIGHTEENTH UNITED STATES INFANTRY.

HEAD-QUARTERS EIGHTEENTH INFANTRY, U. S. A., CAMP CORCORAN, CAPITOL, June 24, 1862.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR: I send you herewith a sketch purporting to represent the Eighteenth Regular Infantry and their conduct in the reconnoissance at Fox Ridge, near Centreville, on the 18th inst. It is simply a farce without depending upon a large number of officers and men, but having no foundation in fact.

Sixteen companies of the Eighteenth Infantry, under Major George L. Hartsuff, Second U. S. Brigade, and a party of large experience, are attached to the brigade of General Augur, First Division. The Majors of the two battalions are Major F. Townsend, formerly Colonel of the Third New York Volunteers, and Major Charles Deven, formerly of Major James M. Caldwell, who for twenty-five years has been with the Eighteenth Regular army. Every officer and man of the detachment referred to have been in active service, under General Harney, from January, 1861, and almost every man a considerable number of old soldiers, wearing the badges of one, two, and even three five-year enlistments.

General A. J. Smith commanded the reconnoissance. Brigadier-General McCook writes to the commanding officer of the Cincinnati Gazette, respecting his communication of the same letter of which the sketch is a copy:

"General A. J. Smith, of General Hallleck's staff, who commanded the reconnoissance, assures me that the detachment and officers acted with coolness and courage; that they acted with discretion and good judgment throughout, and did all that was, or could have been expected of them under the circumstances. I was satisfied that the statement from whom you derived your information were mistaken, and I hope that you will make the reparation as an act of justice by making the proper correction in the premises."

The report of the reconnoissance shows that the detachment of the Eighteenth were in advance as skirmishers.

Lieutenant Mills, Acting-Adjutant Eighteenth Infantry, commanded the advance of the army in line of battle within the woods to the front. The Eighteenth were, by the order of march, with skirmishers in advance, and on a bridge on a general engagement. The Eighth Missouri, on their right, and the Second Ohio, on the left. The Eighth came into the field behind the skirmishers, but retired by order, and the Second Ohio followed them. Then the skirmishers began to pass us. But Lieutenant-Colonel Shepherd immediately ascended to the top of the dock through the ranks of the skirmishers, who halted, by order of General Smith, and "the armed reconnoissance" was over.

The Eighteenth have remained in nearly every case during the war, where regiments have been accused of cowardice, the subsequent history has shown that great injustice has been done to worthy and true men by this indiscriminate and hasty criticism. the idea is suggested that it might be as just and patriotic to have even a little later intelligence for the public, and thereby save the honor and fair fame of the deserving, as well as screen the faithless. Pardon me, sir, for this allusion to editorial justice, though I doubt the value to the country of publishing any rumors whatever in regard to the movements of the army—information—or, at least, before inquiry of the commanding officer as to the facts. I am, yours, etc.,

HENRY B. CARRINGTON,
Colonel Eighteenth Infantry, U.S.A.

[The dragging subject to in the above letter came to us from a valued correspondent, Mr. James F. Goulden. He will doubtless settle the questions of fact involved with Colonel Carrington.—ED. H. W.]

MEMPHIS UNDER THE STARS AND STRIPES.

ONE old subscribers in Memphis, Tennessee, who have so long been deprived of Harper's Weekly by a rebel government, that they have probably finally ceased to look for it, has sent us a letter from his place of business in that city in our pages this week. We publish on page 417 an illustration of the MOVEMENT OF SUGAR AND COTTON ON THE LEVEE, a sight which had not been seen at Memphis for many a day before; and on page 420 a view of the JACKSON MONUMENT, defaced by some rascally rebel; of the MAIN AND ADAMS STREETS DRAWN FROM THE TOP-OFFICE; and of COLONEL ELLET'S RAM FLOTILLA.

SOUTHERN PRODUCE MOVING.

The rebels burned all the produce they could find. But a good deal escaped them, and is coming out of hiding places. The Memphis Avalanche says:

Independent of the boats, armed and unarmed, of the Federal fleet, transports are going from and coming to our wharf in such a way as to create a city memory of the good old times. The Perry started this evening heavily laden with bales and cotton, an unusual degree of satisfaction prevails about the levee, and the echoes of the past are awakened by the rumbling of the hoff. Heaven knows we need a revival of trade early.

The Herald correspondent writes:

Business in Memphis is beginning to look like old times. The A. D. Perry, of the St. Louis and Memphis Steamboat Line, left this evening, and the Knight of Commerce a boat will start for Cairo to-day laden with a fine supply of cotton. Many boats are expected down the river this week and wagons are coming out of their places of concealment in the surrounding country. Business men are confident that St. Louis laden to the guards with supplies for the Memphis market.

The Tribune correspondent says:

More and more business is coming to being discovered every day, and around Memphis and I have even numerous instances of planters bringing their cotton to market. Some of the Louisiana of the Confederacy, showing the Southern utopia as it existed in the days of slavery, and which I published with New Orleans sugar are now lying at the mouth of the Mississippi, and will soon come down the river, when the completion of this city, and will be sold by the owners for the benefit of the Union. Numerous other instances of this sort are sugar have developed themselves in considerable quantities, and will more and more to light during the coming fortnight.

The World correspondent says:

In three days we have had a dozen steamboats partially loaded with goods, groceries, clothing, etc. The goods are principally for the country trade, and are taking up with cotton, sugar, and molasses for their return trip. Many of the steamers are owned by citizens, loaded in the barn waste of the consumers, for the reason that the owners have been driven out.

Many of the boats have articles brought on board, as bales, cotton, sugar, and articles of fine trade are obtained without any difficulty, and are greeted as a boon by the many. The ride of the Southern sutlers cities and the stringency of the blockade has so crippled the rebels that for the most part they are glad to be admitted once more as purchasers of our industry.

A telegram to the press, dated Memphis, June 12, on Cairo, June 18, says:

Business matters seem to have been—Cotton, 5000 bales; molasses, 9000 barrels, 5000 half barrels; sugar, 1000 barrels. Prices are not yet fully established.

A correspondent of the World tells the following story, which illustrates the atrocious oppression practiced by the rebel government in the matter of selling of some of the planters. The scene occurred in Louisiana:

The cotton-burners came, they saw, they departed.

"I have come to burn your cotton, sir."

"By what authority?"

"By the authority of General Beauregard."

"You will not burn it."

"We will burn your cotton."

"You will not burn it. But it is my opinion, gentlemen, that you will not burn it."

"What do you propose to do? You don't mean to say that you intend to defend your property by force?"

"I simply mean to say that you will not burn my cotton. Ah, there goes the bell!"

The fire is brought.

"Gentlemen, there is the fire, and yonder are one hundred bales of cotton. Proceed."

"This proceeding is very extraordinary, Sir. I should like to know what you mean?"

"Well, Sir, I will tell you. If you attempt to burn that cotton I will scatter your brains so far and wide that no surgeon on earth will ever be able to piece them together again. Here, boys, that cotton is yours; defend it or starve."

"We'll attend to your case, Sir," said the cotton-burners. "We'll attend to your case, Sir, and to the case of your niggers, too. We'll call on you to-morrow."

"Whenever you please, gentlemen, but you burn no cotton, by all means come and burn."

"Good-morning, Sir, and you won't fall back in good order." The valiant Louisianian saved his cotton. He has had no trouble since. He is a loyal Union man.

I have yet to hear of an instance of voluntary submission to the rebel authorities. The rebels have left a thousands of cases remonstrance, threats of men, and tears of women and children, but these were of no avail.

THE JACKSON MONUMENT.

The Herald correspondent says:

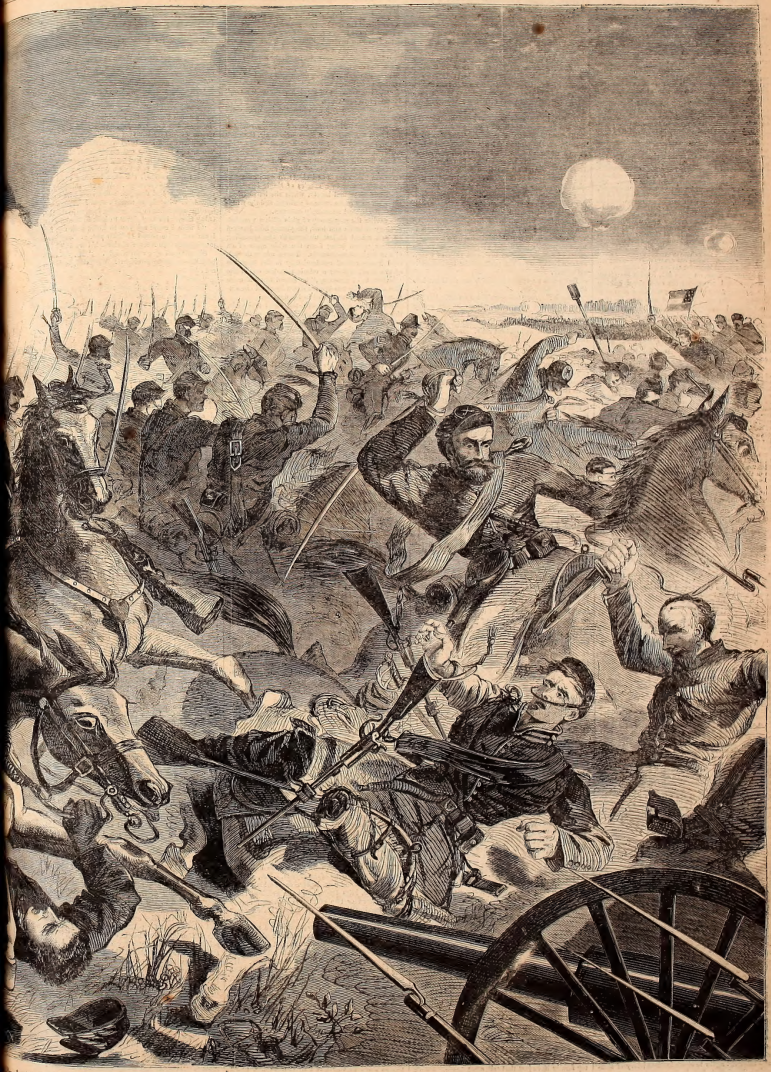
During last night the rebels approached the statue of Jackson, which occupies the centre of the green. It is intended that it should be blown up, but circumstances finally ruined strychnine. The bag of the old hero of New Orleans is placed in the face of a flash of musketry, seven or eight feet in height. On the northern face of the shaft is the inscription:

THE FEDERAL UNION:
IT MUST BE PRESERVED!



The word "Federal" has since been obliterated by the rebels, and "Union" by some rampant rebel, presenting an appearance of a short sentence, which, perhaps, may express the state of the question of secession words. It was a very feeble attempt at defacement of the words that grated harshly on loyal ears.

COLONEL ELLET'S RAM FLOTILLA.

These vessels, which proved so effective at the Battle of Memphis, are mostly old river boats, strengthened at the bow with heavy timber, and shielded with iron. They cost about $25,000 to $30,000, and can be kept afloat and in service for about $10,000 a month. They have proved more than a match for the most effective class of gun-boats, and will hereafter take a leading place in naval warfare.

THE WAR FOR THE UNIO

—A CAVALRY CHARGE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We publish this week several illustrations of the Army of the Potomac from sketches by Mr. Mead of Vermont. One of them, on page 428, represents the desperate struggle which took place, during the battle of Fairoaks, around Seeley's, now Kirby's, Battery. The Herald correspondent wrote:

While Lieutenant Kirby's battery was being placed in position, the enemy came out in force and made a desperate effort to capture it. It was the same artillery company which Captain Rickett commanded at Bull Run with such distinguished gallantry.

It was formerly the rebel General Magruder's battery. He evidently recognized the nature of the company, and the pressure we have required may be well upon his hear that battery. He ordered an immediate and desperate charge. The rebels came within twenty paces, when they poured a destructive fire into our ranks. The fire and the effect for a few moments were terrible. The cannoneers were driven from their pieces; horses plunged and reared, while some fell in the harness, and others escaped; others dashed off with caissons, but the great work fell on all this critical moment; infantry sprang forward and, with swords in hand, defended the battery. The rebels, nothing daunted, manned their pieces. The cannoneers returned, which had for a moment wavered through the retreat and other valuable officers had fallen, were rallied, and they were greeted with a tremendous shower of fire, which caused them to fall back in great disorder. It was at this last fire from the enemy that Colonel Kirby, of the Sixty-second New York, was killed. As he was advancing to rally, "We have some cold steel to give them, boys," and then he fell mortally wounded in his body. The Thirty-first Pennsylvania and other regiments were doing excellent service on the right, and had already performed their share in driving the enemy back from our artillery. Before our deadly fire the enemy fell back, and the artillery remained still to go to the front.

Another picture, on page 421, from a sketch by the same hand, represents the rebel cavalry firing into a train of cars containing wounded men near Turnstall's Station. This deed was done by a band of rebel cavalry, who, under General Stuart, made a daring sweep on the rear of General McClellan's army on the night of 13th, killed a number of teamsters and horses, stole and burned some stores and a couple of locomotives, and regained their retreat without loss. General McClellan's account of the affair is as follows:

The rebels, soon after leaving Old Church a squadron of the Fifth Cavalry, proceeded to Garlick's Landing, on the Pamunkey River, about four miles above the White House, where they burned two schooners and some wagons, and drove off the mules. Their conduct was characterized as barbarous, having killed several of our teamsters without any provocation. Two were baled to make room for others taken prisoners. From here they proceeded to Tunstall's Station, four miles from White House, on the road of burning the railroad bridge. A military force was sent out to meet them, but they were following two end wounded men in a train, and engaging to the latter, before the others were taken prisoner, but succeeded in making his escape during the night, and reported the circumstance. The truth and his himself in the woods until morning, leaving RICHARD at the train never stopped, but proceeded on to the White House. After destroying the telegraph wire at this point, they proceeded to Baltimore's Station, near New Kent Court House in their way to Richmond, burning the railroad bridges between Baltimore's and the James River, about two o'clock this morning. The force that accomplished this was composed of the regular cavalry and six pieces of artillery, under General Stuart, and numbered two thousand of the rebels.

The rebel account of the affair, from the Richmond Dispatch, reads thus:

Upon approaching the railroad, cars were heard advancing and the whistle sounded. By orders every man was instantly dismounted and ranged beside the track. Again the whistle blew, and thinking the force to be a friendly one, the train was allowed to approach within the Confederate grasp, when, declared the train, and fired upon it, and upon the train toward the Chickahominy, and despite every effort to check the train, some got away, but the engineer and fireman were captured, and the train, with its contents, was burned. The conflagration was fearful. Many of the cars were jumped from the train and were afterward captured or killed, to the number of twenty or more. The engineer was shot dead by Lieutenant Robinson.

On page 428 we reproduce a sketch by Mr. Mead, representing a very remarkable accident which lately took place in the Army of the Potomac. Mr. Mead writes:

"A very sad and singular accident occurred in Captain Wheeler's Battery, General Smith's Division, near Richmond, about a week ago, on the morning of the battle. A heavy thunder-storm had been raging from the west for some time, and had approached very near the camp. The tents of the men consisted of pantaloons or gum-covered stretched on sticks and rails, and were placed on a line with the guns and caissons. The artillerists perceived a dark cloud sweeping from the west as it was said, and as soon as it passed over the park a terrific discharge of the electric fluid took place. The whole battery seemed enveloped in a sheet of flame. All of the canteens but one, the corporal of the guard, were melted by the force of the fluid. Two men were instantly killed by the concussion, and the horses and supports of the gun, standing close by, and remaining motionless and perfectly unconscious of what had happened to them. One, Corporal James Bryant, of Bath, New York, gunner of the left piece, an intelligent and brave young man, was instantly killed; the others in that text, although touched by the fluid, were only stunned for a short time. Only a few minutes after the fluid had left the caissons, and the men had recovered from the shock, the explosion of the ammunition chests, set in fire by the burning fuses, commenced, and for some time the scene was terrific. Shells were bursting around all over the field; horses plunged and reared, and, breaking away from their fastenings, ran in every direction, and the men were compelled to seek safety in the rear. Fortunately, the explosion of the chests set free the horses, which, with the exception of three or four, were able to do duty the next day. The electric fluid passed down the left breast of one man, killing him several inches from the ground. Some had legs and arms partially paralyzed. The consequences of the ammunition chests were not touched.

Captain Wheeler's battery belongs to the First New York Artillery, organized by the lamented Colonel G. K. Warren, and was formerly known as the Fifth New York, under which name it fought at Bull Run. One of the ammunition chests, at Lee's Mills, was blown up by Lieutenant Hancock Wright, and at Hanover Court-House by Lieutenant Davidson. The men are unanimous in the belief that lightning is harder to beat than the rebels.

ONE OF OUR HEROES.

The soft, clear notes of the French horns began tuning out one of Chopin's wild mazurkas, sounds like a lark's song, thrilling and sweet; and presently rang the lively violoncello and violin, with the fine carol of the flute, the gay greeting of the viol, then the flute and the clarionets, and "the kettle-drums throbbed proudly."

It was the night of Mrs. Shannon Grey's famous fête. All the world was there; that is, all the world of Mrs. Shannon Grey—a gay, great world enough indeed on that night even for that lady's ambition.

A famous fête given in honor of her son—in honor and happy jubilee, for Shannon Grey was at home at Shannon Hill. And he deserved it. Wounded at Manassas, taken prisoner at Leesburg, released, and returned again to share in the victory of Roanoke: he shared, too, in its suffering, and came home unwillingly, with honorable mention and discharge, to nurse a shattered limb and a wasted body back to life, if not to health again. A splendid natural physique had worked the wonder which no one had dared to expect; and on the first of May he found himself once more at his own desk, by all indications on the road to the old perfection of strength.

And that recovery Mr. Shannon Grey was now celebrating while the month was yet in its first week. For this she had built a ball-room in Shannon Hill with triumphal banners and flattering flags, turning the lawns and gardens into a fairy land of illuminations and invoking the presence of the lovely and the brave.

A hero? Why, you don't think he carries out the idea very forcibly as you see him now—a tall, slight-looking young man, rather pensive in his air, with a pale face, a violet-colored glove from a white hand, and the hand sending forth an occasional waft from a fan. But the hero-service is lurking. And all the time he is talking the lightest nonsense in the most graceful though selfassured manner to a lady by his side. Perhaps you think him a trifle supercilious. Perhaps an hour that dozen of grace you fancy you see a cool, unpromising disregard, and a lordly sort of indifference which verges on self-love. This may be the indication; and supposing it a true one, is it very strange that constant adulation from his cradle up, and finding every glad glory that have the effect of self-centring at first, and then of weariness and disgust? Yet perhaps the indication is all astray.

But while we speculate the horns steal out into that still more lovely

"Hark!" And Shannon Grey actually has the audacity to lift a finger of silence to the pretty lady's talk then.

"Hark!—that's a wonderful thing—beads of dropping water and distant bells. Don't you hear them?"

The lady patted a little foot impatiently, bent a line to the right, a little to the left, in a white snow-drift of an arm, and—wished that Shannon Grey would remember that a starch reputation was an ill thing to be beads of water, nor distant bells in the swilling sounds.

At last he caught in a gleam of anger.

Which is pulled, so polite! Who made you such an autocrat of pleasure?"

And while you ponder this question on this suggestion, Mrs. Shannon Grey comes up with an anxious face, to ask what is the matter.

"That Clara Seyder to set him dancing on that weakened limb!" she says, fretfully, addressing the lilyous short, she sent out to search for a silkworm for a signal of distress. So on the second round the young gentleman was found at it with the words,

"Dear Lady Clara, my good mamma is in some dire perplexity, which only her graceless son can settle, evidently. She has been hanging out flags of distress for the last half-hour. Do you know it breaks my heart to leave you?" And he relinquished the "dear Lady Clara" to the music, beaming down in a glittering young officer who stood conveniently near.

And the gay mamma fell upon him with caution and reproof, all of which he turned a heedless ear to—listening, instead, to the beads of drop-water and the distant bells in the still, wide mazurka of Chopin's. The lady caught the heedless look. "Is any of the wine left in the cup?" was the sharper tone brought him back.

"Shannon, why will you not listen? Dr. Belmont says you must not be restless at present, and that you must not use it needlessly; and there you were dancing—with a risk that romp of a Clara Seyder! How could you?"

"My dear little mamma," Mrs. Grey's favorite dupois was a term of endearment to her wounded, and the stateliest woman in the room—"my dear little mamma, you must not invite such a vulgar personage as a grown-up romp?"

"What ever are you thinking of, Shannon? She is Rosamond Seyder's daughter, and Mrs. Seyder is the richest woman in the world, they thought I was a delightfully-wicked fellow."

"Shannon!"

"They really did, mamma. 'Delightfully-wicked'—that was the phrase; and they said it with a series of little giggles, and a flirting of little red fans. Now isn't a temptation to a young fellow to forswear innocence when such charming creatures define the wickedness in this hilarious manner?"

"Come, Shannon, leave your nonsense and these silly ladies—they, they spoil you, Shan—"

"To be sure they do—make me conceited and vain—and I should be sorry to disappoint them, for they think it's very nice. There isn't better blood, you know, than the Shannon Greys! Then the Seyders, mamma. But how came you to look with a sudden real look—a look of disgust and disdain—be fixed on Miss Seyder had decked his button-hole with out of an open window."

And then his mother returned to the point of attack. "Now, Shannon, do remember. You can great risks, you know; don't trifle with your constitution. I should be sorry to see the dancing round all your life! It would quite ruin your splendid figure. You're a perfect Shannon!—all your family have just that look, don't they? I can't bear to think of its becoming any thing less. You are the only son, you know—the last of the name; and you must be careful that you don't do it discredit."

The look of disdain settled into something intolerable. No anger, but a tired, haggard expression, as it were; and the eyes went searching off again into invisible distances, listening to the beats of dropping water, the distant bells.

"Remember"—came the motherly caution once more, as they neared a group of gilt—"remember, Shannon, you belong, perhaps, to-night you lose your chance of waiting forever."

"And my chance of serving my country too," he said, in a low voice.

"How absurd you are, Shannon! Why can't you be serious?"

What could Mrs. Grey want? There couldn't well be a greater or more supreme one than her son's presented then; but perhaps she knew "his ways," and this was one of them.

The subject was at once changed by this into a soft sliding waltz—one of the Weber wonders: those clinging chords and clustered arpeggios, the flute-tones rising in a species of single harmony, aloft and clear and lonely, while the harp-strings blended pearls and tears of waiting, and the vibrating horns sobbed meaningly between.

The group of gilt with a worldly proposal, and the young host hurried on, and rested at last underneath the spreading banners which hung from the wide arches of an open ball-room. There, where the colored lamps threw their softest light upon the faces of the tree, making a mimic paradise out of the "leafy tide of greenery," he seated himself more than a dozen times, and listened down by rote the stones than a young lord in his domain.

And the horns and harps, the flute and viols, the wild notes of cymbals, and the melodious roll of the kettle-drums wafted out to him to refresh and cheer him, as he listened to the music and again the beads of dropping water, the distant bells, the face smoothed itself into placidity.

The beads of water and distant bells. Hark! This was not it. He listens, and hears a fine, sweet undertone which seems to float into the flute-tone —a voice like a bird on bough, singing solely for its own pleasure; words sweet as the music changes —a dulcet duet, and the words, "Will you kindly forgather—a perfect dryad's song, suited to the hour.

The listener kept breathless silence. The voice was still: not a leaf stirred; not a branch or blade rustled: only the distant clangor of the musicians, and the near and low wood-carolling. Then it ceased with the last winding flute-notes; and then, from some where in the dark, there fell down on the smooth sward—a dark, slight figure, in a mantle of green.

The concealed watcher laughed inaudibly, with secret glee. Clearly it was a veritable dryad; the color was exquisite, the mantle of green, and the way that she did slip! He had half a fancy to call out to her, but changing his mind, followed softly in her footsteps. She paused at the foot of a side-hall, he saw her disappear up the broad stairway, and turned himself away by a shrub, and left the dryad alone.

A moment, and she came again, the mantle of green laid aside, and, slight figure and all, in a fairer—floating face of black—but a white lily in flesh-tints. He let her pass in, and then following softly, watched her partner. The stately lord was talking blandly with the best blood in the country, Shannon Grey knew.

The son put his head down at the back of her ear with a whisper,

"Who and what is she, little mamma?"

The bland sentences arrested in surprise.

"Why, Shannon, that's Clara Seyder's niece, Mrs. Dupont, Shannon," was the warning answer; and Mrs. Grey thought the boy had been taking too much wine.

The "boy" shook his black locks with impatient merriment.

"Nay, nay; I mean the dryad—I'm small white elf there, in black, with a diamond star at her throat."

"Oh! some one that came with the Lovells—their cousin, I believe, a Miss Dane."

The son put his head over her arm in his willful way, and said, for apology to Mr. Snyder,

"You must remember, mamma, I'm the young lady, mother. I ran against her just now in the hall, and must make my excuses."

And he left the group, to pour out earlier in the evening, Shannon, you would not have missed her. But where have you been all this time?"

"Listening to a nightingale—a bird on the bough, mamma. And I saw it fly down from its perch in a shower of green and flutter to the floor. It was either that or a dryad. Do dryads sing, mamma?"

"You've been drinking Champagne, Shannon."

"No, on my honor, nothing but the dew from the dryad's lips. Let me go, mother. The dryad fed upon lilies and dew, I perceive—nothing else."

"Oh my, Miss Dane, I am delighted to meet with a 'cool or tea of affable courtesy, moved away, leaving the "son" to "make his excuses" with physical correctness.

To the self-possessed young autocrat a new feeling had come—half embarrassment and half annoyance. And all because the small white elf had blocked bowl to his rather elaborate greeting with a profound air of respect and consideration. She had made not the least impression on her. She looked at him as blankly as if he had been a block of wood. But how did one of those provoking exteriors which seem by air and expression to signify an unconscious self-isolation. Her very naturalness was rare evidence.

Shannon Grey had met a new experience. Where should he begin with her?

His native audacity at length came to his aid.

"Did you wet your feet in the grass?" he asked, demurely.

She waited a moment to wonder, then remembered, looked down, and with it a little low laugh like a tinkle of bells.

"No, I ran quickly," she answered. "How did you see me?"

"I was wrapped in a banner out there, and heard a song. A dryad slipped its bark and came forth. I was left in all its mantle of green," he replied, gravely.

The cool face began to wake to enjoyment. These fancies suited the girl's nature.

"Yes, it was an ash," she answered, slyly.

"Yours now pierced through, as—"

Conquisine with young beeches

"I didn't find any beeches, however."

"He followed you in," was the swift, smiling response.

"Oh, is that it?"

He didn't half like the laughing ease with which she took his fine speeches, but she had an odd charm and him for her very coolness.

And here again the band began that same Weber waltz, and she broke off with a little start, as sweet humming words she had sung in the garden—just the lowest thread of a voice, yet clear and intelligible—and moved, with her feet but upon the floor in rhythmic measure. Was she thinking, as Clara Seyder had thought, and wishing he would remember what dance music meant? There was hardly impatience in the beating foot, or in the little waft of her fan as she kept time to it, and said,

"I wish I could ask you to waltz with me, but I am not quite sure of limb yet, and you look another gets into a favor of always if I try it."

She glanced up questioningly. "Oh, you have been to my cousins talk me. Wounded, were you not?"

"Yes."

Her manner changed now; from impassible she became eager, earnest.

"I love those the waltzing!" she exclaimed; "but if you are not tired of telling the story, talk to me about the battle. Were you engaged?" And her eyes lit, and her cheek kindled color.

"Which battle?"

"Which? How many have you been in, Mr. Grey?"

"I was at Manassas, at Leesburg, and at Roanoke."

She clasped her hands together applaudingly, and with words and gesture of interest.

Half an hour ago Shannon Grey would have fled from the "pretty interest" of the young ladies of his acquaintance as he fled from fire. Flattery was as real, so intense, that he went back to the old scenes with a thrilling delight. Her clear, intelligent questions, her magnetic sympathy led him freely on; and he told his last and largest experience—the battle at Roanoke. Rosamond Seyder's story—in accents of enthusiasm, which roused all the slumbering fire in those watchful, eager eyes opposite to her.

"And it was here I got my worst wound," he spared on. "I was in the rear of the line, and was leading my men on to the final attack, and they were already shouting with triumph, when I felt a blow on the back of my head, and a sharp ringing, as pain at first, not until long after—then another blow on the left arm, and I found myself going on down. There I got the ugly crush which made the wound ten times worse; but I'm all right now," he added, with a light laugh at length at the personalities he had been betrayed into by the swift sympathy of the listening face.

"Ah, but you should have seen the endurance, the uncomplaining courage of our men on that struggle," she answered, with a proud emphasis. "One poor fellow falling near me, I stooped to give him aid if I could, said he cried out, 'Never mind me, Captain, turn me on my side and go on. I shall soon be where it's all right, and our men will need all the help they can get.' And he left his cap, shot off by a musket-ball, which inflicted a flesh wound, and with his head bound up with his handkerchief, which was dripping blood, he pressed on with undaunted courage."

"A brave fellow!"

"And you went again, and yet again to these bloody fields. I like that—it shows persistence, determination, endurance. I believe the overcoming of those men who return after their first battle, and go on to the end, is one that, too. It does you honor, Captain Grey."

A color like a girl's came into his cheek at this simple, honest praise. It touched him across it was simple and honest—not a particle of flattery; and something in the tone of the commendation also revealed in the sunshine of worldly prosperity, but a man who had done his duty. Then again, she goes on:

"Why did you go at all—tell me, will you? Was it zeal, patriotism, real earnest duty in the hour of peril? But perhaps I have no right to ask."

He hesitated only a moment, then answered:

"Yes, Miss Dane, I will tell you why I went, though I am afraid it will not satisfy your idea of earnestness.

"When that first call came for troops a year ago, I will not deny that I was excited, and that my heart thrilled at the need. Then the long wait was filled for me. Here was unending excitement, social life, for the folks one I had lived daily; for I had no vocation for politics, literature, or any of the professions, and therefore other and fine theories evidently, and since my college days I had sunk into that listlessness thing—an idle man, without an object in life.

"Then the second call came, and the present crisis gave me a decided aim. It gave me occupation, excitement, variety, change, and real pain. And if you will pardon the egotism, Miss Dane, I think I have been a more earnest man since then."

"I do not doubt it, Captain Grey. Ah!" and she shook her head with a wistful look of pain. "You think we women know nothing of that feeling—the waist of reality—the purposeless existence of idleness. I have it fully, and have tried to do something that my heart thrilled to do. Very selfish, you may suppose, was my motive also to be selfish, you may suppose, was my motive also to be useful in your hour; but it's nevertheless a stubborn fact."

Then in a lighter way, "Yes, we may do fact."

something, we women; we may bind up the wounds, we may scrape lint, and roll bandages, and prick our fingers black and blue with picking coarse oakum for the last; but it don't give us the glow about the face that comes, at least it does not to me, which your work does, or that, Mr. Grey, that I am proud of becoming la fille du regiment. Don't confess me unwomanly, however, if when I read how you love fellow, let on to some deed of valor, or put me over a column by personal sacrifice or risk, if I don't feel a moment that I might feel the thrill, the glow that he felt. A wiser woman than I says:

"Page wave, drums beat, and unawares
You flash your souls out with the gaze
And take your Heaven at once."

A shadow here fell upon them. Shannon looked up to meet his mother's face, bland and smooth, but with a fixed purpose underneath. A gentleman bore her company.

"Miss Dare," the placid voice said, "will you do me present my nephew to you—" Mr. Richmond, Miss Dare?" and as the blushing little style-fide said promptly returned from the field of operations with the refractory Shannon. "I am ashamed of you, Shannon!" she cried, in indignation. "Here are forty girls you haven't spoken twice with, and your gentility every one. What was thinking of, spending a good half hour talking to that insignificant little Miss Dane while such girls as the Randolphs and De Lancys are before you?"

"Miss Dane—what's the matter with Miss Dane, mother?"

He was told that Miss Dane was a nobody—not in so many words; Mrs. Grey was not so vulgar as that; but a few disparaging words, suggestive enough, left that impression. Shannon was but a third or fourth branch of the Lovell family, and could not but know of blood crossed by a mesalliance. His father had been a small trader in the West Indies Maude, Virginia, he left his daughter under the tuition of his mother's relatives. She never visited her father in the West Indies, but once or twice sent him, and was working it out bravely by the daily use of gifts and graces that were her inheritance and education. It was natural Miss Dane was the under-teacher in a girl's school, and spending her vacation with the Lovells.

All this Shannon Grey got in a breath or two as he walked down the room with his mother.

"Blood, good blood—so that's what I wanted!" when I talked with Miss Dane just now I thought she might have been descended from heroes—I did. I talk with Lee Randolph, or the little Rossetcher Snyder, I think of cockneys and snobs invariably; I suppose because they make themselves so and satisfy by lofty scorn of parvenues, more implied than spoken. And so I as invariably make a savage of myself, and get sentenced to the ranks of the lowly, and insolent, and satirical; and they hear it. Ser it! They accept it, and make it true. And all therefore because I am Shannon Grey, the owner of Shannon Hill and the oldest family in the country. They think I am the first gentleman of the land, even then when I am an insufferable coxcomb. Is you think I was forgive them for causing me to make such a fool of myself! Bah! how weak I am!" and he shook his shoulders with an impatient indignation, adding, "look at that Miss Dane now. She would turn her back upon me in a twinkling if I used out on such an hour. I was a fool to be only real girl I ever saw—real, and honest, and true. I think the cross of the blood works well."

"God knows I'd rather myself to be a girl than dissect Mrs. Grey.

"She won't have me; don't fret, mamma. She's for my betters."

And then with a half laugh: "Mamma mine, if you ever bring a négre-de Dane to me, you will suits with every girl in the room till I get a boy for life. See if I don't. I'm a fickle dog, and I'm talking nonsense? Clara, Clara Snyder, give me the other half of my mazurka, or I shall never know happiness in this world."

A hand caught in passing, an imperious order to be musicians, and the wretched string-quartet of flattered little Rensselaer Snyder, while his mother let her lips in mortification.

Three weeks more stepping at the end in the neighborhood of Miss Dane, with the words for only her ear in a sentence.

"I've been changing orders and running a risk to pay a debt of passion, Miss Dane. My temper is uneven, you see. I shall never know what it buttes you were envying. But come, have pity on me; come into the garden, Maude, and sing me the song of the dryad. They say you are the best Weber in a moment."

She shook her head—"No, I can't exercise evil spirits; besides, I'm going now: good-night!"

"Going? I wish I was going. May I come and see you, Miss Dane, and talk war?"

"Yes, or nothing means so much."

Mrs. Grey sighed relief as the Lovells bade their visitors, talking the dryad with them. She did not hear that final arrangement, but when Lucy came to her son chalking Lee Randolph with the most devoted air, and talking the most serious nonsense that nobody could hear but the lady in question, her spirits rose. That would be a fine luck for her brain —the Shannon Grey and the Lee Randolph.

In the mean time, however, Shannon Grey was quite unconscious of his air of his mother's relief or habit, you see. And this was the hero. You don't believe in him? Wait.

Again, sitting by the low fire of wood branches, dipped into Mrs. Browning's "Last Poems," while the Lovell cousins grouped round for hearing. She had read "Bianca among the Nightingales," that plaintive, passionate protest, that having reproach, wet all through with tears, in a voice that seemed to come between the Tuscan trees, straight up from the bleeding, broken heart of the Tuscan girl.

Across the fire-place, leaning against the mantle, Richard Lovell regarded her meditatively. It was not difficult to read his thought if you had watched him while she read.

"Sweet, above,
God's ever guarantee this Nor
And through his words the nightingales
Drove straight and full their long clear call,
Like arrows through heroic mails,
And love was awful in it all.
The nightingales, the nightingales."

But there was no one there to watch. They watched instead the eager, flushing reader; for the Lovells were very fond of cousin Agnes; they thought there was none like her. To them the cross of blood went for nothing. Whether Lovell or Dane their hearts took her to be their home. I wanted her, and Agnes liked her free life, and lived it.

They loved her, and still moveless and absorbed Richard Lovell regarded her.

Look into the ember faces. In "The Nightingales" they saw "Bianca." In "Nature's Remorse" the unfortunate young queen whose soon was to be born.

But Richard Lovell saw, over and above all, Agnes Dane. Do you read the meaning?

The poem ended, and Agnes left the party at Shannon Hill, and no one was expected. So the time was all their own.

"Nightingales, Lovers," Kate asked, "after 'The Nightingales,'"

But the sad or very verse she had quoted last night to Shannon Grey, when a full quarter-wheels in the avenue sent Richard's steadfast eyes from their searching to the window. The next moment he held the door open.

"Grey, we needed but you," was genial Dick's hearty cheer.

The others welcomed him cordially, gave him a place by the fire, and he stooped swiftly for a fallen ribbon, and let her lips brush his hand in rising. Last smiles over the top of his sympathy, what did it mean? Half an hour later she stood with Shannon Grey alone in the library.

He had asked her to become his wife, and she had refused him. A faint glimmer of the truth flashed over Dick Lovell's quick recall he brought to mind certain faltering words, and involuntary blush and smile which had given him hope.

Incredulous and hurt, he made a profound mistake in the next moment. Impulsively he asked, with a manly frankness, if her heart was free.

"Will you give me your reason, Miss Dane?" then sudden dropping on his knee with great ease, and very coldly she answered.

"I do not wish to marry you, Mr. Grey."

He could have cursed his folly now it was too late, for he saw at once the inference of his arrogance. In cool, haughty and explanatory; but he had no words to explain what he dared not mention—he dare not tell her that he loved her, whose very suggestion would but double the insult.

Looking into the still, inscrutable face before him, he at length saw how immutable was its resolves.

Then all pleading ceased. Very quietly, very gently he bent before her, with the simple sentence, "I beg your pardon," and turned to go. With a face of the coldness she came to be and put out her hand.

"Forgive me," she said, less coldly. "Forgive me, if I have wronged you; but it was impossible that I could give you any other answer."

He began to think, hoping he knew not what, but she fled past him with a scarce uttered adieu, and vanished up the stairway to her room.

There all the repressed emotion of the past hour had liberty of expression. But one sentence slowly uttered broke from her lips: "I wonder how I could ever where condescension opened the door?" He little knows a proud woman's pride."

Do not judge her. She was wronged him, perhaps she wronged herself. I told you hers was pride to extend, and this is the first humiliation, bad, grand, because heroic in its meaning. Such pride is inherent—a pulsation, a drop of the life-blood, and it's valuable as that life.

With the turbulent tide nothing is her soul she left the house, and sought the thickest gloom of the garden. In this mood Richard Lovell found her. He bethought him of that swift glance, the stooping figure, the thing touching his hand. He looked into her face now and knew the hurt ached on.

Striking through the wild, wintry, leafless bed, Lovell had touched a nearer nerve of the heart and roused both passion and resentment within him.

He had only need to say "I love you, Agnes, out there under the maples—her womanly sense had felt it long before; but the words, "I come to me, child, let me accident of my worldly position shield you in future!" He was of one blood, though a century rolled between us; in us be of one soulone life, Agnes." She was moved to the depths of her nature. "I am not a child, I am all unto her self."

Here, my love shall be honored."

As generous in her gifts as she was unflinching in her pride, she found herself to him with tears and lavish humility.

If she has ever loved another she shall love me better, with the silent resolve of Richard Lovell. If unexacting devotion, if sympathetic pride, could bring full fruition, he would not be disappointed.

And again I say, do not judge her. It is by seems to be supposed that she had surrendered all her soul, but this was not the meaning Grey.

From the first she had seen him as the type of a man for whom she had no sympathy—no fellowship. Later, if his own words had given her a better view—later still, that one sharp shock had brought the dormant nature back again; and his last question there in the library had sealed it.

Straight to the garden flitted Richard Lovell let his affianced wife, and presented her as such to his sister Kate. Kate looked surprised, perhaps, for she had looked for another woor; but there was hearty welcomeshe her kiss; and as such things go, before the day was many hours older, it was known from end to end of Shannonsleigh that Dick and Lovell was to marry his cousin, Agnes Dane.

At Shannon Hill, a taller, riding over Farm fashion-plate, communicated the fact between talk of tulle and lace. Mrs. Grey, sitting before her, and more than his usual blindness, Shannon began: "Dick, I want her."

"What!" A swift, sharp ejaculation.

The other went on: "Your cousin; I want her for my wife. Shall I ask her, Dick. Have I any chance, do you know?"

Dick Lovell crowded down the angry tide, and answered: "I ask her? yes, if you will, of course."

Shannon unwitting, proceeded:

"Sometimes I think I'm not, no, I can not say, Dick, I have been the veriest puppy, but she has knocked all the conceit out of me. I am coward enough now—not enough. But what a girl she is, Dick—so simple, so true!"

They turned into the house. Richard was giving a servant a message for Miss Dane. "Mr. Shannon Grey's compliments, and he waits for her in the library." In a carriage wheeled suddenly into view. A call from Mrs. Shannon Grey upon the young Miss Dane.

The message was remanded for the nonce and changed to a more general one; and into the drawing-room ground floated the young lady, prepared to receive Mrs. Shannon Grey and her son—the two Lovells and Miss Dane.

The call was not fifteen minutes in duration; but in that brief space of time, without absolute command of her sweet outward sanctity, Mrs. Grey had sent her lavish with unerring aim, and Agnes Dane knew she had opened upon the cloud, the estimation in which she was held—but not a line of her face betrayed it. Who else but herself perceived that insolent, shrouded in silken meekness? She looked up and caught the blaze in the eyes of her cousin Richard. Then a glow for a moment warmed her heart, she stooped swiftly for a fallen ribbon, and let her lips brush his hand in rising. Last smiles over the top of his sympathy, what did it mean? Half an hour later she stood with Shannon Grey alone in the library.

thrilled through with sudden secret delight and triumph. Shannon, then, was safe.

Shannon! He rose up out of the deep window, and quite unheeding his mother or her guest went slowly down the path to the old study-haunt of his boyhood—the cedar grove. There another battle was fought, a sharper conflict than the three for which he had been crowned before; and with what spirit, what courage he fought it, you shall see in the result.

Mrs. Grey waited tea for an hour, then sent her own away untasted. Where was Shannon? Another hour, and the bells were ringing down from the village clock when he walked in. She remembered the stern white face that went out, and she waited for a sight of him now with a troubled heart.

"Did you wait tea, mother?"

She went swiftly glance to him. The tones were quiet, almost gentle, the face quiet too, but the weariest face you ever saw. He who had clothed his spirit like a spoiled child at the thwarting of a pleasure now, at the thwarting of the greatest one he had ever known, showed supreme patience and humility.

A flutter of a foreboding of she knew not what, crossed the worldly mother's heart. But she felt the wrong she had wrought, and this new and subtle way of forgiveness and forbearance was like a flame of fire to her.

By-and-by he spoke again—the same weary quiet:

"Mother, I have joined my regiment."

"Shannon!" A piercing wail was in her exclamation.

"Yes, mother, I have meant it all along, when I should get strength enough."

"But you haven't strength yet."

"I think I have. At all events I can not sit down selfishly at so small a risk when such a need as this arises. I must go, mother; the country can not wait for the last men of my regiments should be willing to hazard much to serve now."

"Shannon," in a voice of fear and low as she leaned forward to address him—"Shannon, is there any other reason for your going? Does Agnes Dane not wish you away?"

For a moment there was utter silence; then he said:

"Mother, this morning, when the news came that more troops were wanted, I rode into the city and offered my services. Four hours after I offered myself to Agnes Dane, and she rejected me. Is that your only fear, mother?"

Nothing more; not a reproach of any outward word or action. Speechless, Mrs. Grey had listened, and now sat still, but the heart within her fast becoming her punishment. Clearer and clearer grew the vision she had wrought for her son—her patience, this uncomplaining suffering became apparent to her. It was her only son—the pride of her life—and she had driven him to this.

Again he broke the silence:

"I know you love me, mother. I am a disappointed man, it is true; but not to ease a sad heart, to soothe disappointment, shall I lead on my regiment unworthily. I tell you this that you may think it a long resolve. Perhaps, perhaps when I leave I've quite concluded, it will be years—"

"perhaps my country needs my whole heart."

"And I, Shannon; have you nothing for your mother?" with a pale pitiful quiver in tender lips.

He had risen up to go to his room, and, passing her, paused a moment, saying:

"Mother, what more?"

A kiss, dropped softly down upon her cheek, was all he offering, but it was enough.

Educated to selfish, worldly aims by a selfish, worldly mother, his tastes pampered to the most unmanly luxury with and the silken web which it brings, of a naturally impetuous temper and inclined to personal pleasure, in the grief and bitter disappointment of his life—you see what courage, what brave and generous manliness rose up to save and redeem.

And when, next morning, through the city streets, at the head of his regiment, passing on amidst flashing steel and fluttering flags, he went in obedience to his sense of duty, with a heart purged of all selfish resentment and humbled, many eyes then by stout resolve to give his whole heart to his country, I am sure that, though unreturned, in the days that are to come, one of our heroes!

BRIG.-GENERAL SILAS CASEY.

On page 421 we publish a portrait of BRIGADIER-GENERAL SILAS CASEY, who commanded the advance division of our army on the Peninsula, and who for many hours held his ground against a few times as numerous a force as his own force.

General Casey was born in Rhode Island about the year 1826, entered West Point in 1822; graduated in 1826, and entered the Seventh Infantry; was promoted to the Fourth Infantry in 1836, and Captain in July, 1839. In the Florida War Captain Casey served with distinction under General Taylor, and in the Mexican War, under the American War, and added still further to his reputation for gallantry. At Contreras and Churubusco he distinguished himself, and received the brevet of Major. At the assault on Chapultepec he led the storming party, and was severely wounded. For this he received the brevet of Lieutenant-Colonel. At the outbreak of the present Rebellion he was ordered to this city to offer his services to the Government, and obtained command of a brigade in Army Corps. Shortly after the reorganization of the army under General McClellan he was appointed to the command of a division in General Heintzelman's corps.

General McClellan's first dispatch, written hurriedly on the field of battle, did some injustice to General Casey, which has since been repaired by an explanatory dispatch. General Casey's division, however, did not behave and reduced by sickness, stood its ground splendidly, as its long record of killed and wounded attests.

THREESCORE AND TEN.

ROUND, round my life she wove a spell,
My head went whirling round as well,
And at a rate alarming;
My captured heart went "pitapat,"
With a loud double "rat-tat-tat,"
Ah, well, but it was charming!

As in my easy-chair I sit
(I'm getting old and bent a bit),
I think how Ella sly was;
Of all the pranks she used to play
To wheedle my poor heart away,
And what a "silly" I was.

Can it be she who, in a doze,
Sits opposite with nodding nose?
And by her side— Enough!
My "fire-dreams" are all dispelled;
That nose has "sniffed," those fingers held,
A pinch of double snuff!

Well, so it is, that in our life
We dream of some bewitching wife,
And set our hearts on beauty—
Nay, nay, I'm wrong, though snuff is there,
A charm dwells round that easy-chair—
The WIFE has done her duty!

CAPTAIN CLITHEROE OF THE TWENTY-THIRD.

I HAD come to Glen Iris stung with the pressure of a sharp pain. One I loved once, and loved still, had been false to me. I had been brought up as the only daughter and heiress of a rich man. When my father died suddenly his whole property was in a state of chaos—invested in grand schemes which, had he lived, might have realized his wishes, but which were neither comprehensible nor available by his executors. When all his affairs were settled there was, for my mother and myself, only a pittance of three thousand dollars—scarcely half the sum for our sole dependence that we had been used to spend with thoughtless self-indulgence in a single year. In this emergency my mother was helpless. She had been accustomed all her life to being guarded and protected, and she was as incapable of assuming responsibility as a child.

The same stroke that robbed me of my father and my fortune estranged my lover also. We had never been formally engaged—Norman Howard and I. He had told me, often enough, that he loved me; and we had made plans together about the future, through many a summer afternoon or winter evening. I had danced with him at Newport, with the sea-breeze tossing my hair and rustling the silken folds of my raiment. I had sung to him, talked to him, lived for him, twelve months, and I know that, all that time, he had no thought but that I should pass my future at his side. Still, with the carelessness of youth, we had not talked in so many words of marriage—no binding vow had passed between us. If there had been one, perhaps he might have kept it. As it happened, he was out of town when my father died, and when he came back my affairs were already made public. He was in a safe position to be prudent. He wrote me a note of condolence, a kindly, carefully worded note, in which he took it for granted that he must not intrude upon the sacredness of my grief—thus putting our acquaintance at once upon the plane of a common friendship.

How terribly that note stung me! How I suffered—silently, for I could not add my sorrows to the weary weight beneath which my poor mother was so utterly overwhelmed. Mine is emphatically a temperament, or was in those days, to which blessings brighten as they take their flight. This is true of most women, though all are not honest enough to confess it. A lover who is easy to win we may love sufficiently for our own comfort, perhaps; but given a serious difficulty or two in the way of winning him, a good, stubborn, roaring lion in the path, and our love intensifies itself to adoration at once.

While my father lived and Norman Howard was assiduous and constant in his attentions, I had been tormented with doubts as to my own regard for him—had wondered if he were capable of arousing the utmost intensity of my heart; but no sooner did I find that he had bowed himself politely off the stage than I abandoned myself to the wild, unreasoning grief of eighteen, longed for death, and felt entirely sure that earth held for me no possible consolation, present or future.

Putting all sentimental sorrows aside, the world wore a dark enough aspect just then. I knew not how we were to live. I was utterly barren of resources or expedients.

My friends had followed in the wake of my lover and my fortune. It was so long since I had seen one of them that I could scarcely believe my eyes when Mrs. Winslow Morgan's card was handed to me one spring morning.

She was the wife of the lawyer who had arranged my father's affairs—a man of high rank in his profession, as well as rich by inheritance, and the peer in birth and breeding of the proudest. I had often met Mrs. Morgan in society; but I had only seen the surface of her life—met her as we meet any one who helps us tie rose garlands round the hours we are wasting. That she should have called on me now was matter of profound astonishment. I took a sort of sullen pride in receiving her in my plain mourning calico—conforming, as I called it, to my altered fortunes. I believe my manner was sufficiently haughty and unamiable; but she did not seem to notice it. She talked with me for a while on indifferent subjects; then she asked me if I had made any plans for the coming summer. I was vexed at what seemed to me an impertinent liberty; and I answered that she would hardly expect me to flourish at Newport or Saratoga, so I should not be likely to have the pleasure of meeting her. She was very patient; almost apologizing, as if it had been she, not I, that was in fault.

"Forgive me," she said, "forgive me, dear Miss Tremaine. I did not mean to wound you. I only asked the question as the easiest way of arriving at what I wished to say. But plain speaking is always best. Mr. Morgan told me that you had intimated to him a desire to do something for your own support, and I had a proposal to make to you. I am sure you would not fancy teaching—you have not the temperament to be happy or successful in it; and I did not know but you might like to fill a position for which I am commissioned to find a suitable incumbent. My brother, Miles Clitheroe, is proprietor of the large calico mills at Glen Iris. He is in want of a designer to get up his patterns, and it seems to me that this occupation might just suit you. Do you remember drawing those flowers and bits of sea-weed which we all admired so much at Newport last summer? I know you love sketching, and I think you could make it quite as remunerative as any thing else you could do."

Here she mentioned a salary liberal beyond my hopes, including a pleasantly-situated cottage home for my mother and myself. All this time I had not interrupted her. Now she waited for me to speak.

"I am ashamed," I said, earnestly, "to accept your great kindness, when I think how ungraciously I received you. How little I imagined that you came on such an errand! The employment is exactly what I should like best, and nothing could be so welcome as the prospect of a new home, far away from all past associations."

"Then you accept?"

"With thanks which I won't try to shape into words. Mrs. Morgan, when you came I felt as helpless and as hopeless as if I were shipwrecked on an island where no sail ever comes. You have brought me hope—a new lease of life."

Mrs. Morgan looked at me smilingly, with her kindly yet shrewd eyes. She said—

"You are eighteen, an age when we are as extravagant in our gratitude as in our despair. You owe me no thanks. I have been acting as much for my brother's interest as yours. I am selfish, too, a little. I come to Glen Iris for a month of every summer. I shall be glad to find a friend there."

In two weeks' time I was settled in my new home. Mr. Clitheroe had been absent at the time of my arrival, unavoidably, Mrs. Morgan said; but the overseer of the works had rendered me all needful assistance, and already I was as comfortably settled as if I had lived there a twelvemonth. The change seemed to do my mother much good. She was charmed with our new home, than which, indeed, I had never seen any thing lovelier. Our cottage stood on a high bluff overhanging the river. It was sheltered by higher hills, crowned with forest trees in the rear. In front, on the other side of the river, stretched miles of pastoral peace. The river itself was a rapid, rushing stream, fretting its way over rocks and through gorges; with now and then a break, where its bed was smooth, and its tranquil waters mirrored the overhanging tree-boughs and the clouds of sunset and dawning. Below us, half a mile farther down the stream, were the great mills, and the thickly clustering houses where the workmen lived. Mr. Clitheroe's own stately mansion, built of a beautiful gray stone, was above us, half hidden from our view by the trees.

I knew he had come home, and I expected he would call that evening. I had dressed myself with some care for the occasion. I was anxious to produce an agreeable first impression, for I was dependent on his patronage for my sole prospects of a comfortable future. I had been called a beauty in the days when I was considered a rich heiress. In those days I had not troubled myself to decide whether the general verdict was true; but to-night I looked at myself more critically, and was convinced that it was not. My features were irregular; though my skin was clear it was dark; and my hair and eyes were black as a Spanish woman's. There might be a charm in such features when kindled by love or enthusiasm; but in repose, as I looked at them in my mirror, I saw little to attract. It was not the style of face to show well in my sombre black attire. Bright colors did wonders for me—hitherto I had always worn them. Now, I thought, if my future success depended on my beauty my prospects were not flattering.

I went to the door and looked out. The flush of the early summer, the fair promise of the June, rested in dreamy tenderness over all the landscape. Rock and river, field and sky, it seemed like a fairy realm whence trouble and care were banished. And yet, as I looked longer, there seemed a pensive sorrow in the scene: not grief exactly, but something which whispered how soon the glory would pass—how brief was the spell—and so made us love it all the better.

As I looked a gentleman came down the rocky path from the stone mansion on the hill. Of course it was Mr. Clitheroe. I shall remember always how he looked to me as I saw him first in that June twilight. About him, at least, there was nothing dreamy. He was a tall, vigorous man, who might have served for an illustration of muscular Christianity. His face was a firm, manly one, with its well-cut features, its decided mouth, and the clear-seeing hazel eyes, which yet kept their own secrets. He wore a full, brown beard, and his hair, a shade darker, was thick and strong. Every thing about him betokened endurance, courage, energy—but, I thought then, no especial tenderness or sentiment. He was unmistakably a gentleman. Not finical in his politeness; not even very graceful; but with the true spirit and essence of courtesy pervading his whole demeanor.

Meeting thus on the very threshold of my dwelling he needed no introduction.

"Miss Tremaine, of course," he said, with a cordial smile; and I expressed in polite phrase my pleasure at meeting Mr. Clitheroe.

He came in and sat for an hour. I liked him exceedingly. I had never seen a man whom I would have preferred as a friend. He seemed so thoroughly dependable. I liked to hear him talk. He was not eloquent, but he had a manly, straightforward way of arriving at conclusions. He was fearless and independent in thought; and I felt sure he would never swerve in practice from the inflexible law of right. Duty with him would be duty, no matter over what rugged paths, to what scenes of pain, or peril, or even death itself, she should lead him on. Yet he was very far from fascinating. I had heard his sister speak of him with an enthusiasm which I hardly comprehended; for he did not seem to me a man about whom it would be possible to weave romance or sentiment.

"What do you think of him?" I asked my mother, after he had left us.

"I think he is good, Florence."

It was her sole comment; and I came afterward to know how true it was.

The summer passed on, and I saw him often. As strangers in a place which offered little opportunity for making congenial friends it was natural that he should be attentive to us, and he was. His society was my only recreation, and I grew to take real pleasure in it—as much pleasure, at least, as I could take in any thing. My heart was heavy enough in those days. If my father had lived, and—remaining in my former position—any thing had separated me from Norman Howard, I do not think I should have suffered very deeply. Probably I should very soon have seen some one who possessed equal attractions for me; and, at any rate, with so many sources of pleasure at hand, I should have found it easy enough to forget one fickle boy. Now the case was different. I had a great many long, lonely hours, and I spent them in brooding over and idealizing the past.

Mr. Howard sang well, and danced admirably. He had almost brought his brilliant playing to the perfection of a science. He was handsome. His coats were made in Paris, and his hatter hung out his sign on the Rue de Rivoli. I believe these were his chief attractions—his salient points. You will confess it did my imagination credit that I should have been able to idealize him into the one man of the universe—a chevalier sans peur et sans reproche. I wore widow's weeds mentally for this New York Bayard of mine. I even managed to grow pale and thin, and I began to write melancholy verses descriptive of the place where I wanted to take my final repose. I sang to a dirge-like air, as I sat over my drawings:

"Come not, when I am dead,
To drop thy foolish tears upon my grave—
To trample round my fallen head,
And vex the unhappy dust thou wouldst not save.
There let the wind sweep and the plover cry,
But thou—go by."

I used to wonder whether even his hard heart would not be moved if, some day, he should read upon a tombstone my name—that pretty name he had praised so often—Florence Tremaine.

When Mrs. Morgan came, in August, I made a merit to myself of not being infected by her exuberant happiness. Realizing the change in my circumstances, I think she attributed my melancholy to that cause, and so pitied and forgave it.

She had been gone two months when one night Mr. Clitheroe came and asked me to walk with him. I was looking worn, he said, and he was sure I needed air and exercise. I looked toward my mother. It was her nature to rely utterly on some one; to take what that some one said on trust, and be thankful to be saved the trouble of forming an opinion. My dear father had been her oracle while he lived—now it was Mr. Clitheroe. Of course she seconded him on this occasion, and made me get my bonnet and shawl.

We walked silently for a time, climbing up the rocky path which led by his gray stone mansion, and pausing at length on the summit of a hill which commanded the whole rich and beautiful landscape. I sat down to rest for a few moments on a rustic seat, and he stood at a little distance. I remember stealing a look at him as he stood there, his bold, manly figure clearly defined against the sunset sky, and his face tender, more tender than I had ever seen it, with some unspoken thought. At length he drew nearer to me, and said, in a low tone which yet went straight to my heart,

"Florence Tremaine, I am not skilled in lover's phrases—I never said before to any woman what I now say to you. But if my words are abrupt my heart is true. I love you. You have grown into my life until I care for no future unless you share it. Can you love me, child?"

It flashed through my thoughts in an instant what a blessed thing it would be if I could love him—how much his proposal proffered me!—love, not only, but ease, rest, freedom from care, a guide, a friend, a protector. If only Norman Howard had never crossed my path! But I could not wrong my own nature by marrying, for any worldly reason, Miles Clitheroe, when my whole heart was full of another image.

Whatever my faults were I was honest, and not ungenerous. I told Mr. Clitheroe the whole truth. I concealed nothing—not even the longing I had had to die—the utter weariness of life.

That man had a noble nature. Some would have turned from me with vexation or indifference. He did not. Loving me intensely, as I knew he did—I, who had never been intensely loved before—he did not seem to think at all of his own suffering, his heart was so full of pity for mine. He laid his hand on my hair, and said, oh! so sadly,

"Poor child! poor Florence!"

I believe at that moment he would have given up all his own hopes with joy but to have secured me the fulfillment of mine. Standing beside him, a feeling of how good he was—a sense of his compassion, so tender and so generous—stole into my heart, and I felt that I could not give up all his regard. Clinging to his hand, I cried, passionately,

"Do not take your friendship away from me, Mr. Clitheroe. You do not know how much I care for it. It is the only comfort I have left in life. Think how lonely we should be if you should stay away! Promise to like me still—to come and see us as often as you used, or you will break my heart."

He took my hand tenderly into his own. He bent over me, and whispered,

"I will never break your heart, little Florence. You shall never suffer a pang which I can spare you. Do not think that your brave honesty, of which not one woman in a thousand would have been capable, can alienate my friendship from you. I will not stay away from you, or change toward you. I will never be less your friend; only I will try to think of you differently—think of you as one who can never be mine."

Oh the unutterable pathos that thrilled in his voice as he said those words! I could never forget it. I should know all my life long that one man had loved me.

We went home after that. Somehow the face of the night seemed changed. The moon that rose looked like a phantom moon, gazing from the depths of a past, far-off and irrevocable. At my door we parted. He asked me to make his excuses to my mother—he could not come in that night.

I kept my own counsel. I would not pain my mother, or wrong him, by hinting aught to her of the love I had rejected. I did not understand my own feelings at all; if I had I should have known that a chord had been struck in my heart which had never vibrated to the touch of Norman Howard.

After this the weeks wore on, the harvest-moon waned, the November winds blew their dirge notes, the Christmas bells rang, and then the new year came in, white with snows, pale with prophecies of the events it was bringing us—1861.

All this time Mr. Clitheroe kept his word. He came to see us as frequently as ever. He was just as good. No son could have been more devoted to my mother—no brother more thoughtfully kind to me. But there was a difference which I felt. He was too kind, too brotherlike. I could see that he was keeping his word—thinking of me as one who could never be his. And after a while this became sharp pain. Somehow—I never knew how or when—the pale phantom of a dead love, whose visitations I had so long sought for and welcomed, ceased entirely to haunt me. It would not come when I did call for it; and I knew it was because it had been the ghost of a dream, not of a reality. I knew that my love for Norman Howard had never been the passionate outpouring of a woman's heart; it had been but the nursling of idleness and sentimentality. It would have moved me no more to meet him now than to have seen my old music-master at the street corner. And now also I knew that I did love at length—that all the happiness I ever cared to have was in Miles Clitheroe's gift.

But I myself had shut the door against him by which he sought to enter my heart, and I could never be such a traitor to my womanhood as to raise a signal of distress. Let the ship go down if she must, and the black waters of oblivion close over her; better so than to seek inglorious safety. And now I was not sentimental or mock-heroic; I was simply womanly.

I used to sit and watch furtively Mr. Clitheroe's face sometimes when he was reading to us. What a strong, masterful face it was! I had never seen those clear hazel eyes misty with tears or with tenderness—never save that one night. I wondered if he had forgotten it. Could the love be dead which had moved him so powerfully then—which spoke in word, and tone, and eye-glance? Be it dead or living, he made no sign. I had sealed my own fate when I told him I was ready to die for Norman Howard. I began to hate that old memory as fiercely as I had ever cherished it.

Now indeed I began to wish I had not so earnestly entreated Mr. Clitheroe to continue his visits. It was hard to meet him as his mere friend should when I remembered what words he had said to me once—words which no man was ever likely to say again, which I should never care to hear from any other. I longed to go away from Glen Iris—away from him—where the thought of what might have been would never spring into life at sight of his face.

At length events came, so mighty and so unlooked-for, that every one was ashamed to think of themselves. Men and women forgot their private sorrows in the hour of their country's peril, and the whole nation's heart beat as one heart in response to the guns fired at Sumter.

It was late in April when one afternoon Mr. Clitheroe came to our cottage. My mother was lying down in her own room. I was quite alone in the little parlor. It had become a daily event for him to come in after meal-time and tell me what was doing. As usual, he gave me the brief summary. Then, looking at him, I saw he had more to say. Soon it came:

"I am going too, Florence. I have raised a company from among my own men. They are used to me, and they will obey me better than any one else. I have just written to my sister, and you are the only other friend I care to tell. Will you bid me God-speed?"

I meant to answer bravely.

"God-speed you, and God bless—" I got so far, and then every thing grew dark about me. I had never fainted before, and I thought I was dying. It was my last thought before the darkness closed round me.

When I opened my eyes again I was lying on the sofa, and he was bending over me with the old look in his eyes—the look they had worn that night. He had not called even my mother. Tenderly as a woman he had bathed my face, and waited for my recovery. When he saw that I was better he said,

"Was it the thought of my peril that moved you so? Florence, do you love me at last?"

"I never loved any one else!" I cried. "Oh believe me! If it is too late for you to give me back what you offered me once, still you must believe the truth. That other was no love; it was a girlish folly, and I grew morbid and sentimental over it, because, after misfortune overtook me, I had nothing else to think about. I have known, for months now, that it had only been a delusion—that you were the very life of my life, as no one else ever had been or could be."

"And you never spoke?"

"How could I? I was a woman."

"And so, but for this sudden parting, you would have let me go all my life through and never know that the treasure I coveted was mine! Oh, child, I have kept my word to you. I have not forsaken you, or staid away from you, but it has been a sore trial."

He knelt down beside me, and folded me in that strong clasp of his. His eyes shone with a measureless content. I could feel the beating of his heart full and strong—the heart which was to be my home.

He looked up after a while, and said, oh, so tenderly,

"Florence, the life I was going to offer my country was worth so little to me that to give it was no sacrifice. Must I withdraw the offering, now that you have made it infinitely precious?"

I knew what his wish was. Perhaps I should not have loved him so well if he had been capable of giving up the right, even for me. I knew that I but echoed the resolve in his own soul when I answered him—

"No, you shall fight for two."

"Then it must be my wife who will watch and pray for me—my wife who will welcome me when I come back. To-morrow, love, you must be mine. I could die happier knowing that you bore my name, and had a wife's right to weep for me."

I did not refuse—how could I? The next day we were married.

He has passed, unscathed, through many a fierce fight, ever, as I knew he would be, in the thickest of the fray. I have faith, at length, in my own happiness. I believe Heaven guards him; and by-and-by, with laurels on his brow, he will come back to love and me—my hero—my husband!

THE JEW'S GARDEN.

I KNEW it in winter, when flowers were few,
  When days were dim with unfruitful hours—
Next door but one the little old Jew—
  I knew he was fond of flowers.

For the weather had often his wistful gaze,
  And he changed as the weather was warm or cool;
I knew it, too, by his cheerful ways
  With the children coming from school.

'Twas the emerald edge of the month of May,
  With a spirit of bloom in the balmy air:
"Will you look at my garden?" said he, one day;
  It is full of promises fair."

I smiled as we neared it. A cramped recess
  Amid angular walls of commodious art,
It lay, like Beauty, companionless—
  Like song in a sordid heart.

But the tired airs panted among the plants there,
  Which, by devious ways, they had come to claim,
And the voice of love fell from the dove-cotes near,
  And the crippled sunbeams came.

And never a care of the noisome air,
  The din of the street, or the dingy place,
Did the young growths take in that garden there,
  As if blessed with a genial grace.

Never a care took the Bean, but to vie
  With Ivy and Hop that blindly run,
With small hands holding the strings whereby
  They feel their way up to the sun;

Nor the Daffodil, but to dazzle and yield
  A tune to the eye with its golden bells;
Nor the Giant of Battle, whose blood-red shield
  Enchants the look which it quells.

But lo! a mound—a miniature mound!
  A sensitive plant, with its hands half shut,
Stands softly near as in prayer profound—
  A Heart's-ease smiles at the foot.

The quaint old Jew, with his cheerful chat
  On the habits and hues and names of flowers,
Never glanced at this, the gem of the plat,
  And, most likely, the labor of hours.

Till I said, "What is it, my friend—this mound,
  Moss-mantled and wee, like a fairy's grave,
And those typical plants that guard it around?"
  I paused at the sigh he gave.

He spoke no word, but his eyes slowly filled—
  The air grew still and the sunlight sere;
And then, as the Sensitive plant was thrilled
  By the old man's falling tear,

A vision arose of a greener grave
  In a distant land, in the distant years,
And I knew the mourner who knelt and gave
  A youthful tribute of tears.

And I thought, this old man here, to this day,
  May have lived by brokerage, cheat, and bribe—
May have fawned, and lied, and clutched, and grown gray
  In the sordid curse of his tribe.

But surely, I thought, love falls, like dew,
  On his heart from the heaven of by-gone hours;
And surely God loves the little old Jew,
  So cheerful and fond of flowers.

THE APPROACH TO CHARLESTON.

ON page 429 we give a BIRDS-EYE VIEW OF CHARLESTON AND VICINITY, showing James Island and Stono Inlet, and the position of our forces and our gun-boats. We take the following extracts from correspondents' letters from the army:

It is but a little way from here to Charleston. From our outposts, looking across the narrow skirt of the island, we can plainly see Fort Johnson, and in a line beyond it Fort Sumter. Still farther the spires of the city and the masts of a few lonely vessels rise dimly to the view. But intervening is a force as large, I think, as our own, and they gave us, in the skirmish of yesterday, an evidence of dash and daring for which our men seemed hardly prepared. They are, of course, alarmed for the safety of the city. It may be that they will abandon it at once, seeing as they soon must that its possession must ultimately be transferred to the Union army. But we have every reason to expect a desperate resistance on their part, and hard fighting on our own, before the Stars and Stripes will float in triumph over Sumter's walls.

There has been a good deal of skirmishing between our forces and those of the rebels, resulting in our success. The rebels have been on the aggressive since we ceased to advance, and have given us one or two very pretty fights. They are in very strong force upon James Island, and have a large reserve in Charleston and on neighboring islands. The failure of Colonel Christ to destroy the railroad bridge at Pocotaligo, and thereby sever the main artery between Charleston and Savannah, has enabled the rebels to concentrate a very large force in and about Charleston, with ample means to increase it at short notice. In this they have the advantage of us. They can move troops with greater rapidity and concentrate more easily than we. Still we have managed thus far to get a little ahead of them, and would to-day have been in Charleston if a little more transportation could have been procured. One brigade failed to be on the ground assigned it in consequence of lack of transportation, and the moment which found Charleston nearly unprotected on that approach was forever lost, and when the movement was finally attempted the avenue of approach was found almost impregnable. The cause of the failure of the movement, I presume, will be investigated.

In the present number of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, is given the first of a series of papers by J. ROSS BROWNE, descriptive of travels in Northern Europe, illustrated by characteristic sketches by the Author. These papers will include descriptions of journeys in Norway, Poland, and Russia.

Mr. LOSSING'S Article on the "Hartford Convention" is in continuation of the series which will describe, in detail, the attempted insurrections against the United States, beginning with the "Whisky Insurrection," and closing with the "South Carolina Nullification," which was so promptly put down by ANDREW JACKSON.

Dr. WYNNE'S Biographical Papers will contain sketches of the men now living, who are the leading representatives of American Literature and Science.

Mr. THACKERAY'S "Philip" approaches its close. The Publishers are happy to announce that it will be followed, commencing probably in the next Number, by a New Novel, by the Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," and "Silas Marner."

As an illustrated Magazine, HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY has no rival. Whenever it is possible for the Artist to aid the Writer, his services have been called into requisition. The expense for illustrations alone exceeds the entire cost of the literary and artistic matter of any other similar periodical.

The various Editorial Departments comprise Essays and Notes upon the current topics of the day, at home and abroad, with Anecdotes and Facetiæ furnished by hundreds of voluntary contributors in every section of the country. The "Monthly Record of Current Events" presents a connected history of the leading events of the month. In the last Volume, every important incident of the war, from the sailing of the Port Royal Expedition to the victory at Pittsburg Landing, is recorded; with a copious Index, which will enable the reader to refer at once to each.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 12, 1862.

A HINT TO GENERAL BUTLER.

GENERAL BUTLER is feeding the people of New Orleans at the cost of the United States. General Halleck has begged the good people of the West to send food to the starving people of the Lower Mississippi Valley, and they have, with their accustomed liberality, dispatched shiploads of food down the river. In Florida our blockading squadron is, in several instances, been compelled to supply food to the famished rebels.

Now all this is perfectly right and proper, as far as it goes. Our generals and our people can not look on calmly and see even the worst traitors starve to death. But the arrangement should be reciprocal as far as possible. If the starving people of the South have any thing to give in exchange for the food with which we are supplying them, they ought to give it, and our generals should see to it that they do.

It happens that there is in the South—more or less under the control of the very mobs we are feeding—a quantity of property which is almost as urgently needed at the North and in Europe as food is needed at the South. This is cotton. In Europe, at the present time, the aggregate supply is only about 828,000 bales, against 1,644,000 bales at this time last year. Unless more cotton comes to markets soon, it is inevitable that all the factories of Europe will have to stop working, and a frightful amount of suffering will ensue. In the country the scarcity is still greater. On the 1st of June we sold at 60 cents a pound in this market; and here, as in Europe, our cotton industry must cease, and the operatives of New England be thrown upon the world, unless we contrive in some way or other to obtain a fresh supply of the staple within a very few weeks.

Now there is no doubt whatever of there being over 2,000,000 bales of cotton, at least, on the Southern plantations. From all that we can learn the amount destroyed by the rebel forces is very small. It is possible that the cotton still in the South may amount to 3,000,000 bales, or even more. But, as any rate, there must be 2,000,000 bales on the plantations, ginned and unginned, bagged and unbagged, in the gin-houses or elsewhere. Now of this large amount a certain proportion could undoubtedly be got to market if the people to whom we are feeding were made to understand that their bread depended upon it. There must be a large number of planters in the States of the Mississippi who would be willing to sell, especially as, at present prices, they would get over $150 a bale. Let the starving people of the South be told that, after a certain date, they will only be able to buy food with cotton, and we are inclined to think that they will unearth good many bales.

If these people are so bigoted in their treason that they will not help us to get cotton, the question of feeding them will assume a new aspect. But we can not but believe that the instincts of want, and the sentiment of starving will, if properly directed, lead to a considerable increase in the supply of cotton before very long.

REAPPEARANCE OF JOHN BULL AS PECKSNIFF.

JOHN BULL has made another rentrée in his favorite old part of Pecksniff. He is shocked at General Butler's order declaring that any woman who shall behave in a base, scurrilous, and orderly manner shall be deemed a base, idle, and disorderly female. The Times and Morning Post tremble at such brutality. Lord Palmerston protests against it on behalf of the frail sisterhood. The British Parliament steps into the ring as the champion of base, idle, and disorderly females throughout the world.

It is futile to offer serious arguments on such a theme and to such disputants. The British do not want to be set right. What they want is a tolerable pretext for snarling at us, as they snarl at the French, the Germans, the Russians, the Spaniards, the Russians, and the human race generally. We might observe that not a single lady in New Orleans has been insulted under General Butler's order; and that, on the contrary, the effect of that order having been to compel loose, idle, and disorderly women to have themselves decently in public, the streets have since become so quiet and orderly that the true ladies of the city have been enabled to resume their usual promenades without fear of their delicacy being shocked by unseemly behavior on the part of less worthy members of their sex. But, as we said, this explanation will not soothe the British temper. John Bull wants a peg to hang a snarl upon—nothing more.

Lovely, amiable, exemplary "guardian of civilization!" How touching his sympathy for the fancied wrongs of ladies against whose misthem, fly guns are up, his armies are marching under the banner of "booty and beauty!" How refreshing his concern for female purity, after the appalling atrocities of the British campaign in India, in 1858, when, in the language of an officer who served under Lord Clyde, "whole villages were depopulated, the men slaughtered in cold blood, and the women and young girls given over to a fate worse than death!" How edifying his horror at General Butler's barbarity, when we remember the three days' sack, in 1860, of the defenseless city of Pekin, and the havoc wasted pillage, in 1855, of the town and museum of Kertsch!

FOREIGN INTERVENTION AGAIN.

CERTAIN mischief-makers are again busily trying to disturb the peace of the world because the rebels with the old idle talk about foreign intervention.

The facts are: that two Paris journals—both, as every body knows, sold to the rebel agents, and whose editors are as much the property of John Slidell as his cook or his ass, to wit, the Patrie and the Constitutionnel—have published articles predicting and recommending a negotiation between France and England with a view to mediation in this country. On the strength of these articles, and of a casual visit of M. de Persigny to England, which, from the nature of the case, the whole tribe of newspaper letter-writers have revived the old cry of armed interference in this country, and M. Prevalaye, in London, has written a pamphlet to the same effect. The Paris and London Bourses are doubtless written by Mr. Gokkin. Still another intelligent critic and spectator is J. S. Cairnes—a member of the staff, we think, of the Professor of Jurisprudence and Political Economy in Queen's College, Galway, and late Whately Professor of Political Economy in the University of Dublin.

Professor Cairnes has recently published a work of which the full title is, "The Slave Power, its Character, Career, and Probable Designs: being an Attempt to Explain the Real Issues involved in the American Contest." It is the best book upon the general subject that we have seen, and the most comprehensive, thorough, and masterly presentation of the essential question of our war that we have had. It regards the contest not as one of American, but as a citizen of the world. In his view it is essential to the welfare of civilization that the Slave Power should be destroyed here and now. He holds that it is not an American question exclusively, or very much, but essential to the world that slavery should be destroyed. He considers intervention delusive as to say, in so many words, that the only way to prevent intervention is to intervene ourselves. He says, in so many words, that the only in one contingency, and that is when the United States Government finds itself unequal to destroying the slaveholding oligarchy—a case in which case every civilized Power should lend a hand.

He says that Europe has made up its mind that it is neither possible nor desirable to reconstruct the Union. That is, Europe has made up its mind, as the war should result in separation, it is of the utmost importance to Europe that the Slave Power in the United States should be absolutely destroyed. Professor Cairnes, however, will hardly believe before he dies that Europe has made up its mind much more than he declared its fervent wishes. He will live to see the Union reconstructed and the disturbing element eliminated.

But these for us are questions of the future. The business we have in hand is to prevent the rebellion by every legitimate means of war. It is very possible that the Slave Power will be omnipotent before the end, and so the rebellion be crowned with success. But in that event Europe will probably take a hand then and make up its mind this Government is absolutely in earnest, and that as this rebellion in ceaseless it will be suppressed even at the cost of the extermination of the people. It may also make up its mind that whatever Power interferes merely draws the whole world into war.

Such men as Mill, and Goldwin Smith, and, make us still patient of the name of Englishman. For in them we recognize that love for human liberty which is the sole hope of mankind. It is not that they take precisely the same view of our struggle that we do ourselves—for in some things we differ; but that they clearly the cardinal fact, that it is a struggle between Liberty and Despotism, between Class Privilege and Equal Rights.

TO WHOMSOEVER IT MAY CONCERN.

AT a time like this, when the country needs all her children either to fight or to advise and practically sympathize, there are three reasons which travails to leave any citizen longer their deserters. The first is health; the second is unavoidable business; the third is indifference to the fate of the country. As for the first, there are many men who, under the circumstances, must feel very ill indeed before they consent to stay home. For the second, every man must judge for himself. And however long the list of the other excuses to urge will naturally be suspected of the third.

But what kind of man must it be who can quietly remain at home, busy, and only indifferent to the peril which threatens his country but even ashamed of it? Such men are the last to make an effort as men ever made for Civilization, Liberty, and Law; here are millions of men and women and children and consorts in danger. For the sake of zero to the battle-field—spending millions of dollars and calmly beholding the delay of the national prosperity, in order that the great constitutional principle of the Government may be vindicated—for the sake of the wounded and dying soldiers, and of a family but has a drop of its blood in the field—surely a house in which incessant labor is not preparing comfort for wounded soldiers, or a household but has felt the bleedy sting of the war: see thought, one purpose, one heart-throb of the whole loyal land; a convulsion long generating, and whose consequences are radical and ennobling: a stormy resurrection of the vital principle of all progressive civilization, an overwhelming of party-spirit by pure patriotism: and some citizen perhaps creeps and cowers through Europe ashamed of his country!

Never since we were a nation had an American such cause of pride and gratulation. Never since the Revolution have the hearts and souls of the people been so majestic and inspiring as they are to-day. Never was there such reasonable hope that our great destiny will be fulfilled in all the ample splendor of its conception. Come home, then, poor, shivering doubter! Come home, wanderer, wherever and whoever you may be, you are ashamed of your country at this hour! In the name of decency and honor let it not be known that you are an American, or Europe will believe all that the rebels say. Let it be known that America produces such men as you, or faith in the principle of the human race becomes impossible. Come home! come home! You are ashamed of your country: but oh, wretched man! if you could only know how ashamed your country is of you!

MEDIATION, ETC.

WITH every arrival from Europe comes a cloud of rumors of intervention and mediation. But no intention or threat of that kind can possibly have any other effect than to encourage the rebels in their repression of the rebellion. Europe is at a fact liberty to think and say what she chooses of us. If she goes further and begins to act, she will understand, of course, that she comes into direct collision with us.

The result of an armed English and French intervention for the rebels would be of the gravest kind. Russia would necessarily be drawn into the struggle. Spain could not stay out. It would be universal war. Those nations are governed in the main by a perception of interests. Europe is at present liberty to think and say what she chooses of us. If she goes further and begins to act, she will understand, of course, that she comes into direct collision with us.

If such an intervention should at last succeed, and after long years of war the Union should be temporarily destroyed, still the Slave Power would gain the advantage of our division. But they could not gain that which we should necessarily retain—the principle, because the result would be due to the alliance of monarchies with a despotic faction of civilization, and because the people would understand.

Materially they would gain the advantage that might accrue from a combination which the South after cotton had been lost. For in the course of such a war, not only would the Southern cotton supply be totally destroyed, but immediately the factories of the world must have been supplied from other sources, or enormous distress would have replaced cotton. Evidently the commercial advantage of Europe lies in the sure and speedy victory of its Government.

There are other contingencies, especially for France to consider. If France intends to make war upon Mexico, of course she will carry it out of the way. But that France cares to make war in both upon the United States and Mexico at the same time is not very probable. Nor is England likely to fight for the interests of a power with which she has no treaty and which is at this moment. It is clear that England could possibly gain nothing by such an alliance, and that its natural strength is conspicuous. The golden moment of intervention was just a year ago. That was lost, and it will not be lost or recovered.

The talk of mediation and intervention is only talk. The English hate and jealousy of this country. It is a cheap comfort to a class to which we do not yet dare to aid with arms. That it will be useful to the rebellion is questionable. The leaders of the public mind of this country, produced by the conduct of England and France, it is highly favorable for the people of the North to make the highest misunderstanding should occur between either of those nations and the United States. That the distaunts were not able to compel this country to renounce its traditional principle even for the purpose of bolstering up and Mason, is under all the circumstances an instance of a national magnanimity which the nation scarcely knows. Either is magnanimity, nor humanity, nor intelligence, nor bravery, nor in every excellence of civilization which distinguishes the people of the United States by comparison either with a nation that blows in prisoners from guns or with a nation that sets on that suffocates them in a mountain cavern.

PLANTATION MANNERS.

THE members for slavery in the Congress of the United States ought to try to remember that the House of Representatives is not a slave-pen. Mr. Crittenden, who is a slaveholder and conservative from this State, and one of the oldest, most loyal, and most honored men in the country, the energetic chairman of the committee upon naval affairs, takes the liberty as an American citizen to believe that the Declaration of Independence is not a lie nor the Constitution of the United States a fiction, and that those words, dead instruments, holds that men are men, whatever you may say about it; and that if, unhappily, some members are degraded by the practice of Slave laws, it would be better for the States and for the country that they should be returned immediately. Moreover, he believes that if they had been acknowledged the country would be at this moment in possession of all the information that it has ever been. He therefore wishes that the war may result in destroying the root of rebellion. It is in no spirit of revenge, but of mercy, that he and that end he desires that every aid and relief, including that of the negro, should be given, that under the military powers granted by the Constitution, taken from the rebels.

Mr. Crittenden speaks in a great ability, of the loftiest character, and of the purest life; and that is his opinion. Any one who knows anything of the no man is infallible. But certainly he has the same right to hold and express the opinion that Mr. Mallory or Mr. Conrad has. Mr. Crittenden, or any other person has to announce in the House of Congress that slavery is safer than liberty. In conversation in the House the other day Mr. Sedgwick said, that as the war was, by the confession of the rebels, begun for the existence of slavery, he hoped it would end in its extinction. Mr. Sedgwick has every right to say that he would be almost satisfied with the same result, provided that a fair people like Mr. Sedgwick could be hung before the end of the war.

It is high time that Mr. Mallory and the gentlemen who find nothing worth saving in the country but slavery should understand that the time has passed in the Congress of the United States when a profession of faith in the fundamental idea of this Government is to be received by ruffianism either in words or deeds. They should be taught by public opinion to know that Mr. Preston Brooks no longer sits in that House, and that his principles and practices are no longer the Congressional rule of conduct; and that if Mr. Mallory or any body else attempts to revive them, he will find that his only reward is the disgust and contempt of every loyal American citizen.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK OF FOREIGN TRAVEL.

In a neat and convenient form the author of this volume, Mr. Fetridge, has condensed the necessary information for travelers in the great European and Eastern tour. He understands perfectly that such a book ought to contain what the traveler must otherwise "pick out of some twenty-five different guide-books, at a cost of nearly seventy dollars, besides the inconvenience of carrying some twenty-five pounds of extra baggage." This little work teems with valuable directions. It puts the traveler in the way of seeing and hearing and knowing all that is most interesting and delightful in his tour: and for the American traveler especially it contains a score of invaluable hints in regard to the details of traveling and expenses. The author has consulted all the proper books, and has himself made many of the tours for which he gives ample instructions. He has made an indispensable vade mecum of travel—and furnishes blank pages at the end that the notes of future travelers may enable his book to keep up with the times.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

The Wreath for Wrinkles.—"If flowers are worn as ornaments for the dress, those in the hair should, of course, be of the same kind; for elderly ladies they can be intermixed with lace or feathers." Very well. If elderly ladies must wear flowers in their hair, and would choose appropriate flowers, they should decorate it with elder-flowers. The lace with which those flowers are intermixed should be antique, and the only feathers to match are those of a goose.

The Height of Liberality.—Professor Holloway takes a box of Morison's Pills, and believing that he has been cured by them, sends a testimonial to the proprietors.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Maniac.—Teeth can not be extracted from the gums of trees.

Hoopoo.—Orchard is a place where apples are grown. You may call it a Poniatowski Squash; but this term, though endearing, conveys no definite idea to the mind.

Bobby.—How many times may I ask for potatoes at dinner? Twice, taking care to gasp between each application. Observe, no charge for booking.

Cabbage.—Burns was a Scorchman.

Peach.—The quotation about potatoes is in Shakspeare's Timon the Tartar.

Greeneye asks, "Do ganders lay eggs?" No, gooseberries, of course.

Daisy.—The masculine of cowslip is bulrush.

Doddles.—The best peaches are found at the sea-side at Peachy Head.

A Luxury.—A traveler was lately boasting of the luxury of arriving at night, after a hard day's journey, to partake of the enjoyment of a well-cut ham and the left leg of a goose. "Pray, Sir, what is the peculiar luxury of a left leg?" "Sir, to conceive its luxury, you must find that it is the only leg that is left!"

"All maidens are good," says one moralist; "but where do the bad wives come from?"

"Then I'll bring a suit for my bill!" said an enraged tailor to a dandy, who refused to pay him. "Do, my dear fellow," replied the imperturbable swell, pointing to his threadbare clothes, "that's just what I want."

Follow the laws of nature and you will never be poor. Your wants will be but few. Follow the laws of the world and you will never be rich. You will want more than you can acquire.

A Decided Mistake.—A friend who is in the habit of breakfasting at a coffee-house has made the discovery that the old adage of "Nothing like leather" is a great mistake. He says that the steaks he gets every morning are very much like it.

An advertiser in a daily paper, who rejoices in the various occupations of doctor, lawyer, justice of the peace, and dry-goods merchant, adds the following to his list of pursuits and qualifications: "N.B. Auctioneering of the loudest kind, interwoven with ventriloquism."

"I say, Dick, don't you think that if the women had to do the fighting instead of the men they would make sad work of it?" "No; why do you ask?" "Because I think they would, they have such an engaging way with them." "That's very true; but they have also such a captivating way that there would be doubtless more prisoners than killed."

Two boys going home one day, found a box in the road, and disputed who was the finder. They fought the whole afternoon without coming to a decision. At last they agreed to divide the contents equally, but on opening the box, lo, and behold! it was empty. Few wars have been more profitable than this to the parties concerned.

An Irish barrister lately addressed a full court in Bankruptcy as "gentlemen" instead of "your honors." After he had concluded, a brother barrister reminded him of his error. He immediately arose to apologize thus: "May it please your honors, I find I called yer honors gentlemen. I made a mistake, yer honors." He then sat down, and we hope the court was satisfied.

We never knew one who was in the habit of scolding able to govern a family. What makes people scold? The want of self-government. How then can they govern others? Those who govern well are generally calm. They are prompt and resolute, but steady and mild.

Advice to Husbands.—If your wife happens to be of opinion that absolute monarchy is better than constitutional government, be resigned. You can not say your sovereign was not of your own choosing.

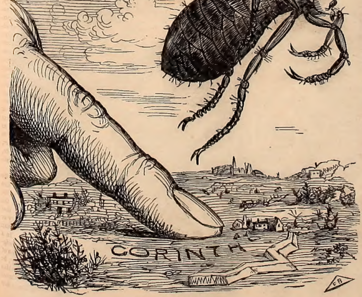
ESSAYS AND REMARKS.

Banter.—Mutual banter is the ordinary conversation of people who justly despise one another. If you are a sensible fellow you will take banter in good part, and gratify your banterer by laughing at the fun which he makes of you, which you will be enabled to do with natural ease by considering what a ridiculous opinion of his own superiority to yourself he must entertain to have the impudence of presuming to make you his butt.

Banter may irritate a rational man if it take him unawares, as when he is talking in earnest, so as to confuse and balk him, and thus, like the zany's foolscap when it stopped the philosopher's telescope, put him into a rage. You will be subject to be ruffled by banter if you want sufficient presence of mind always, when attacked with it, to think how stupid you must be to suffer your serenity to be disturbed by an ass. Still, when banter flurries a man and puts him out, it is a considerable bore, and therefore he might well be vexed with his acquaintance for mocking him to his face, although he would not care a button how much they chose to deride him behind his back.

Banter among the lowest class of cabmen, omnibus conductors, and touters, and the inferior order of thieves, becomes chaff. Chaff is unbridled banter; insolence worded without scruple or restraint; scorn venting itself in a guffaw. As in banter smiling gentlemen pleasantly twit one another with follies and foibles, so grinning ruffians, interchanging chaff, bandy imputations of depravity. It is good for a gentleman to accustom himself to stand chaff, for that will enable him to sustain banter with complacency.

"That's my business!" as the butcher said to the dog that was killing his sheep.



An Irish footman, who got a situation at the west end of London, on entering a room where there was a vase of golden fish, exclaimed, "Well, by J——, this is the first time I ever saw red herrings alive!"

A lot of fellows bantering a large and fat companion, remarked that if all flesh was grass, he must be a load of hay. "I suspect I am," said the man, "from the way the asses are nibbling at me."

"If you children quarrel so about that doll, I'll break it; there's no peace where you are." "Oh do, mamma," screamed the young hopefuls; "then we all shall have a little piece."

The facetious Mr. Bearcroft told his friend Mr. Vansittart, "Your name is such a long one, I shall drop the sittart and call you Van for the future." "With all my heart," said he; "by the same rule I shall drop the croft and call you Bear."

Douglas Jerrold was subjected to a series of long interviews with an old lady, a friend of the family, who was in the habit of talking to him in a very gloomy and depressing manner, presenting to him only the sad side of life. "Hang it," said Jerrold, "she wouldn't allow there was a bright side to the moon!"

THE REBEL FLEA.
You put your Finger on him, and he isn't there.

Having a Rest.—"Why do you walk, Bob, when you've got a donkey to ride?" said a gentleman to an Irish lad, who was walking by the side of his donkey. "Sure, then," replied the boy, "I'm just walking to rest my legs."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, June 24, in the Senate, a resolution directing inquiry as to what legislation is necessary to punish Congressmen who lend their official influence to procure government contracts was adopted. A Message was received from the President vetoing the bill repealing the act prohibiting the issue of small bank-notes in the District of Columbia. An executive session was held, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the bills authorizing an additional issue of $150,000,000 of Treasury notes, and appropriating $5,000,000 for the payment of volunteers' bounties, were passed. The Senate's amendments to the Pacific Railroad bill, and also the House bill prohibiting polygamy in the Territories, were concurred in. After the transaction of considerable business of a miscellaneous character the House adjourned.

On Wednesday, June 25, in the Senate, the Judiciary Committee reported back the Bankrupt bill, with a recommendation that it be postponed till December next. The bill to prevent Congressmen and Government officers taking compensation for procuring contracts was reported back by the Judiciary Committee. The discussion of the Confiscation bill was then resumed, and continued till the adjournment.——In the House, resolutions of the Missouri State Convention on the subject of emancipation were presented, and ordered to be printed. A bill for the admission of Western Virginia into the Union was referred to the Committee on Territories. The bill providing for the adjustment of the claims of loyal citizens for damages caused by the Union troops was taken up, and discussed at considerable length. The House then took up the Tariff bill, and, after the adoption of a number of amendments, adjourned.

On Thursday, June 26, in the Senate, the bill granting the proceeds of certain public lands in aid of the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad was passed. The bill for the admission of Western Virginia into the Union as a State was taken up, and discussed by Senator Sumner. The bill recognizes slavery till the end of the year 1863; but Senator Sumner moved an amendment prohibiting slavery in the State. Pending the question, the Senate resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment, and proceeded with the trial of Judge West H. Humphreys, of Tennessee, charged with high crimes and misdemeanors against the Government. After the hearing of testimony, the President of the Senate pronounced the judgment of the Court, as follows: "It is hereby ordered and decreed that West H. Humphreys, Judge of the District Court for the Western, Middle, and Eastern Districts of Tennessee, be, and is hereby, removed from said office, and that he be and is disqualified from holding or enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States." The Court and the Senate then adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Walton, of Vermont, offered a preamble and resolution declaring, in effect, that the reporter of the New York Tribune, who sent to that paper an article relative to the purchase by Congress of Gales & Seaton's compilation of the proceedings of Congress, is guilty of a breach of the privileges accorded to reporters by the House, and directing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the facts. The preamble and resolution were adopted by a vote of 102 against 8. The Senate bill increasing the army medical corps was passed. No other business was transacted, the members of the House being in attendance upon the High Court of Impeachment for the trial of Judge Humphreys.

On Friday, June 27, in the Senate, the bill punishing Congressmen and other public officers, and disqualifying them from holding office, on conviction of their having taken any consideration for procuring government contracts, office, or place from the government, was passed. The report of the conference committee on the bill reorganizing the navy was agreed to. The debate on the Confiscation bill was then resumed, and continued till the adjournment.——In the House, the morning hour was occupied in discussing the bill providing indemnity to loyal citizens for losses of property through United States troops. A bill was reported making good the amount of the Indian trust bonds stolen from the Interior Department through the connivance of the traitor Floyd. In Committee of the Whole the discussion of the Tariff bill was resumed, and all the sections of the bill were acted on except the last two, when the committee rose. A resolution was adopted ordering the arrest of Michael C. Murphy, of New York, to answer for contempt, he having refused to appear before the Judiciary Committee in the case of Hon. Benjamin Wood. The House then adjourned till Monday.

On Saturday, June 28, in the Senate, a communication was received from the War Department transmitting official reports of the battle of Pittsburg Landing, one hundred and sixty in number. The consideration of the Confiscation bill was resumed; and, after some debate, the motion of Senator Clark, of New Hampshire, to substitute the bill reported by the Senate committee for the House bill, was adopted by a vote of twenty-one against seventeen; and afterward the bill was passed by a vote of twenty-eight against thirteen. An executive session was then held, and the Senate adjourned.

THE BATTLE OF MECHANICSVILLE.

Another terrible battle took place before Richmond on 26th and 27th. It appears that General M'Clellan had become convinced by 25th that General Fitz John Porter's corps, which was on the north side of the Chickahominy, should be moved across the river so as to be on the same side as the rest of the army, and the movement of commissary stores and tents had already begun. This movement will eventually necessitate the abandonment of the railroad to the Pamunky and of our dépôt at White House; and orders were sent to White House to embark our stores and send them to Fortress Monroe, with a view to the establishment of a new dépôt on the James or Chickahominy rivers.

On 26th the enemy attacked simultaneously General Porter's corps near Mechanicsville (the rebels having crossed the Chickahominy near the Virginia Central), and our forces near Hanover Court House. They took nothing by the attack, General M'Call's division, which was in the advance, being thoroughly able to hold their ground.

Early on the morning of 27th M'Call received orders to fall back slowly in the direction of Gaines's Mills. The order was obeyed. The retreat was so slow that the troops took six hours to march less than six miles. After passing Gaines's Mills they reached the ground where they had been directed to make a stand—a large plain lying some distance east of Gaines's Mills, southeast of Coal Harbor and north of the Chickahominy. There they awaited the attack of the enemy, who came on in great force at about 3 P.M. on 27th. The battle raged fiercely till night, without change of position. At one time General Porter was so hard pressed—the enemy having received reinforcements—that he sent across the Chickahominy to M'Clellan for help. It came at once. A few thousand men, under Generals Slocum, Palmer, French, and Meagher, were hurried across the river, and with this reinforcement General Porter held his ground firmly, and holds it still. Night put an end to the conflict.

The effect of these battles is to change somewhat the line of our army before Richmond. Instead of stretching from Mechanicsville, on the north side of the Chickahominy, to Bear and White Oak Swamp, on the south bank of the river, a distance of some twenty miles, our forces are now concentrated on the Chickahominy, at what was till recently our left flank. As soon as a new dépôt and base of operations are established, the whole army will move forward without delay upon the rebel right and Richmond—probably along the bank of the James River.

General Jackson is said to have reinforced the rebels with his army from the Shenandoah Valley.

THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA.

General Pope has received the supreme command of affairs in the Shenandoah Valley, and will now be pitted against the rebel Stonewall Jackson. The forces under Major-Generals Frémont, Banks, and M'Dowell have been consolidated into one army, called "the Army of Virginia," and Major-General Pope has been especially assigned by the President to the chief command. The forces under General Frémont constitute the first army corps, to be commanded by General Frémont. The forces under General Banks constitute the second army corps, and are to be commanded by him. The forces under General M'Dowell constitute the third army corps, to be commanded by him.

CARVING A HEAD-STONE.

The following is published:

War Department, Washington, June 27, 1862.

I.—Major-General John C. Frémont having requested to be relieved from the command of the first army corps of the Army of Virginia, because, as he says, the position assigned him by the appointment of Major-General Pope as Commander-in-chief of the Army of Virginia is subordinate and inferior to that heretofore held by him, and to remain in the subordinate command now assigned would, as he says, largely reduce his rank and consideration in the service, it is ordered that Major-General John C. Frémont be relieved from command.

II.—That Brigadier-General Rufus King be and he is hereby assigned to the command of the first army corps of the Army of Virginia, in place of General Frémont, relieved. By order of the PRESIDENT.

Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

ROSECRANS IN THE FIELD.

General Rosecrans, who has hitherto proved himself an able officer in his career in Western Virginia, is to take General Pope's command.

A SKIRMISH BEFORE RICHMOND.

On 25th June, our pickets on the left were advanced considerably, under sharp resistance on the part of the enemy. The movement commenced about noon. At 3½ o'clock General M'Clellan telegraphed that the picket lines of General Kearney and one half those of General Hooker were where he desired them to be, and that he hoped soon to accomplish all he aimed at for the day. At 5 o'clock he telegraphed that the affair was over, and that he had gained his point fully, and with but little loss, notwithstanding the strong opposition. The enemy was driven out of his camps in front, and all was quiet. While this important movement was being made on the left, General Fitz-John Porter, further to the right, succeeded in silencing the enemy's batteries in his front.

The ground fought for was a swamp, with thick underbrush, beyond which is an open space, the command of which is extremely important. But little more ground is now to be gained to place our troops entirely beyond the swamps fringing the Chickahominy—a matter of the first moment as regards the health of the troops, as well as facility of movement.

THE FIGHT AT CHARLESTON.

The troops under command of General Benham made an attack on Secessionville, on James Island, S. C., at four o'clock on the morning of the 16th, and after four hours' hard fighting against the rebel batteries, were repulsed, with heavy loss. The Seventy-ninth New York Volunteers (Highland Regiment) behaved with the most determined valor, and suffered fearfully. The Eighth Michigan sustained with them the hottest portion of the fight, and suffered equally. The attack was made on the Tower Battery, which, for some time past, had been annoying our troops with shells, and General Benham resolved to make a reconnoissance in force to discover the strength of the enemy at that point. The result proved that his command was not large enough for the operation he undertook to accomplish; and although the troops retreated in good order after a terrific combat, their sacrifice was heavy, and their repulse, under the circumstances, was rendered inevitable. That General Benham had not force enough to effect what he attempted is unquestionable; and the blame of failure is put upon him, and he has been sent here to New York under arrest. This affair cost us six hundred and sixty-eight brave soldiers killed, wounded, and missing.

RAILROAD ATTACKED NEAR MEMPHIS.

An attack was made by a body of rebel cavalry on Wednesday upon a train bound for Corinth, on the Charleston and Memphis Railroad, twelve miles from the latter city, containing a company of the Fifty-sixth Ohio regiment, a number of officers, and several teams and wagons. The rebels destroyed the locomotive, burned the cars, killed ten of our men, and captured several officers including Colonel Kenney, Majors Pride and Sharp.

REBEL CLERGYMEN IN LIMBO.

Many of the clergy of Tennessee are obstinately rebellious, with the exception of the priesthood of the Catholic Church, who are devotedly loyal to the Union. The leading clergymen of the Methodist and Baptist persuasions refused to take the oath of allegiance at the Conference in Nashville, and many of them were sent to the Penitentiary as impenitent rebels.

OUR ARMY IN ARIZONA.

General Carleton's brigade of Union troops has entered Arizona. The advance-guard, under Colonel West, reached Tucson about the 17th ult., the rebels having previously abandoned the place. The Stars and Stripes were again hoisted over the ruins of Fort Breckinridge.

THE MORMON LEGISLATURE.

The Deseret Legislature met for the first time at Salt Lake City on the 14th of April, and Brigham Young sent in his Message as Executive of the State. The Governor is sound on the Union, and strongly urges the immediate recognition of the State authority of Deseret by Congress. He says the government will save, by her admission into the Union, thirty-four thousand dollars now paid for Territorial expenses, and receive her annual quota of the governmental tax. He recommends the Legislature, when Deseret is taken in, to exact that it be done with all the laws that are now in operation in the Territory of Utah, including, of course, the law recognizing polygamy.

MORE TALK OF INTERVENTION.

The Patrie of the 11th ultimo circulated the following paragraph in larger type than usual: "We are assured that negotiations are about to commence in London to arrive at an understanding which may enable proposals to be made for a mediation in American affairs. If the negotiations in question succeed, the mediation of England and France will be tendered simultaneously, and in identical terms, to the belligerent parties."

THE OLD CHURCH AT HAMPTON, VIRGINIA.

We give on this page a picture which shows in the foreground the OLD CHURCH AT HAMPTON—the oldest in the United States, which was built of bricks brought over from England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Hampton used to be a delightful place of residence, especially in summer. Rude war and the savage destructiveness of the rebels have now left it desolate, and many a year will revolve before it recovers its ancient aspect of quiet happiness and repose.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL GEORGE F. SHEPLEY.

GENERAL SHEPLEY, whose portrait we give on page 453, is the son of ex-Chief-Justice Shepley, of Maine, the most eminent jurist of that State. He was born at Saco, and is now forty-two years of age. Was a graduate of Dartmouth, of the law school of Cambridge, and further perfected his studies in the office of Judge Howard, of Portland.

He commenced the practice of his profession in the city of Bangor at the age of twenty-one, and almost immediately entered upon a large practice, and was engaged as counsel in some of the most important causes in the Supreme Court of the State.

A few years afterward he removed to Portland, continuing there the practice of his profession, to which he has been devotedly attached, and from which he has never allowed himself to be diverted for any length of time by any allurements of political or official position. Near the close of President Polk's term, though then a very young man, he received the responsible office of United States District Attorney, which position he held to the close of Mr. Buchanan's Administration.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—A FORAGING PARTY.

He commenced his military service as Colonel of the Twelfth Regiment Maine Volunteers. This regiment was designated from the outset to constitute a portion of General Butler's New England Division. The Report of the Adjutant-General of Maine states that, "upon the nomination of General Butler, Hon. George F. Shepley, of Portland, late District Attorney of the United States, and whose reputation as one of the ablest and most distinguished lawyers in New England is too well known to require mention here, was appointed Colonel of the regiment. The clothing, uniforms, equipment, and complete outfit of this regiment were got up by Colonel Shepley and Quartermaster Hall, in command of the State to be irreparable, but was soon relieved by a first-class regiment, which saved the rear of Carrollton and New Orleans from serious attack. A subsequent order established to clean the city and help the poor by judicious remunerative labor. For five hours each day, at the Mayor's office, General Shepley gives complaints, and listens with patience to the petitions of citizens, corporations, and others who may be impervished by the rebellion; and these duties he performs in addition to his military responsibilities.

MAJOR-GENERAL L. WALLACE.

MAJOR-GENERAL LEWIS WALLACE, whose portrait we reproduce on page 430, has been, we believe, a lawyer by trade, and a politician by habit and predilection. When the rebellion broke out, in April, 1861, he raised a regiment which was dressed and drilled as the Turkish Indiana Zouaves. They were Zouaves, and their friends claimed that they were more perfect in the exercise of drill than any other regiment in the service. When they were mustered in, at Indianapolis, Colonel Wallace made the whole regiment kneel before the State House and take a solemn oath to "remember Bunker Hill"—Jeff Davis by name. He was one of the deputations of cowardice upon the Indiana Regiments at Buena Vista. The Eleventh Indiana saw no service during the three months' campaign, but they were at the capture of Romney and other fights in West Virginia. At the expiration of their term of service Colonel Wallace reorganized them for the war, and they were sent to Missouri. On the morning of the 21st of May, 1862, General Wallace was appointed Brigadier under General F. P. Smith, and was in command for some time in Smithland, Kentucky. He made several important reconnoissances at this time, and attracted so much attention by his skill and ability that he was soon promoted to the command of a division. At the storming of Fort Donelson he distinguished himself conspicuously, and was thereupon appointed a Major-Generalship. He again did good service on the second day's fight at Pittsburg Landing, after the evacuation of Corinth his division was ordered to Memphis, which place they reached a few days since. As Memphis has fallen, and is now being command at Memphis, was to put a stop to the seceding publish of the Mississippi River, and fill the Western officers General Wallace is perhaps the most popular with his men.

Of his strictness as a disciplinarian our correspondent tells a good story. In camp near Pittsburg he was out one day four of his soldiers carrying their tent half on ex, which they had appropriated. He ordered each of the men by turns to carry his half of the tent, and as this should not round a tree for to-day—the performance to last a whole day in the broiling sun. He then compelled them in the same way to fix their tent, and so to keep off the flies. And on the third day he had them bury a with appropriate ceremonies. The effect of this affair caused in camp may well be imagined.

THE BATTLE OF ST. CHARLES, ARKANSAS.

We publish on page 438 an illustration of the BATTLE AT ST. CHARLES, on the White River, in Arkansas, on 17th June. Our gun-boats ascended the river, discovered a rebel battery, and commenced a fight which lasted for an hour and a half. A steam-drum of the Mound City, and caused the death of four officers and seven men. The gun-boats, Colonel Fitch, who accompanied the boats with a land force, immediately stormed the rebel works. The following official report conveys an idea of the affair:

> ST. CHARLES, WHITE RIVER, ARKANSAS, June 17, 1862.
> To Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:
> On arriving within sight of this place this morning we discovered that the enemy had two batteries here, supported by a land force, consisting of infantry and cavalry.
> A simultaneous attack was made at seven o'clock A. M. by the regiment and the gun-boats. About forty-eight hours' notice had been given to the enemy that the gun-boats and batteries were thrown out, who drove in the enemy's pickets.
> The gun-boats then moved up and opened on their batteries. A rifled shot from one of the gun-boats penetrated the steam-drum of the Mound City, disabling, by scalding, most of her crew.
> Approximate that some similar accident might happen to the other gun-boats, and knowing the necessity of their support, I signaled the gun-boats to cease firing, that we would storm the battery. They ceased at once, the right moment, and my men carried the battery gallantly. The enemy were driven from the support of the guns, my gunners drove out their men, their commanding officer, Freye (formerly of the Arkansas State Militia), wounded and captured, and eight brass and iron guns, with ammunition, captured.
> The enemy's loss is unknown. We have buried over forty, eight of their dead, and other dead and wounded are daily brought in.
> Our casualties among my own command are small, the only one I am losing from the creeping steam in the Mound City. She will probably be repaired and ready to proceed with us up the river to-morrow.
> I will report with as much as early as possible. Very respectfully, G. N. FITCH,
> Colonel commanding Forty-sixth Indiana Volunteers.

> UNITED STATES FLAG-STEAMER "BARNEY,"
> MEMPHIS, JUNE 19, via CAIRO, JUNE 21, 1862.
> Hon. Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy:
> The gun-boat Conestoga, returning from the White River, reports the capture of two rebel batteries, mounting seven guns, at St. Charles, 60 miles from the mouth of the river. The batteries were commanded by Colonel Fritz, of the Arkansas State Militia, and were taken by Colonel Fitch. The city was gallantly carried by Colonel G. N. Fitch, at the head of the Forty-sixth Indiana Volunteers.
> A shot caused the explosion of the steam-drum of the Mound City, by which the gun-boat part of her officers and crew were killed and wounded.
> I write by to-day's mail. C. H. DAVIS, Flag-officer.

The following, from the Tribune correspondence, refers to the affair, and we believe to the explosion of the Mound City:

> The gun-boats were covered with miserable, perishing wretches. Some of the officers who were in the cabin when the explosion occurred, lay in their berths, scalded beside some poor though fortunate fellow who had just escaped from them.
> The close and burning atmosphere of the vessel was rent with cries, and piercing shrieks, and groans—a Pandemonium of torture and despair.
> They suffered, writhed, and twisted like a coil of serpents over burning fagots; but many, who were less injured, leaped into the water, and by their own efforts or self-preservation, and, resting to the ports, leaped out into the river. The water for a while seemed to be full of people, and they struck out bravely for the shore opposite to the batteries, and a large number of persons.
> Before I finish I must not omit to mention the gallantry of Lieutenant Bidwell. Others were conspicuous for their bravery, prompted by an involuntary instinct, when their condition would have appealed to the most callous and barbarious, and melted the stoutest heart, our enemies, but Bidwell displayed a coolness and a deliberate courage, the guns of the upper and lower batteries upon the unfortunate in the river, and not until then did his spirit depart to its rest.
> Not satisfied with this, a detachment of sharp-shooters left the second work that the Mound City and St. Louis gun-boats had silenced, and fired upon the men in the water, killing and wounding many.
> Even Lieutenant Bidwell, as he struck I am as American officer, prompted by an involuntary instinct, when their condition would have appealed to the most callous and barbarious, and melted the stoutest heart, our enemies, but Bidwell displayed a coolness and a deliberate courage, the guns of the upper and lower batteries upon the unfortunate in the river, and not until then did his spirit depart to its rest.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We publish on pages 440 and 441 a large drawing illustrating a BAYONET CHARGE; on page 444 an illustration of a Sharp-shooter; on page 445 a bear during a battle; and on page 437 a BRIDGE OVER RICHMOND AND THE VICINITY, showing the bridges over the Chickahominy, and the fortifications erected by the rebels, and the positions over which the battle is so steadily and surely pushing his way onward.

The two former drawings are by our artist, Mr. Winslow Homer, who spent some time with the army of the Potomac, and drew his figures from life. The BAYONET CHARGE is one of those spirited pictures ever published in this country. It is notorious to military men that soldiers seldom actually cross bayonets with others in battle. Before the regiment which is charging reaches its antagonist, the latter is generally in full flight. But the charge and all the bravery in the world will not protect a man from being run through the body by a bayonet if he does not run away. The sharp-shooter was drawn from a sketch made by a Massachusetts lieutenant, who was on picket duty, and saw the rebel sharp-shooter deliberately crossed bayonets, and his fisherman one of the Russian Regiments is said to have stood still while a man ran a bayonet into his Polish regiment. At Fairoaks the rebels almost invariably broke and fled before our bayonets reached them. The Zouaves were famous for this. They were hand-to-hand tussles at particular points. One of these is represented in our picture.

The "Surgeon at Work" introduces us to the most painful scene on the battle-field. Away in the rear, quiet and out of the way of the hurried, spected among civilized soldiers, the surgeon and his assistants receive the wounded as they arrive, and swiftly minister to their needs. Arteries are tied, ligatures and tourniquets applied, flesh wounds dressed, broken limbs set, and the operations and where haste is essential, amputations performed within sight and sound of the battle-field. In no scene the surgeon is often the one who requires most nerve and most courage. The swaying tide of battle frequently sweeps the field hospital, and sometimes brutal soldiers will take a flying shot at him as they pass. Upon his skilled and judgment depend the lives of a large proportion of the wounded; and if they fall into the enemy's hands, military law requires that he shall be considered and act as a prisoner. An arrangement has lately been made between General Howell Cobb, of the Union army of the Potomac, and the army of the Potomac, by which surgeons are to be considered non-combatants and released from captivity, and the wounded are in the hands of the surgeons of the enemy.

MAJOR-GENERAL POPE.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN POPE, who has just been appointed to the command of the Army of Virginia, to operate in the Shenandoah Valley, was born in Kentucky, about the year 1822. He entered the Military Academy at West Point from Illinois in 1842, and graduated in the Corps of Engineers and of Topographical Engineers. He was in the Mexican war, and a brevet was given him for gallantry, and then he obtained his First Lieutenancy. Again at Buena Vista he won laurels and the brevet rank of Captain. He was still a Captain when the Rebellion broke out, and was one of the officers appointed by the War Department to escort President Lincoln to Washington. He was loyal, and was soon after the inauguration appointed to a command in Missouri. Hundreds of marauders were at that time overrunning the State, burning bridges, robbing and murdering, and firing into army trains. General Union men, and firing into army trains. General Pope inaugurated the plan of making each county responsible for outbreaks occurring therein. An attack having subsequently been made by the rebels on a body of Union men, General Pope seized the damage at a given sum, ordered the county to pay it on a day fixed, and, when the county officials showed a disposition to trifle with him, seized property and produce enough to pay the amount required. He was subsequently appointed by General Halleck to the command of Central Missouri, and effected several important seizures of rebel arms and supplies, and rendered it necessary for General Price to fall back. When General Curtis was sent in pursuit of Price, General Pope was distributed to Commerce, Missouri, where he organized with remarkable dispatch a compact army of about 12,000 men, and marched through Arkansas to the rear of New Madrid. He took the place by a brilliant dash, seizing a large quantity of arms and munitions of war. He then, conjointly with the mortar and gun-boat fleet, laid siege to Island No. 10, which single night have been indefinitely prolonged but for "a transverse movement" undertaken by General Pope. He cut a canal through the swamp and bayou, through which a gun-boat and transports were sent to him from above. This enabled him to cross the river, and to lay the entire rebel army at Island No. 10. General Pope was subsequently ordered to reinforce General Halleck at Pittsburg. He was the first corps to enter the place after the evacuation, and he pursued the flying force of Beauregard for forty miles, capturing large stores of ammunition and a large number of prisoners.

He has just arrived at Washington, and received the command of the Army of Virginia, with Fremont, Banks, and M'Dowell under him. We give his portrait on page 445.

ESCAPE OF CONTRABANDS.

On page 444 we publish a picture illustrating the ESCAPE OF CONTRABANDS from the coast of Florida to the United States bark Kingfisher, doing blockading duty. The author of the sketch thus describes it:

> I beg to transmit to you, herewith inclosed, a rough sketch, which I made yesterday of the vessel (on the 17th instant), with Mr. Marks River and Light-house in the distance. They were six in number, almost entirely in a nude state. They state that they were seven in one small egg, and had subsisted on what wild hog they could run down, and the roots and herbs that grow around in the bush and swamp. Their suit consisted of an old flannel blanket, and the old coat of a rebel soldier. Poor people, I suppose, a dog of treats. Should you deem it worthy of publication, it is at your disposal.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOUTHERN UNIONISM.

DEXTER, ISLESBORO, June 19, 1862.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

DEAR SIR,—A southerner by birth, lineage, and education, a slaveholder, the son and grandson of slaveholders, and myself steeped from the land of despotism and blood, I hasten to thank you for your just appreciation of the difference of this martial crisis that is now upon us, and for the sound advice you give the Government. Your remarks upon slavery touch my interests; but I am one of those who believe their interests with the welfare of their country. I can forget my private losses for the good of my country. I can forget my private losses for the good of your unswerving support of the Government in the hour of its trial. You say that the United States Government must show that it is the strongest, and that it is determined. O my it again and again, and let the false, lisp, perjuring Union men of the South take heed! You seem to think disparagingly and doubtingly of Southern Union sentiment. In this you are mistaken. You know not the doubts and fears that have strangled the hope of Southern Union men. Remember the unworthy article that have appeared in certain tokkowans or traitorous Northern papers, and Vallandigham's and other villain's addresses scattered broadcast over the South by exultant secession papers; and then the sufferings of the people of the Union-States, and the extraordinary course of the Government in dealing with traitors, and the cautious and timid policy—allowing men boldly to refuse to swear allegiance, and then walk about among us and traitors and plotters, and then what a man was actually beaten and beaten by rebel soldiers. Why, I know men in the South nearly to death upon the handles of the United States flag, and for standing for the Union, and that too within forty feet of the Union soldiers, who had no orders to interfere. Can you wonder that men who entertain their enthusiasm upon the same occasion, were thwarted with death in my hearing by bloodthirsty secessionists, standing around with Colt's repeaters in their bosoms. The Government must remember that the South is not that it is earnest, and tens of thousands of Union men will rush to its support, authority and take up arms for it. Did not forty men volunteer in Conway County, Arkansas, a few days since, to overcome Curtis's army? The Union men of the South have been ground down to the dust, their hearts crushed so long that they are slow to hope again. If you crushed so long that they are exciting and unreasonably every cause only know how extremely sensitive mankind. The expression of Union sentiment has been punished, you would no longer at their hesitancy. Did you ever reflect what a tremendous engine of power Fear was? How did Robespierre hold France trembling at his feet, every one praying for his death, yet none daring to strike? Caesar. No, Sir, we are mistaken. True Southern men, you, hundreds of thousands of loyal hearts unceasingly pray for the restoration of the Flag of the Union, and with trembingly, but none the less fervently.

Do you not know that two-thirds at least of the people of the South are non-slaveholders? And can you believe that they are willing, or ever were willing, to fight a battle for the rich aristocracy of slavery? Many were deceived by adroit and designing men into not acting at all, some few into voting for secession; and in some States, particularly North Carolina and Tennessee, they were bullied and bullied into secession. And in Arkansas the Convention, after having been elected as pledged to the Union by an overwhelming majority, voted the State out of the Union and never submitted their action to the people. Have you ever known military authority or execution for strife five thousand? Many of my intimate friends urged me to go with them. I told them, as they never could get my assistance to ruin my country. My constant reply was,

"Did you ever know a revolution to succeed that did not spring from the hearts of the people?" Remember, they were overborne for twelve months. Did you look like men or chivalry? In most cases they volunteered to escape the draft with which they were constantly threatened. And their refusal to re-enlist produced the infamous conscription law. And they pray for the advance of the Union army, for they know that nothing else can stop this bloody war and relieve them from intolerable military despotism. Oh, then, keep it before the people and Government of the United States, that the Government must show itself the strongest. If this is done, every man in the South could be banished, or got out of the way, the people would return to their allegiance immediately.

Yours truly, E. MERRITT.

AFTER.

BY WILLIAM WINTER.

Now she lies here dead before you,
Still and cold as any stone;
Now the dreadful grief broods o'er you,
Desolate and all alone;
Now that all of passion's past,
It is well we meet at last.

Daytime—but you would not know it—
And the summer sun is bright
As the visions of a poet—
And she only died last night!—
Ah, it is a sorry jest,
All these things are for the best.

Say you loved her, loved her truly,
With the purest faith of man,
Sacrificing all things for her
As a noble lover can;
Yet she made you—yes, I see—
Just the thing you chose to be.

Loved her? Bah! your truth and honor
And your manhood, what were they?
Stand up here and look upon her!
Look, now she is sleeping there.

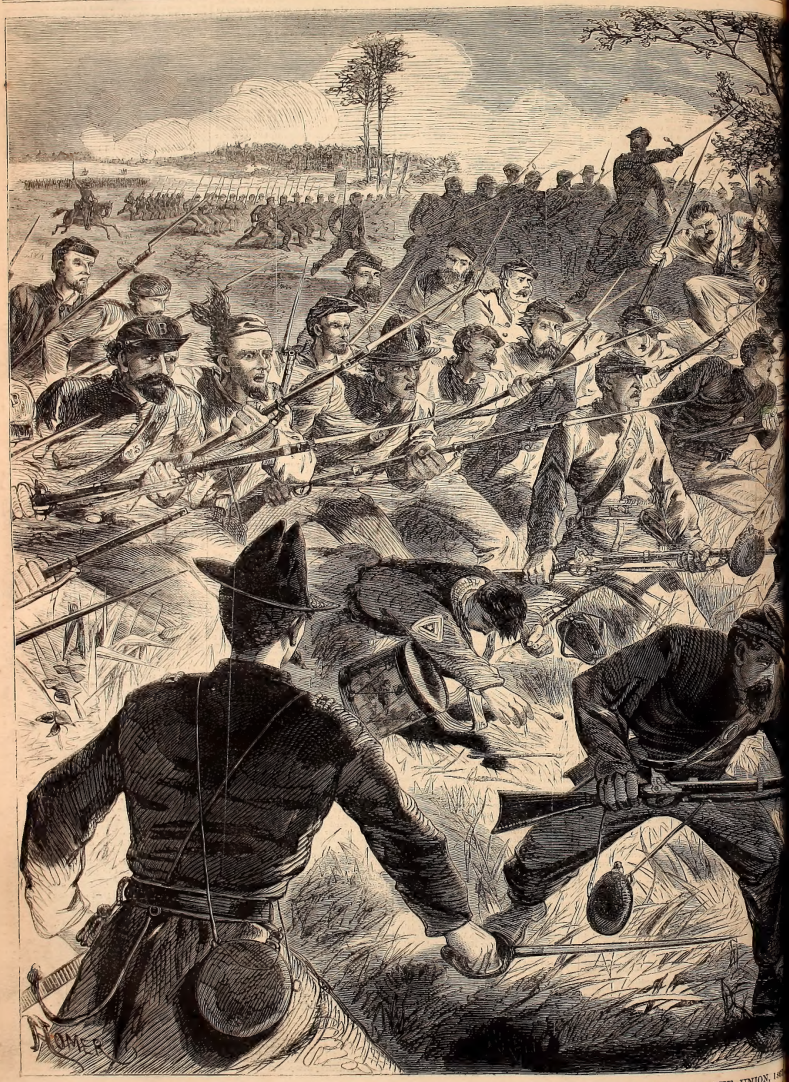
See, I pity you, poor dreamer;
I, whom you have hated long;
And I will not make it seem her
Fault, that she has done you wrong:
She was heavenly—like a star—
She was what the angels are!

Hope, I say; and when you meet her
With them in the Blest Place,
Clasp her to your soul and greet her
With a talk of splendid pain;
Tell her, in your starry dream
How I told you words of hope.

Time and tide flow on forever;
Pleasure alternates with pain;
Life is restless with endeavor;
And with loss, and sorrow with gain;
But there is no settled bliss
In this world for only this.

For around us are the curses,
And the tumult and the war;
We are jostled in our nearses
As we always were before.
Only those who taste the strife
Who attain the higher life.

Look up bravely. Say I cheered you.
Standing here beside this corse;
Say it was her love endeared you;
Tell her of my tender force;
Tell her, howso'er you will,
Reined, lest, I love her still!



Not for me is any morrow,
Crown of love or crown of fame:
I will tread this mighty sorrow
In the mire of sensual shame:
It will grovel in the earth
Wasting toward a lower birth.

There is nothing makes me tremble,
Nothing that I fear to do;
Had no spirit resemble
You would never think it true.
Tis no matter: best be gay,
Forging out a future day.

Mock you? Is your heart so broken?
Was it nothing to be blest
With that very precious token
That she loved you like the rest?
Nothing, that she gave her vow?—
No, I do not mock you now.

In a world of commonplaces,
Empty hearts and shallow brains,
Flaunting fools with painted faces,
Black desires and crimson stains—
Well enough as such things go,
That sweet grief should tempt you so.

Hope, I say, till you receive her.
Hope, for we are only men.
Put her in the grave, and leave her
Just your heart to keep till then.
So—my blessing—for I knew
Just how good she was to you!

THE WAR FOR THE UNION, 18

BAYONET CHARGE.—[See Page 439.]

"AN UNCLAIMED BODY."

UNKNOWN, unclaimed, forgotten,
In a rude, unlettered bier,
With the death-wound on his fair young brow,
In a nameless grave he sleepeth now,
Unhallowed by a tear!

* * * *

Darkly the cloud of battle
Hangs o'er the Field of Pines!
With desperate strife the rebels bear
Their leaden-driven squadrons there
Upon our slender lines.

The shadowy belts of forest
With ghastly flames are red:
Be eager and humble, plain and wood,
Lie, prone or writhing in their blood,
The dying and the dead.

Who is yon gallant stripling
Far in our battle's van,
Who combats as if Freedom's charm
Had nerved his heart and steeled his arm
Beyond the might of man?

Within the deepest woodlands
When faint the conflict grew—
His dress in deadly grapple shred,
Blood-red his brow—pale were his hands—
He fell!—and no one knew!

* * * *

Sweet are the song-birds' carols;
The flowers of June are fair;
The stream laughs gayly in the sun,
But by its margin waileth one
Who sees not these glad things.

Her slender form is drooping;
Her dark-blue eye is dim;
The sunrays nestle in her hair,
The birds and the flowers are fair—
She only thinks of him!

"Oh! that this mad rebellion
By prayers and tears could cease;
And he—my golden throne of life—
Were here, released from the strife,
To give my pour heart peace!

"I love thee, oh, my country!
I love thee from my soul!
My life I would not count a shade,
A feather, on thine altar laid,
If it could make thee whole!

"But his! oh! spare my other,
My soldier, better part!
Thou still hast myriad hero souls
To shine on Glory's martyr-rolls—
But he is all my heart!"

The summer flowers still open,
And the low birds still sing;
But alas for the weeping maiden there,
With the sunshine rippling o'er her hair,
And the prayer on her trembling lips!

Unclaimed, unknown, forgotten,
In a rude, unlettered bier,
With the death-wound on his fair young brow,
In a nameless grave he sleepeth now,
Unhallowed by a tear!

STRATEGY.

"CLARA, come sing Schubert's Serenade—it will suit this tranquil evening."

There was a group of young people on deck, the stars were all out, and the rippling waters through which we were so quietly yet so swiftly speeding would murmur the refrain for her voice was of such sweet tenderness.

Clara gathered her long, Spanish-looking cloak around her and answered not.

"Any little song, then, that suits you," I continued.

"I should choke," was her only response, in a dry, smothered tone, her eyes fixed on the dark waters.

I was quiet after that, for either my cousin was out of humor or ill, and I could not tell which. But she was not long silent. A restless nervousness pervaded all her actions; she took off her close bonnet and tossed it on the picturesque riding-hat with its graceful plumes; then that was doffed, and her fine, well-poised head—out-lined in marble purity by expressive turns—with its mass of straight, glossy hair, all drawn smoothly off her white forehead, was left uncovered to the breeze; her hands moved incessantly, now twirling over the leaves of her book, then thrown lightly by her side, as she stood caressing the black feathers of her chapeau. I ventured to ask what was the matter.

"If I could only dash down into those waves," was her strange reply.

I could have smiled at the earnestness had I not seen that she was really suffering.

"Would it not be well first to ask her pardon for thereby in some other way? We should find the river cold to-night."

"Not one cold! I am burning with heat."

"Yes, your hands are feverish—mine are cool; let me try and make yours so."

My firm hold of her restless fingers seemed to

* AN UNCLAIMED BODY.

Who has lost a friend? Some ten days ago there was left on the wharf at this place a pine coffin-case, without any direction, containing a very fine mahogany coffin, inside the corpse of a young man apparently wounded in the head. It is now interred near the Fort. Information may be had concerning it of Edwin Smith, in charge of the Wharf, or E. Wakeman, Fort Deposit, Maryland.

still their nervous activity. Gradually, too, I drew the proud young head down on my shoulder, and my quietness before long was imparted to her by some electric influence, for the long lashes fell softly, darkening the violet tinge of shadow round her beautiful eyes; the pained expression faded, leaving only a sweet sadness that touched my very heart.

"What can have befallen dear Clara!" thought I. It was years since I had seen her a merry, winning child, giving promise of rare beauty and rarer intellect. Now I was taking her to my home at her express desire; for she wished to leave her dwelling, and I was her nearest relative in the East. A long journey from her last house, under the care of a friend, had brought her to me, and we were now on our way to my country cottage. All day Clara had been rather fitful of manner, flashing out gayly at times as if determined to please, or recalling the past, asking all kinds of questions, or, proving that separation had not diminished our powers of observation. Toward evening she had hummed little snatches of song that proved to me the fine quality of her voice; but suddenly the liveliness was abandoned, and I saw that with the blossoming of the stars Clara's fine spirits and her angelic wings had both had awakened some unknown sorrow.

She did not sleep long, for bending down toward her I found her bright eyes open wide and looking at me. It is my nature to long to relieve suffering wherever I can; in a moment, then, my dog Carlo limping in from the road runs at once to me, poking his cold nose in my hand and whining, knowing well that the sympathy he invokes is sure to come. How much more does human pain and sorrow command attention!

Gently kissing the ripe red lips which trembled at my play, I bade Clara open her heart to me as she would have done to her mother. That word touched the chord which had been thrilling already with pain, burst into tears, and poured out the summer beauty of her face.

"Oh, I am so sorry that we did not leave! I should have been spared all this!"

"Sorrow shared is half removed, my darling; tell me your trouble, and I will be your mother in future."

It is a long, long story, beginning even when I was a child. Yes, even then I was the cause unwillingly of wrong, but I could not help it—I, an unconscious child. Mary?"

"I am sure not, dear."

"You know my guardian had two sons, Leo and Wilbur: having no sister I was always their playfellow, and I am sure I loved them both as my sister would have done; but they were not brothers to both so proud in different ways. Wilbur is the younger, and when we were very young I think I liked him best, but I did not know he was so chivalric, so lovingly gallant, and then, too, he was very handsome. Strangers were always struck with him, not for words speak a word that even verged away from the truth, not to spare even me from a rebuke; while Wilbur, I would often tell him sometimes, in a different coloring to little affairs to shield both of us; for we were children, and I was a child in every kind. One evening we were upset in a little skiff on the lake through Leo's fault; that is, he was anxious to get home before the storm that was rising as against too strong a breeze. We could all swim, I as well as any boy, and Leo as a man; but not Wilbur and I, resolved to say nothing about it lest Mr. Minot should not let us go alone again, and we dearly loved our liberty; but Leo at once said he would have no such proceeding—he would tell his father, and take the blame. Wilbur objected to this, saying it was very unnecessary and selfish in Leo; for we of course would have to suffer as well as he. At last they gave up—we were all equally guilty, and for days they hardly spoke to each other; for Leo felt his father, and we were obliged to see it in the calm the lake in consequence for some time. I only tell you this, Mary, to let you know the spirit that existed between the two brothers, and I, dear! I was sent to school as well as Leo and Wilbur, and we only met at vacation times, Leo saying it was very unnecessary and selfish in Leo; for we of course would have to suffer as well as he. At last they grew up—were almost men, handsome and manly, and his education had been very thorough, so that his conversations were really delightful; his conversation, for he was not a talker—never was he for that, but so intelligent and interesting; his studies in natural history, and his scientific experiments made him a very agreeable companion. Of course I, as a mere school-girl, looked up to him as a model of cognition, and Wilbur and I would sit and talk to and reason with me as a sensible being. It was a very great while before Wilbur and I were more frequent, for the house was filled with visitors; but though I love the woods and fields, I never loved them as he did—studying the habits of the birds, especially snakes; so that, if I can, I always go horseback on my excursions, and Wilbur and I, Mary, how—we were all obliged to walk: we were going to see a picturesque rock which commanded a splendid view of the lake and the hills. I, being very independent, refused any aid from Wilbur, who would have liked to have carried me—indeed, he sent my refusal; but nothing, you know, to delight a school-girl as to be able to jeer at boyish weakness. Wilbur was hurt, I believe; stared slowly up, laughing and chatting, until, as I ventured to climb a loose stone, he came with a nearly nonsensical remark, it at the same moment a horrid snake, black and venomous looking, slid from under it. Both Wilbur and Leo sprang to my assistance. I, with no thought but that of horror and danger, clung to Leo, nearly fainting in his arms. It was over in a moment, both my fright and flintiness; but as I regained my presence of mind I met Wilbur's look. So intense was its meaning that I turned to avoid it. Anger, reproach, and jealousy were very legible; and his eyes never left mine, even when Leo's face steadily burned into my very soul. Weakly foolish, I still shook by fear—I still with Leo and Wilbur, and at last Wilbur bounded off, and we saw him no more that day. Since then, in the last four years, I have been strangely in the power of Wilbur Minot. I can not explain to you, I fear, how strange has been his influence. Over and over again I have refused his love; over and over again shrunk from him with inexpressible repugnance. His character has developed in its way as Leo's has in a different one. Leo is still the same truthful, honest, earnest soul, and oh! so generous, so self-denying. But Wilbur is exacting and selfish; he has sworn, Mary, that I should love him, and one moment he would almost win me by his extravagant tenderness, although I have feared that; the next he would be so fierce, so wild, that every vein of my being swelled in proud antagonism.

"Leo left home to study law and Wilbur to enter, or enter the regular service, for which he was well qualified by his military education in Europe, for he was sent to Germany to school, re[illegible] for the present, he had other views for his son, and said that less brain and more muscle would serve our country quite as well. Wilbur accepted entirely for the South; and, my dear cousin, you can hardly have an idea how bitter has been my anguish in that part of the country caused by difference of opinion in families. Leo would not argue; he said enough to incriminate both, but more than that he would be do so. But Wilbur, in his fiery impetuosity, often sought to draw him into discussion. Once, after striving to prove to Leo the right of wrong, Wilbur came to me, declaring his brother was too cowardly to defend his principles. At that unfairness I was aroused, and said, with eagerness, that Leo was no coward. A new burst of jealous passion followed my words; and while I in vain tried to calm the tempest Leo came toward us. A new phase of our unhappy trouble began. Wilbur turned at once and told Leo I was dying of love for him; that his own happiness was at stake, and all (in my dear father's brotherly kindness. I felt my cheeks burn with blushes. I trembled with anger and wounded feeling. Leo never went out of the house, and a torrent of tears came to my relief. Still Leo stood watching me calmly; surprised and cool, he seemed to be utterly selfish as his brother. Too proud, too hurt to explain, with great effort I subdued my rage and insult. To my utter bewilderment Leo would not let me; gently but forcibly he detained me, and I saw in his face a look of scorn as he drew my wide windows. Even the lace curtains seemed thick and heavy, while the scent of sweet flowers from the garden was almost noxious. All the room was densely silent; the brownes seemed like dark spirits watching us. Every little sound fell on my ear with unnatural and terrible distinctness, as if the hour of destiny, of fate were weighing on me.

"'Stay, Clara; I know now, Lee is right.'

"'What do you know and see, Leo?' I said, in reply—'only a weak, ridiculous girl.'

"'No, dear child,' he said, in the saddest tenderness, 'and not a coward—not a child.'

"'I saw, I suppose, a lover's quarrel. Wilbur must not be jealous of me. I shall go and leave you to him. As for me, I am so unselfish as not to tell you, darling, how hard it is for me, how long I have been watching the tiny girl, whose little dead limbs have often rested in my arms, till now, no longer a pretty plaything, but a beautiful, trustful, thoughtful woman.'

"I must repeat his words just as he spoke them, Mary.

"He went on—

"'It is very sad, but not strange, Clara, darling, that we should both have loved you, both Wilbur and I. Two boys, with all its clumsiness and changes, he murmured thoughtfully; then, with almost Wilbur's passion, he clasped me in his arms, called me a good girl, kissed my cut nosses, and bade me a long good-by. It was over so quickly, he spoke so hopefully, and I was sure Wilbur's entirely, that I hardly could persuade myself that it had all happened. I staid alone in the parlor nearly unconscious, my mind all unstrung, but finally I think, to look in my own heart and find its bitterness full to overflowing. Strangely to call Leo back and tell him I loved him and not Wilbur, then remembering how terrible a brother's quarrel would be I decided not. Oh dear! if I could have died at that moment, I thought, it would have been better for all; just one cut would gain rest and suffering in life by wishing for death. I went to my room and staid there: a headache indeed kept me in it for several days; meanwhile word was brought me that Leo had enlisted and was already gone to the war. It was impossible for me to call Leo back and tell him I loved him and not Wilbur, then remembering how terrible a brother's quarrel would be I decided not. Oh dear! if I could have died at that moment, I thought, it would have been better for all; just one cut would gain rest and suffering in life by wishing for death. I went to my room and staid there: a headache indeed kept me in it for several days; meanwhile word was brought me that Leo had enlisted and was already gone to the war. It was impossible for me to call Leo back. I was the cause of Mr. Minot's grief at Leo's going—the innocent, and Wilbur the guilty cause; oh, dear cousin, I have to have you take me away—I could not live in so much unhappiness. To-day, before we started, a letter came from Wilbur, telling me that if I do not at once decide his fate for him he will enter the rebel service; then, indeed, his influence may be great. What shall I, what can I do?'

I kissed the fair temples throbbing with excitement, and told Clara she must be true to herself and trust the consequence with God—that she must ask for a moment's reflection before she left my room—my best little nook, all pink lined and inviting. I was sure my dear child had cast on her sorrow, for I could see the way clearer than she could; my faith is strong, and I believe in right prevailing. I was sure she had suffered enough through that dreadful Wilbur Minot, and my resolve was taken, if I can do any thing she shall suffer no more.

Early after breakfast next morning Clara came to my room looking very sad, but very firm. Her cheeks had lost their delicate color, and her forehead was contracted and whiter than ever for the resolve that sat on them. She had in her hand an open letter, which she gave me to read.

[To be continued. And, finding promise in Wilbur Minot that she would become his wife.]

"But, Clara," I remonstrated, "you do not love him."

My young cousin came swiftly toward me, and placed her hand playfully over my lips.

"Hush, dear; forget all that. I have thought all night long, and this is the result. Do not try to shake me."

"The next day—oh, wickedness of duplicity!—letters went—one to Mr. Wilbur Minot, one to Mr., Captain, or Colonel (I hardly know which) Leo Minot. Again we walked, and talked more; but Clara, darling! was still calm and firm in the dreadful struggle. She had sacrifices her decision but cost her. It was lovely weather until the second week after our arrival. Then the storm came in torrents, and I had to stop gardening. Clara, too, and found the little rose-leaf room a safe retreat. Pale and weak, she lay tranquilly among the pillows. "Only tired," she said. I know she would not have it otherwise.

"I am uneasy, sweety,

Oh would that I were dead!"

In the middle of the weeping rain came news of battle, and I, with hasty eagerness, ran up with my packet of papers to Clara's room. We both devoured them, for the battle was fought a stone's back on her pillow quite unconscious. Among the wounded—some mortally—was Leo Minot's name!

It was one thing before Mary's eyes, and another touched the pink of pale cheeks and lips. Still all was silent from Wilbur.

A strange way of looking at me Clara fell into, a questioning, singular way, especially when I was in any gayety. I, with grateful appreciation of her ease, pretended to be unconscious. Still, as letters came, again and again, which brought a strange flush of health, equal to my summer roses, and a flood of tear-drops bright as the dew on the roses, and which fell on my hands, burning as fire, what was I left to imagine?

I was tranquilly sauntering my hair before my toilet-glass one afternoon, and Clara, whose affairs we never mentioned now, was reading aloud to me out of that dreadful old (?) book of Miss Bidwell's, whose maiden, rural life is my model, when my maid came up and laid a card on my table. I glanced at it, and told Clara to see the name. As she did so, with quick, flushing surprise, she spied it in my hand—every thing-ridden before me another name, equally familiar if not as pleasant. She paused in extreme astonishment.

"Why, Cousin Mary?"

"Well, child?"

"Here is my letter to Wilbur, which you have never seen!"

"I sent a letter to Wilbur."

"But not to me."

"No; and I sent one to Leo; and if he is down shirty why do you not fly to meet him, poor wounded sister dear to nurse?"

"Oh! oh! oh! Cousin Mary! how could you be so deceitful?"

"I was strategic, child. Go down, I tell you, and see Leo."

My plan succeeded.

I was bridemaid, groomsman, matron of honor standing feast, and grave-stay of the bride, all in one.

As for Wilbur—poor Wilbur!—he is in the rebel army, as I was quite sure he would be.

WOUNDED.

"SIX hundred and forty-three wounded!"

"If that were all!" My wife spoke in a sad voice. "If that were all!"

The words, as given so complete," I said, referring again to the newspaper which I held in my hand, "are hundreds killed, and wounded, and six hundred and forty-three wounded."

"A fearful list, but it is not all," my wife answered. "Six hundred and forty-three are a blank."

"A great many more were wounded—a great many more."

"But this is an official report issued by the commanding general."

"Let us take the matter home. We have a son in the army. The ball that strikes him strikes us. If in that list of killed and wounded we had found his name, would there have been no keenest point or shattering bullet in our flesh? I shiver at the thought. Oh! the terrible, invisible messengers of pain and death wound often deeper than iron and lead!"

As she thus spoke my eyes were resting on the official list, and I saw the name of a friend. An ejaculation of surprise dropped from my lips.

"What?" My startled wife grew slightly pale.

"Harley is wounded!"

"Oh dear!" The pallor increased, and she laid her hand over her heart—a sign that she felt pain most keenly. She tried to steady her voice, then, half through his chest. Not set down as dangerous, however."

"Poor Anna! What sad tidings for her!" My wife arose. "I must go to her immediately."

"Do so," I assented.

Soon afterward we went out together. I to my office, and she to visit the family of the wounded officer.

It is strange how little the death and disaster of battle affect the active world. Men are so much engaged in the real of the struggle, and wounded, even to the regret of the soldier, almost as if the statistics were figures of nobility, almost as if the statistics were simply commercial. We talk of many persons very differently if they were crates and bales. I do not except myself. Sometimes I feel as though all sensibility, all sympathy for human suffering, had died out of my heart. It is, perhaps, as well, but I perceived to the full extent the terrible reality of things, we could be in half-paralyzed state, instead of continuing our useful employments by which the common good is served. We can not help the suffering nor heal the wounded by our mental pain. But let us see to it that through lack of pain we fail not in sensibility to the cry out of our ability.

When I met my wife at dinner-time her face was paler than when I parted with her in the morning. I saw that she had been suffering, while I, intent on my own urgent affairs, had half forgotten the unwounded friends—Harley and his wife; one pierced by a missile, and the other by an invisible bullet.

"Did you see Anna?" I asked.

"Yes."

"How is she?"

"Calm, but hurt very deeply. She only had to seen this morning."

"Is she good to him?"

"There has not been time to decide what is best. Her husband's wounds are here, and will get as much information by telegraph to-day as it is possible to receive. To-night or to-morrow he will be here for the last official. Anna may go with him."

"She appeared to be hurt deeply, you say?"

"Yes," replied my wife; "and was in much intense pain. Every line in her face exhibited suffering. One hand was pressed all the while tightly to over her heart."

"What did she say?"

"She said, as she seemed looking into the distance and trying to make out things seen but imperfectly. If he were to die I think it would kill her."

"Two deaths by the same bullet," I said, my thought recurring to our morning conversation.

In the evening I called with my wife to see Mrs. Harley. A telegram had been received stating that her husband's wound, though severe, was not considered dangerous. The ball had been extracted, and he was reported to be doing well. He was to be going to leave in the night train with her brother-in-law, and would be with her husband in the quickest time it was possible for him to travel. How a few hours of suffering had changed her! Her mood was deep and very painful.

I was musing on how these Harley was so sentimentally reserved to be removed from the hospital. His wife had been permitted to go to him at once, and to remain in attendance on him for a greater part of the time.

"Did you know that Mr. Harley and his wife were at home?" said I, on coming in one day.

"No. When did they arrive?" was the answer and inquiry.

"This morning. I heard it from Harley's brother."

"How are they?" asked my wife.

"He looks as well as ever, I am told, though still suffering some from his wound; but she is miserable, Mr. Harley says."

A shadow fell over my wife's face, and she sighed heavily. "I was afraid of that," she said. "I knew she was suffering. Such deep sympathies are rarely, but spirit wounds are difficult to heal. These invisible bullets are almost sure to reach some vital part."

I met Mr. Harley not long afterward in company with his wife. He was very much worn by the war, his cheeks flushed with health. You saw merely a sign of what he had endured. He talked in a brave, soldierly manner, and was severe for the time to come when the surgeon would pronounce him in a condition to join his regiment. His wound, when referred to, evidently gave him more pleasure than pain. It was a mark of distinction—a sign that he had offered seven life for his country.

How different with Mrs. Harley! It was hard for you to look into her dreamy, absent eyes, on her pallid lips and exhausted countenance.

"She has worn herself out in nursing me," said her husband, in answer to a remark on her appearance. He looked at her tenderly, and with just a shade of anxiety in his face. Was she not in pain to him? Did he not know that she had been wounded also? That two balls left their mark when it was struck, one of them reaching to his distant home?

In three weeks I hope to be in the field again, and face to face with the enemy." He spoke with the air of a strong soldier, his bright, pale face in a glow—wounding, and the pain of wounding all forgotten. But another's eyes became dim as his brightened—another's cheeks paled as his grew warm. I saw the tears shining as Mrs. Harley answered, in an unsteady voice,

"I am neither brave enough nor strong enough for a soldier's wife."

She had meant to say more, as was plain from her manner, but could not trust herself.

"Oh, yes you are, brave enough and strong enough," replied Mr. Harley, with animation, in female company, he institutes that sort of preliminary examination without which none of the common bargains of everyday life are concluded, and ventures to put a possible wife through her paces. He has, of course, his own tastes, his own views of married bliss. He is on the look-out for sympathy, whether in a love of Tennyson's poetry or of butter-pudding. How can he ascertain whether he has found the article he wants except by drawing his fair companion into some sequestered corner of the salon, out of the range of the sleepless dowager eye, and testing her capacities and aptitudes—whether she be sentimental or cullinary? Is she inspired by the Muses or Francatelli? For this reasonable precaution he pays dearly in reputation. Mrs. Grundy, for instance, that of a young lady is often much harder. She is liable to be brauded as a flirt if she dances twice at a ball with the same partner, although that partner may be the only man she knows in the room, or the only youngster with whom she can perform without resentment to her shirts. She is a flirt, in the eyes of her fair friends at least, if her tastes naturally lead her to the companionship of men, if she is fond of hunting or cycling, if she includes in her vocabulary a single expression more than her own brother, if she be lavish in the distribution of her carte de visite. She is a flirt in the eyes of every mother in Mrs. Grundy's set if she goes down to dinner on the arm of any young man of good fortune. She is a flirt if she be pretty, gushing, or brilliant. In short, among the subalterns into an inanimate lump of insipidity and conventionalism, she will be pronounced unworthy the middle passage in the quarter or other by a jury of British matrons.

But though the term is often loosely and indiscriminately applied, it has a definite meaning. We flirt when we consciously convey to the mind of a person of the opposite sex an assurance that he or her society is peculiarly agreeable to us. This is done in a variety of ways. A look, a word, a gesture, is enough to carry the flattering conviction to the breast of our companion. It needs no master to decipher the characters inscribed on the girl's brow. One who dances may read—"I think you charming, and I like this conversation immensely!" The manner by which a flirtation is conducted are multiform, and it is in the selection of the means adopted that the art consists. Flirting operations are usually carried on under a cloud of small-talk. The art consists in infusing into that a tone of deep battery and covert insinuation. To ask a fair Belgravian whether she has been to the opera on the International Exhibition organs an innocence worthy of Adam before the Fall; but to supplement such a commonplace by Lucrezia or Lucia is to know her favorite pictures or opera, proves that you have at least some rudimentary idea of the art of love. Flirting is essentially an artificial and exotic accomplishment. It implies an advanced stage of civilization. It is the art of the conservatories that it evolves a considerable refinement of manners. It derives its chief illustrations from the accessories and embellishments of social life. Pictures, music, books, theatres—these are the food on which flirtations are nourished. In a wet day for instance, when books and pretty nothings would soon languish and die, there is no flirting, properly so called. Flirtation is the lover's art in a vanishing point in the social scale beyond which the phenomenon disappears. "Will you have a cup?" is by no means an analogous institution—it means much more, or much less. There is nothing in the ordinary tone of Polly Jones to the life-guardsman which savors of flirtation. Her admiration is far too evident and open-mouthed. The element of reserve and restraint is wholly wanting. She has no buffer, in the shape of chit-chat conversation, to interpose between her admiration to a red coat and the order of her military admirer. She has none of the machinery of the flirt at her command. Distance. The struggle for existence to which Corydon is exposed, and the constant toil of his life, leave no time for flirting with Phyllis. He can sheep's-eyes on her, and some day or other "gets married;" but the elaborate process of preliminary processes with which we are familiar in drawing-room life. There is another point to notice. So far as unmarried ladies are concerned, flirting is almost a national characteristic. It is not for the boy or the girl alone that the phrase of the tender passion with which we have enriched the French language. We do not mean that all English maidens have a tendency to flirt, but that out of England the conditions of girlhood are so different, and the restraint so multiplied, that flirting is no opportunity for flirtation. In France a woman can not flirt until after marriage. The liberty which the youthful female subject of Queen Victoria enjoys has its evil as well as its good.

There are many ways of flirting with effect. The two principal are the flirt intellectual and the flirt sentimental. The first is a rarer, and decidedly a higher species of the family. In so far as the subject-matter over which she flirts is superior to that which is the staple of her feebler sister, she must always be considered superior to the latter. Science, literature, and agreeable conversation afford a much greater scope for flirting than mere scandal and watery sentiment. Miss Minerva certainly devotes herself too much to the young gentleman as the proper object which deserves to be courted. It is a pity, perhaps, that she talks quite as large a part of the time as the young subaltern or traveler, but it is the thirst for information which keeps her at his side. When she makes a dash at the Syntax portion of the day, it is to enjoy his bon mots, and afterward record them in her diary. Her interest in photography is something more than a pretext for open-air flirtation. If she dabbles in botany or geology, it is not a mere lure for botanical or geological eldest sons. Even if it were, such means would, to some extent, justify the end, for, as an Endish rôle is superior to a broomstick, so hammer, lenses, and chemicals are worthier weapons for the conquest of a husband than languishing looks and idle words. There is no similarity in seeming feature about the flirt sentimental. She is altogether a poor creature. Her only idea of business is to trade in a weak manner upon her own feelings. She is full of secrets and trivial confidences. She is always submitting small metaphysical problems to the consideration of her male acquaintance. She has a perennial supply of pretty cases of conscience to lay before her mustached confessors. Will Captain Jones tell her whether she is very wrong to prefer her friend to her relatives, Gregorian chants to Anglican, a Hansom cab to a Manchester? Will Captain Jones tell her what is better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all? Can he explain why she is never merry when she is most full of mirth? All which queries the gallant captain is as competent to answer as to write a treatise on the origin of evil or the topography of the moon. A married flirt of this type may safely go further, and pass herself off as a helpless lady, when in fact her whole world is direct, in which she is ever yearning for sympathy. Fixing her unconscious victim in the corner, she sharkly hints that her home is not happy, that she is not appreciated, that she has been the victim of various foul practices, conspiracy, and persecution for all this is a train of youthful odorets. If the truth were known, her wrongs would probably turn out to have been mercenary; but simply because, much as she craves for sympathy, she would more for a splendid establishment.

We have only one other species to particularize in the flirtatious genealogy, a species in the main we have watched the relations which exist between the bachelor curate and his flock without becoming conscious of their existence. The celibacy of the clergy depends, we fear, even in Protestant England, a good part of the organization of the parish. That female enthusiasm which finds its expression in the votive slipper languishes and dies in presence of the curate whose wife is a full. With the failure of the slipper-crop comes the collapse of the district-visitorships, a drooping in the efforts of Scripture-readers, a painful indifference to district visiting. Those errands of charity which somehow or another used generally to fall to the Rev. Cyrils doer are discontinued. No more delicacies are sent in his early for the purpose of reclaiming Bibby Brown from the snare of the Baxters. No more blending of soprano voices with his cathedral tones at the Choral Festival. Not that the minor luminary of the parochial system monopolizes the attention of the serious flirt. If the rector be a pet preacher he must be left in undisturbed possession of the school-inspector, at his annual visit, who quite unconsciously becomes a domestic effect. What a pretty timidity she manifests at his presence, and how multiferious the points on which she wants his advice! What a delightful perplexation when the dear creature takes up the needlework, and runs on in something ornate about the button-holes! But the greatest prize of all is a real live missionary. If he is black, so much the better. The lungs of the tales of monster flirtations like another Desdemona. She is never tired of hearing him relate his early adventures in the King of Dahomey. In short, she is, within certain limits, very catholic in her flirting propensities. She does not struggle for the unique interest which she finds a man who may be fairly considered to be doing good in his generation.

Space does not permit us to dwell on all the subordinate varieties of our subject, else we might notice the value of the flirtation spoiled by what are called female accomplishments, and point out how far, and under what circumstances, they exercise their exponent flirt. Or we might attempt a classification according to temper and manners, and contrast the boisterous flirt with the more delicate flirt with the "sly paws." We have a few words to say, in conclusion, desirable to the whole family. It is from no wish to spoil the sport of any of our fair friends, proceeding just now so merrily in the enclave of the needle-book that we venture to remark that all flirting on the part of a woman involves, in greater or less, the principle of self-respect, and the admission of weakness—an invitation to a man to say what he pleases with impunity. The flirt quits, as it were, her intrenchments to get the benefit of adventure. Thrown among the kindly and chivalrous, she fares well enough. But adventures, as they are not universal, and woe to her if she some day fall in with a partner "flown with insolence and wine." Or even a partner who entertains ideas of a jealous wife. It is as well to remember that the Rubicon which divides the aggressive flirting from the indirection, if it be deep, is also narrow. But, worse than a fault, flirting is in nine cases out of ten, a bore to the unfortunate male concerned, a blunder. In the tenth, it is successful only because the flirt is clever enough to be guilty of this were as very sure, that no woman should venture to flirt unless possessed of considerable strength of character or force of conscience. Giddy heights require steady heads. When Opie was asked by a Bryanston Square lady how he got his art, he replied, gruffly, "With brains, Sir." Young ladies should abstain from flirting unless they use the same recipe. It is, as a social point of view, the first is much more pleasant than the grade. There is no greater infliction than to have to the last agreeable to a woman than perpetually standing on the defensive—who, when you sit down to talk, increases the distance between your chair and her own, and who looks as if she expected every moment that you were about to lay down on the floor and roll. Well might you attempt a few amiable passages with a hedgehog. The man at least has the consolation of your toes, the more she seems to bristle with precaution. Your sprightly nonsense is received with evident suspicion, your innocent sallies with uneasiness. You begin to think, from the half-frightened expression of your companion's face, that your looks must be flustered, your language intemperate, and that you have more of the Lothario in your outer man than you were ever aware of. Either you are annoyed, or tempted to amuse yourself by shocking in good earnest such a nervous temperament. Then, and not before, you mentally acknowledge the debit of gratitude which society owes to the flirt.

FLIRTS.

WHEN Bachler Kings and Celebrated Friendships have found a chronicler, we wonder it has not occurred to some one to write a book on what we may bee theme Illustrious and Historical Flirtations. We are reminded of this by a conversation we have had-ced on the subject. There is a whole host of eminent flirts about whom a great deal might be said. Cleopatra, for instance, was a flirt, and between Queen Elizabeth and half her young courtiers, and Lord Castlereagh and the Grand Duchess Pauline would afford materials for an interesting chapter. Then there is Dr. Johnson and the fair Thrale; Byron and Wapolia and Lady Jersey; Goldsmith and "good Lady Hastingdon;" Fanny Burney and her "dear Daddy;" love passages in which the parties were all evolved out of her own internal consciousness. If another royal flirt were wanted there would be Sarah Antoinette and Count Fersen, and the romantic story of the third George and Lady Sarah Lennox. Madame Mauflower and Madame Recamier would afford materials for an interesting chapter. Then there is Dr. Johnson and the fair Thrale; Byron and Wapolia and Lady Jersey; Goldsmith and "good Lady Hastingdon;" Fanny Burney and her "dear Daddy;" love passages in which the parties were all evolved out of her own internal consciousness. If another royal flirt were wanted there would be Sarah Antoinette and Count Fersen, and the romantic story of the third George and Lady Sarah Lennox would be inserted. The chronic flirtation between Madame Recamier and Madame Decamier, and the meteoric one between Madame de Stael and Sir Francis Mauflower would afford delightful romantic subjects for the pen, and might bring the volume to a brilliant close.

It is a pity of the great and wise have been addicted to flirtation, we are justified in inquiring in the face of the fact of flirting being so much more common than to be told that a certain lady or gentleman of our acquaintance is a terrible flirt. A vague prejudice against that person is thereupon generated in our well-regulated mind. We should be puzzled to say why, for the charge is often idly hazarded and very imperfectly understood. When alleged of the male sex, it is assumed to mean something volatile, selfish, and semi-sentimental. And yet it is often unfairly imputed to a man whose intentions are, in a matrimonial sense, perfectly honorable. He is called a flirt merely because,

MAJOR-GENERAL BUTLER.

GENERAL BUTLER'S magnificent success at New Orleans justifies us in reproducing his Portrait, and we give it accordingly.

Mr. Butler was born at Deerfield, Rockingham County, New Hampshire, in 1818, and is consequently forty-three years old. One of his ancestors was a Cilley—one of the truest Revolutionary stock in New England—and the subject of this biography was related to the latter named Jonathan Cilley, who was killed in the duel with Graves of Kentucky. Mr. Butler received his collegiate education at Waterville, Maine, where the Baptist denomination have a flourishing literary institution. He studied law, and took up his residence at Lowell, Massachusetts, where he soon distinguished himself as an advocate in the courts of Middlesex County. His reputation was soon extended to Boston, and he has long held a prominent position in the Massachusetts bar, whether in the courts of the State or of the General Government. As an advocate he is distinguished by the energy with which he devotes himself to his client, and by the strong, playful, and sometimes vehement language hurled against opposing counsel.

He has always been a prominent politician of the extreme wing of the Democracy, and has been in a number of political positions in his adopted State. He was a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives for the first time in 1853, was a member of the Constitutional Convention the same year, and was Senator for Middlesex in 1859-'60. In May, 1860, he was senatorial delegate to the Democratic Convention in Charleston, and afterward at Baltimore. He sided with the Breckinridge faction, and upon his return home was nominated by that portion the Democratic party candidate for Governor. He was one of the first to respond to the proclamation of President Lincoln calling for volunteers; and his subsequent services have made him, as a patriotic and as an energetic officer, dear to the loyal people of the United States.

The correspondent of the Herald thus described the performance of General Butler at the outbreak of the war:

General Butler, with a single Massachusetts regiment, the Eighth, marched from his own State, through an alien State, and the city of Baltimore, reached at least a steamer, and landed his whole force then considered the enemy's soil, and took possession of Annapolis and held it.

The War Department, appreciating this bold movement, immediately created the new Department of Annapolis, which extended to within seven miles of the Federal capital, and also on the east included Baltimore city, and made General Butler commander of the same. He proceeded to reconstruct locomotives, build bridges, and make railroads. He pushes on toward Baltimore, fortifies himself at the Relay House with the 69th Massachusetts and Eighth New York regiments and Cooke Horse Battery, controlling the great channel of communication between the rebels at Harper's Ferry and there in Baltimore. He sends out his scouts, seizes the famous steam-gun and hems it up on the road, and with the same Massachusetts regiment and the whole of Baltimore stared three weeks previous, accompanied by Cook's Boston Battery and the New York Eighth, he marches into Baltimore, fortifies himself upon the highest point of land overlooking the whole city, issues his proclamation giving protection to all loyalists, and summoning his militiamen to all traitors, seizes arms, arrests traitors, and marches through the streets escorted by the single company of the gallant Massachusetts Sixth, which received the utmost treatment from the mob three weeks before. He does all this before the Pennsylvania troops that were at Cockeysville, within fifteen miles of Baltimore, three weeks ago reach the city or afford him any support. This is history; and truly General Butler has made a brilliant campaign.

General Butler was afterward appointed to the command at Fortress Monroe. It was while he was there that the unfortunate affair at Great Bethel took place, and he was soon afterward superseded by General Wool. He then received the command of the expedition against New Orleans. The fighting was done by the time he got there; but his civil administration has been worthy of all praise.

We wish to place on record a charming illustration of his style of managing an impertinent consul:

The Acting British Consul had written to protest against his treatment of some British subjects. General Butler replies:

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
NEW ORLEANS, May 21, 1862.

SIR,—I have your communication of May 8. With its remains of fact I have nothing to do. A plain statement of the matter is this: A number of residents of this city, who have enjoyed the protection and advantages of the United States Government in their large trade and property for many years (some of them more than a decade), and now claiming to have been born subjects of Her Britannic Majesty Queen Victoria, regulated themselves into a voluntary body, known as the "British Guard," armed, uniformed, and equipped, patrolled the streets till the fleet of the United States had left the city with its guns. This body then, after a consultation in presence of its captain and at least one other officer, at eleven o'clock at night, deliberately voted in an organized meeting to retain the arms and uniforms of the company in the army of the rebel General Beauregard, which vote was carried into effect by sending to the rebels substantially all the arms, uniforms, and equipments in their armory. This organization was concealed from me for some days, but when its existence became known, and he acknowledged its facts tearlessly as above stated. In this flagrant breach of the laws of nations, of the United States, your ground proclamation, and the laws of Great Britain, I ordered him to order his company to leave the city within twenty-four hours. To this I have added, saying, among other things, that he would be punishing the innocent with the guilty, as there were some members absent at the time of the vote; that each soldier of the Guard owned his arms and uniform as private property, and it would be hard to compel those to leave the city who did not retained their arms and uniforms, and all others, including those of all rights of hostility and hostile acts, to leave the city within twenty-four hours. I should have been arrested and sent to Fort Jackson as dangerous and inimical persons. These people thought it of consequence that Beauregard should have sixty more soldiers and rifles. I thought it of the same consequence that he should have sixty more of these Britisher men, who may fill them if they choose. I intended this order to be strictly enforced. I am content for the present to let he open enemies to remain in the city of their choice, and to their flag and tendencies when enemy's soil.

* * * * * * *

Then for you will do me the honor to observe that I have treated your communication as if it emanated from the duly authorized Consul of her Majesty's Government at this port. The respect I feel for that Government leads me to err, if at all, upon the side of recognition of all its claims, and those of its officers; but I take leave to call your attention to the fact that you subscribed yourself "Her Britannic Majesty's Acting Consul," and that I have received no official information of my right when you may have so to act, except you refer alone; and I cannot permit you to err in saying that your action in behalf of which here complain of has not been sanctioned by me. I cannot refer to indorse the belief or any part that you rightfully represent that noble Government. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major-General Commanding.

TO GEN. C. CORNELL, acting as private secretary.

Appeals of the threats which have been so freely uttered in the Southern newspapers and elsewhere to assassinate the General, the Herald correspondent says, in a late letter:

He rides about among the people as freely as if he was their peculiar favorite. On Sunday afternoon he started with his staff, after five o'clock, and rode to Carrollton, a distance of eight miles. They did not leave there to return until after seven o'clock, arriving at the 56, Charles a little before nine. A large part of the road is through a piece of woods, where a skulking foe might have fired upon the party from ambush. The General says, in reference to the possibility of assassination, with which he is constantly threatened through anonymous letters, "if they do it, it will only place General Phelps in command: and if they are satisfied with that arrangement I have nothing to say."

CHAPTER III.

"Miss Garth, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount, opening the parlor door and announcing the visitor's appearance with the tone and manner of a well-bred servant.

Magdalen found herself in a long, narrow room, consisting of a back parlor and a front parlor, which had been thrown into one by opening the folding-doors between them. Seated not far from the front window, with his back to the light, she saw a frail, flaxen-haired, self-satisfied little man, clothed in a fair white dressing-gown, many sizes too large for him, with a nosegay of violets drawn neatly through the button-hole over his breast. He looked from forty to five-and-thirty years old. His complexion was as delicate as a young girl's, his eyes were of the lightest blue, his upper lip was adorned by a weak little white mustache, waxed and twisted at either end into a thin spiral curl. When any object specially attracted his attention he half closed his eyelids to look at it. When he smiled, the skin at his temples crumpled itself up into a nest of wicked little wrinkles. He had a plate of strawberries on his lap, with a napkin under them to preserve the purity of his white dressing-gown. At his right hand stood a large round table, covered with a collection of foreign curiosities, which seemed to have been brought together from the four quarters of the globe. Stuffed birds from Africa, porcelain monsters from China, silver ornaments and utensils from India and Peru, mosaic work from Italy, and bronzes from France, were all heaped together, pell-mell, with the coarse deal boxes and dingy leather cases which served to pack them for traveling. The little man apologized, with a cheerful and simpering conceit, for his litter of curiosities, his dressing-gown, and his delicate health; and waving his hand toward a chair, placed his attention, with pragmatical politeness, at the visitor's disposal. Magdalen looked at him with a momentary doubt whether Mrs. Lecount had not deceived her. Was this the man who mercilessly followed the path on which his merciless father had walked before him? She could hardly believe it.

"Take a seat, Miss Garth," he repeated. Observing her hesitation, and announcing his own name, in a high, thin, fretfully-conventional voice: "I am Mr. Noel Vanstone. You wished to see me—here I am!"

"May I be permitted to retire, Sir?" inquired Mrs. Lecount.

"Certainly not!" replied her master. "Stay here, Lecount, and keep us company. Mrs. Lecount has my fullest confidence," he continued, addressing Magdalen. "Whatever you say to me, ma'am, you say to her. She is a domestic treasure. There is not another house in England has such a treasure as Mrs. Lecount."

The housekeeper listened to the praise of her domestic virtues with eyes immovably fixed on her elegant chemisette. But Magdalen's quick penetration had previously detected a look that passed between Mrs. Lecount and her master, which suggested that Mr. Noel Vanstone had been instructed beforehand what to say and to do in his visitor's presence. The suspicion of this—and the obstacles which the room presented to arranging her position in it so as to keep her face from the light—warned Magdalen to be on her guard.

She had taken her chair at first nearly midway in the room. An instant's after-reflection induced her to move her seat toward the left hand, so as to place herself just inside, and close against, the left post of the folding-door. In this position she dextrously barred the only passage by which Mrs. Lecount could have skirted round the large table and contrived to front Magdalen by taking a chair at her master's side. On the right hand of the table the empty space was well occupied by the fire-place and fender, by some traveling trunks, and a large packing-case. There was no alternative left for Mrs. Lecount but to place herself on a line with Magdalen, against the opposite post of the folding-door, or to push rudely past the visitor, with the obvious intention of getting in front of her. With an expression little enough, and with one steadily look at her master, the housekeeper conceded the point, and took her seat against the right-hand door-post. "Wait a little," thought Mrs. Lecount: "my turn next!"

"Mind what you are about, ma'am!" cried Mr. Noel Vanstone, as Magdalen accidentally approached the table in moving her chair. "Mind the decree of your clock! Excuse me, you nearly knocked down that silver candlestick. Pray don't suppose it's a common candlestick. It's nothing of the sort—it's a Peruvian candlestick. There are only three of that pattern in the world. One is in the possession of the President of Peru; one is locked up in the Vatican; and one is on my table. It cost ten pounds; it's worth fifty. One of my father's bargains, ma'am. All these things are my father's bargains. There is not another house in England which has such curiosities as these. Sit down, Lecount; I beg you will make yourself comfortable. Mrs. Lecount is like the curiosities, Miss Garth—she is one of my father's bargains. You are one of my father's bargains, are you, Lecount? My father was a remarkable man, ma'am. You will be reminded of him here at every turn. I have got his dressing-gown on at this moment. No such linen as this is made now; you can't get it for love or money. Would you like to feel the texture? Perhaps you're no judge of texture? Perhaps you would prefer talking to me about these two pupils of yours? They are two, are they not? Are they fine girls? Plump, fresh, full-blown English beauties?"

"Excuse me, Sir," interposed Mrs. Lecount, sorrowfully. "I must really beg permission to retire if you are going to talk in that way. I can't sit by, Sir, and hear them turned into ridicule. Consider their position; consider Miss Garth."

"You good creature!" said Mr. Noel Vanstone, surveying the housekeeper through his half-closed eyelids. "You excellent Lecount! I assure you, ma'am, Mrs. Lecount is a worthy creature. You will observe that she pities the two girls. I don't go so far as that myself, but I can make allowances for them. I am a large-minded man. I can make allowances for them and for you." He smiled with the most cordial politeness, and helped himself to a strawberry from the plate on his lap.

"You shock Miss Garth; indeed, Sir, without meaning it, you shock Miss Garth," remonstrated Mrs. Lecount. "She is not accustomed to you as I am. Consider Miss Garth, Sir. As a favor to me, consider Miss Garth."

Thus far Magdalen had resolutely kept silence. The burning anger which would have betrayed her in an instant if she had let it flush its way to the surface throbbed fast and fiercely at her heart, and warned her, while Noel Vanstone was speaking, to close her lips. She would have allowed him to talk on uninterruptedly for some minutes more if Mrs. Lecount had not interfered for the second time. The refined insolence of the housekeeper's pity was a woman's instigator, and it stung her into instantly controlling herself. She had never mores admirably imitated Miss Garth's voice and manner than when she spoke her next words.

"You are very good," she said to Mrs. Lecount, "I make no claim to be treated with any extraordinary consideration. I am a governess, and I don't expect it. I have only one favor to ask. I beg Mr. Noel Vanstone, for his own sake, to hear what I have to say to him."

"You understand, Sir," observed Mrs. Lecount. "It appears that Miss Garth has some serious warning to give you. She says you are to hear her for your own sake."

Mr. Noel Vanstone's fair complexion suddenly turned white. He put away the plate of strawberries among his father's bargains. His hand shook, and his little figure trembled irritably in the chair. Magdalen observed him attentively. "One discovery already," she thought; "he is a coward!"

"What do you mean, ma'am?" asked Mr. Noel Vanstone, with visible trepidation of look and manner. "What do you mean by telling me I must listen to you for my own sake? If you come here to intimidate me, you come to the wrong man. My strength of character was universally noticed in our circle at Zurich—wasn't it, Lecount?"

"Universally, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount. "But let us hear Miss Garth. Perhaps I have misinterpreted her meaning?"

"On the contrary," replied Magdalen, "you have exactly expressed my meaning. My object in coming here is to warn Mr. Noel Vanstone against the course which he is now taking."

"Don't!" pleaded Mrs. Lecount. "Oh, if you want to help these poor girls, don't talk in that way! Excuse me, my excellent friend, ma'am, by extremities; don't strengthen it by threats!" She a little overcolored the tone of humility in which she spoke those words—a little overacted the look of apprehension which accompanied them. If Magdalen had not been plainly enough already that it was Mrs. Lecount's habitual practice to decide every thing for her master in the first instance, and then to persuade him that he was not acting under his housekeeper's resolution but under his own, she would have seen it now.

"You hear what Lecount has just said?" remarked Mr. Noel Vanstone. "You hear the undecided testimony of a person who has known me from childhood? Take care, Miss Garth—take care!" He complacently arranged the nails of his white dressing-gown over his knees, and took the plate of strawberries back on his lap.

"I am sorry to offend you," said Magdalen. "I am only anxious to open your eyes to the truth. You are not acquainted with the characters of the two sisters whose fortunes have fallen into your possession. I have known them from childhood, and I come to give you the benefit of my experience in their interests and in yours. You have nothing to dread from the elder of the two; she patiently accepts the hard lot which you, and your father before you, have forced on her. The younger sister's conduct is the very opposite of this. She has already declined to submit to your father's decision, and she now refuses to be silenced by Mrs. Lecount's letter. Take my word for it, she is capable of giving you serious trouble if you persist in making an enemy of her."

Mr. Noel Vanstone changed color once more, and began to fidget again in his chair. "Serious trouble," he repeated, with a blank look. "If you mean writing letters, ma'am, she has given trouble enough already. She has written once to me, and twice to my father. One of the letters to my father was a threatening letter—wasn't it, Lecount?"

"She expressed her feelings," poor child," said Mrs. Lecount. "I thought it hard to send her back her letter, but your dear father knew best. What I said at the time was, Why not let her express her feelings? What are a few threatening words, after all? In her position, poor creature, they are words, and nothing more."

"I advise you not to be too sure of that," said Magdalen. "I know her better than you do."

She paused at these words—paused in a momentary terror. The sting of Mrs. Lecount's pity had nearly irritated her into forgetting her assumed character, and speaking in her own voice.

"You have referred to the letters written by my pupil," she resumed, addressing Noel Vanstone, as soon as she felt sure of herself again. "We will say nothing about what she has written to your father; we will only speak of what she has written to you. Is there any thing unbecoming in her letter, any thing said in it that is false? Is it not true that these two sisters have been cruelly deprived of the provision which their father made for them; His will to this day speaks for him and for them; and it only speaks to no purpose because he was not aware that his marriage obliged him to make it again, and because he died before he could remedy the error. Can you deny that?"

Mr. Noel Vanstone smiled, and helped himself to a strawberry. "I don't attempt to deny it," he said. "Go on, Miss Garth."

"Is it not true," persisted Magdalen, "that the law which has taken the money from these sisters, whose father made no second will, has now given that very money to you, whose father made no will at all? Surely, Mr. Noel Vanstone, you may, this is hard on those orphan girls?"

"Very hard," replied Mr. Noel Vanstone, "if it strikes you in that light too—doesn't it, Lecount?"

Mrs. Lecount shook her head, and closed her handsome black eyes. "Harrowing," she said; "I can characterize it, Miss Garth, by no other word—harrowing. How the young person—no! how Miss Vanstone the younger—discovered that my late respected master made no will I am at a loss to understand. Perhaps it was put in the papers? But I am interrupting you, Miss Garth. You have something more to say about your pupil's letter?"

Magdalen replied as she had done when Mrs. Lecount first referred to the letter. "I am quite in earnest," said Magdalen, "and I have not seen the letter. It entreats you to remember how Mr. Andrew Vanstone's fortune has come into your hands; and to say, that one half of that fortune, divided between his daughters, was what his will intended them to have; and it asks of your sense of justice to do for his children what he would have done for them himself if he had lived. In my opinion and still, it asks you to give one half of the money to the daughters, and it leaves you free to keep the other half yourself. That is the proposal. Why have you refused to consider it?"

"For the simplest possible reason, Miss Garth," said Mr. Noel Vanstone, in high good-humor. "Allow me to remind you of a well-known proverb. A fool and his money are soon parted. Whatever else I may be, ma'am, I'm not fool."

"I don't put it in that way, Sir!" remonstrated Mrs. Lecount. "Be serious—pray be serious!"

"Quite impossible, Lecount," rejoined her master. "I can't be serious. My poor father, Miss Garth, took a high moral point of view in this matter. Lecount there takes a high moral point of view—and you, Magdalen, take the thing of the sort. I have lived too long in the continental atmosphere to trouble myself about moral points of view. My reason for doing this is as plain as two and two make four. I have got the money, and I should be a fool to give it if I parted with it. There is my point of view! Simple enough, isn't it? I don't stand on my dignity; I don't meet you with the high hand at all on my side; I don't blame your coming here as a total stranger to try and get me to change my mind; I don't blame the two girls for wanting to dip their fingers into my purse. All I say is, I am not fool enough to open it. And I don't see we need to say in the English circle at Zurich, when you return to Switzerland, Miss Garth, to infer!" He set aside his plate of strawberries once more, and daintily dried his fingers on his pocket-handkerchief.

Magdalen kept her temper. If she could have struck him dead by lifting her hand to do the moment it is probable she would have lifted it. But she kept her temper.

"As I am to understand," she asked, "that the last words you have to say in this matter are the words said for you in Mrs. Lecount's letter?"

"Precisely so," replied Mr. Noel Vanstone.

"You have inherited your own father's fortune as well as the fortune of Mr. Andrew Vanstone, and yet you feel no obligation to act from motives of justice or generosity toward these two sisters?" All you think it necessary to do for them is—you have got the money, and you refuse to part with a single farthing of it?"

"Most accurately stated! Miss Garth, you are a woman of business. Lecount, Miss Garth is a woman of business."

"Don't appeal to me, Sir!" cried Mrs. Lecount, gracefully wringing her handsome hands. "I can't bear it! I must interfere! Let me suggest—oh, what do you call it in English?—a compromise. Dear Sir! Miss Garth perversely refusing to do yourself justice; you have better reasons than you suppose for being given to Miss Garth. You follow your honored father's example; you feel it due to his memory to act in this matter as he acted himself. You, that is his reason, Miss Garth—I implore you on my knees, take that as his reason! You refuse to do what his dear father did; no more, no less. His dear father made a proposal, and he himself will now make that proposal over again. You, Mr. Noel, you will remember what this poor girl says in her letter to you. Her sisters will be not obliged to go out as governess; and she herself, in losing her fortune, has lost the hope of her marriage for years and years to come. You will remember this—and you will give the hundred pounds to one, and the hundred pounds to the other, which your admirable father offered in the past time? If he does this, Miss Garth, will he do enough? If he gives a hundred pounds each to these unfortunate sisters—"

"He will repent the insult to the last hour of his life," said Magdalen.

The instant that answer passed her lips she would have given worlds to recall it. Mrs. Lecount had only planted her sting to the right place at last. Those rash words of Magdalen's had burst from her passionately, in her own voice.

Nothing but the sharp ring of the performance saved her from making the serious error that she had committed more palpably still by attempting to set it right. Only for one past practice in the Entertainment came to her rescue, and urged her to go on unmoved. Mrs. Lecount's voice, as if nothing had happened.

"You mean well, Mrs. Lecount," she continued, "but you are doing harm instead of good. My pupils will accept no such compromise as you propose. I am sorry to have spoken so entirely just now; I beg you will excuse me." She looked hard for information in the housekeeper's face as she spoke the last words of apology. Mrs. Lecount baffled the look by putting her handkerchief to her eyes. Had she, or had she not, noticed the momentary change in Magdalen's voice from the tones that were assumed to the tones that were natural? Impossible to say.

"What more can I do!" murmured Mrs. Lecount, behind her handkerchief. "My master will look at it again—give me time to recover myself. May I retire, Sir, for a moment? My nerves are shaken by this and by other rows." She rose, drank of water, or I think I shall faint. Don't go yet, Miss Garth. I beg you will give us time to settle this last matter in peace. Oh, I am very well remain until I come back."

There were two doors of entrance to the room. One, the door into the front parlor, close at Magdalen's left hand. The other, the door into the back parlor, immediately behind Mr. Vanstone's politely retired, through the open folding-doors, by this latter means of exit the master will look the visitor by passing in front of her. Magdalen waited until she heard the door open and close again behind her, and then, still with her back to the room, she looked hastily at the letter which Mrs. Lecount had left on the table. The writing was the writing of a generous impulse in that base nature had never been proved by her own experience. The one chance that she had of saving the sisters from a creature he was, and to influence him through his fears.

Whatever she could speak Mr. Noel Vanstone himself broke the silence. Cunningly as he seemed to think he had spoken, he was watching, and at his housekeeper's desertion of him. He looked doubtfully at his visitor; he showed a nervous anxiety to conceal it, when he found the room's fourth.

"Very remember, ma'am, I never denied that this case was a hard one," he began. "You said just now you had no wish to offend me, and I am sure I don't want to offend you. Can't I offer you some strawberries? Would you like to look at my father's letter again? Very well, ma'am, I am naturally a gallant man; and I feel for both these sisters—especially the younger one. Those are my sentiments on the first impression and you touch me on a weak place. Nothing would please me more than to follow Miss Vanstone's lover—I'm sure I always call her Miss Vanstone, and so does Lecount—I'm sure I don't want to be unjust to anybody—than to hear that Miss Vanstone's lover had come back and married her. If a loan of money would be likely to help him on in the world, I should offered was good, and if my lawyer thought me justified—"

"Stop, Mr. Vanstone," said Magdalen. "You are entirely mistaken in your estimate of the person you have to deal with. I am not here on my wrong in supposing that the marriage of the younger sister could be accomplished in a week's time—would make any difference in the convictions which induced her to write to your father and to you. I am not here to ask you to act from a mixture of motives. I don't deny that the chance is the hope of her marrying advantage, and to the hope of rescuing her sister from a life of dependence. But if both those objects were accomplished to-morrow, the same thing would induce her to leave you in possession of the inheritance which her father meant you to give to them. Do you know what that motive is?"

She a nameless, homeless, friendless creature, to be living in the house of the man for which takes care of all legitimate children, casts her like carrion to the winds. It is your own—born to the purse and to the enjoyment of a vile oppression, an insufferable wrong. The sense of that wrong has driven her to the decision of the devil. The resolution to right that wrong burns in her like fire. If that miserable girl was married and rich with your money—now, do you think she would move an inch from her purpose? If every she wanted to draw her last breath in her body, the vile injustice which has struck at the helpless children through the calamity of their father, has left her alive she would shrink from no means which a desperate woman can employ to force the closed hand of yours open, or die in the attempt!"

She stopped abruptly. Once more her own inhumable consciousness betrayed her. Once more the natural nobility of that perverted nature had risen superior to the deception which it had stooped to practice. The scheme of the moment vanished from her mind's view, and the resolution of her life burst its way outward in her own words, in her own tones, pouring hotly and more hotly from her heart. She saw the abject manikin before her cowering back in the chair. Had his fears left him sense enough to perceive the change in her? Yes! The fear spoke the truth—his fears had bewildered him. This time the chance of the moment had befriended her. "The door behind her chair had not opened again yet. "No ears but his have heard me," she thought, with a sense of unutterable relief. "I have escaped Mrs. Lecount."

She had done nothing of the kind. Mrs. Lecount had never left the room.

After opening the door and closing it again, without going out, the housekeeper had noiselessly laid down her bonnet and shawl in the chair. Standing herself against the post of the folding-door, she took a pair of scissors from her pocket, waited until Noel Vanstone (from whose view she was entirely hidden) had attracted Magdalen's attention by speaking to her, and then crept forward with the scissors ready in her hand. The skirt of the false Miss Garth's gown—the brown stuff gown with the white spots on it—touched the floor within the housekeeper's reach. Mrs. Lecount held the skirt in her left hand, which ran round the bottom of the dress, over over the other, softly cut away a little irregular fragment of the stuff from the inner hem of the nearly smoothed the outer one over it again so as to hide the gap. By the time she had put the scissors back in her pocket and had risen to her feet (sheltering herself behind the post of the folding-door) Magdalen had spoken her last words. Mrs. Lecount quietly repeated the ceremony of opening and shutting the back parlor door, and glided back to her place.

"What has happened, Sir, in my absence?" she inquired, looking at her master with a look of alarm. "You are pale; you are agitated! Oh, Miss Garth, have you forgotten the caution I gave you at your own room?"

"Miss Garth has forgotten every thing," cried Mr. Noel Vanstone, recovering his tart composure on the reappearance of Mrs. Lecount. "Miss Garth has threatened me in the most outrageous manner. I forbid you either of those two girls any more, Lecount—especially the younger one. She is the most desperate character I ever heard of! If she can't get money by fair means, she threatens to have it by foul. Miss Garth is a fit subject to try my fun. To my face!" he repeated, folding his arms and looking mortally insulted.

"Compose yourself, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount. "Pray compose yourself, and leave me to speak to Miss Garth. I regret to hear, ma'am, that you have forgotten what I said to you in the next room. You have agitated Mr. Noel; you have compromised the interests of those here to plead; and you have only repeated what we knew before. The language you have used to yourself to use in my absence is the same language which your pupil was foolish enough to employ when she called for the second time to my late master. How can a lady of your years and experience seriously repeat such nonsense? This girl boasts and threatens. What can she do this she will do that. You have her confidence, ma'am. Tell me, if you please, in plain words, what can she do?"

Sharply as the taunt was pointed, it glanced off harmless. Mrs. Lecount had done nothing once too often. Magdalen rose, in composure, in self-possession, and composedly terminated the interview. Ignorant as she was of what had happened behind her chair, she saw at once by Mrs. Lecount's look and manner which warned her to run no more risk, and to trust herself no longer to speaking.

"I am not in my pupil's confidence," she said. "Her own acts will answer your question when the time comes. I can add to what I have said on my own knowledge of her, that she is no boaster. What she wrote to Mr. Michael Vanstone was what she was resolved to do—and that her decision to think, she was actually on the point of doing, when her self-control overcame her by his death. Mr. Michael Vanstone's son has only to persist in following his father's course to find before long that I am not misrepresenting my pupil, and that I have not come here to intimidate him in pursuit of my own ends. I promised to leave Mr. Noel Vanstone with two alternatives to choose from. I leave him to share Mr. Andrew Vanstone's fortune with the sister Vanstone's daughters—or, to persist in his present refusal and bear the consequences." She bowed, and walked to the door.

Mr. Noel Vanstone started to his feet, with anger and alarm struggling together in his pale, pressed first in his bashful white face. Before he could open his lips Mrs. Lecount's plump hands descended to them. She looked at him softly, back in his chair, and restored the plane of inexhaustible composure to her position on his lap.

"Refresh yourself, Mr. Noel, with a few more strawberries," she said, "and leave Miss Garth to me."

She followed Magdalen into the passage and closed the door on her right hand.

"Are you residing in London, ma'am?" asked Mrs. Lecount.

"I am," replied Magdalen. "I reside in the country."

"I want to write to you, where can I address my letter?"

"To the post-office, Birmingham," said Magdalen, inwardly hoping the place at which she was left, and at which all letters were still addressed to her.

Mrs. Lecount repeated the direction to fix it in her memory, advanced two steps in the passage, and opened the door right hand on Magdalen's arm.

A word of advice, ma'am," she said; "one word at parting. You are a bold woman and a clever woman. Didn't be too bold; don't be too clever. You are risking more than you think for." She suddenly raised herself on tip-toe and whispered the next words in Magdalen's ear. "Have you risked your life yet?" said Mrs. Lecount, with a fierce, hissing emphasis on every syllable. She drew back, opened the door stealthily as she spoke. It was the hand in which she had concealed the fragment of stuff from Magdalen's gown—the hand which held it fast at that moment.

"What do you mean?" asked Magdalen, pausing on the threshold.

Mrs. Lecount glided away politely to open the house-door.

"I mean nothing now," she said; "wait a little and time may show. One last question, ma'am, before I bid you good-by. Where your pupil was a little innocent child did she find amuse herself by building a house of cards?"

Magdalen impatiently answered by a gesture in the affirmative.

"Did you ever see her build up the house higher and higher," proceeded Mrs. Lecount, "till it was quite a pagoda of cards? Did you ever see her open her little child's eyes wide and look at it, and feel so proud of what she had done already that she must do more? Did you ever see her steady her pretty little hand, and hold her innocent breath, and put one other card on the summit—and by the whole house, the instant afterward, a heap of ruins on the table? Ah, you have seen that! Give her, if you please, a friendly message from me. I wanted to say she has built the house high enough already, and I recommend her not to be careful before she puts on that other card."

"She shall have your message," said Magdalen, with the same light-hearted blunder and Miss Garth's emphatic nod of the head. "But I doubt her minding it. She has her own reasons for what you suppose; and I think she will put on the other card."

"And bring the house down," said Mrs. Lecount.

"And build it up again," rejoined Magdalen. "I wish you good-morning."

"Good-morning," said Mrs. Lecount, opening the door. "One last word, Miss Garth. Don't think of what I said in the back room! Do try Mother Gutmount for that sad affliction in your eyes!

As Magdalen crossed the threshold of the door she was met by the postman approaching the house-steps with a letter picked out from the bundle in his hand. "Noel Vanstone, Esquire!" she heard the man say to himself, as she took her way down the front garden to the street.

She spoke truly when she had written him thinking from what new difficulty and new danger her timely departure had saved her. The letter which the postman had delivered into the housekeeper's hands was no other than the anonymous letter addressed to Noel Vanstone by Captain Wragge.

THE MADMAN'S MARSH.

A TALE FOUNDED ON FACT.

On the high-road from Lowminster to Chesleigh, just where the country is most barren and the wind most bleak, stands a small brick box of a house. Why the house is said to have been built for a mad lord who killed his keeper, and, after frightening away his servants, slaughtered his self, and all search after him was ineffectual. Seen said he had made away with himself in the marsh; and the marsh ever since has been called the Madman's Marsh.

All Lowminster cried set against Mr. Gabriel Thirston when it was whispered that he intended to shut up his bride—pretty Dorothy Spencer—in the deserted and ill-famed house at Middle Marsh. Mr. Thirston was a man above many of the evil prejudices being fulfilled. As for Dorothy, she loved every thing romantic and free and wild, and, rambling and singing through the gloomy rooms, she seemed to dispel the damp, musty air, and fill them with sunshine. For a while the gossips of Lowminster were silenced. Toward the close of the second year they began to whisper again. Mr. Thirston, whose manner was formerly so gentlemanly and unencroaching, was now pale and haggard, and evidently shunned his wife. She came down to church, was observed to be pale and thinner every Sunday.

It was on the evening of that same dreary December day that Dorothy sat, waiting as for a welcome friend, her husband. He had purposely without noticing Dorothy or her loving preparations, Mr. Thirston swept a portion of the breakfast table, and, putting his books, and taking a bag of money from his pocket, sat down to his solitary meal. Dorothy sat at the same end watching him in the looking-glass over the mantel-piece. It might have been fancy, but it seemed to her that he was not as much pleased as he appeared to be in his work. His eyes darted restlessly about the room, and more than once Dorothy saw them fall on her or the cradle of her child. Presently he looked up and said, quickly,

"Dorothy, I have to go to town to-night. I must be at Chudleigh station in an hour; you'll have time to get ready."

She looked at him in amazement, but he was going on with his accounts, and signed to her to leave the room. She did so. She went in again, for she could scarcely believe him in earnest. Her husband was afraid of the Madman's Marsh had he left her a night alone in the house. She lit a candle and went up stairs to see about things, and when she came down he was hasking by the great massive chest on the landing, where all the linen cash-box was kept.

"How long shall you be away?" asked Dorothy.

"It's uncertain," he answered shortly; "not more than two days, I should think; but I'm not sure how long I may be kept. You must be very careful, and of course not leave the house till I return. There's a good deal of money here."

The carpet-bag was packed. He took it from her, and wished her good-by. When they reached the hall she laid her hand on his arm.

"Gabriel, tell me; what business is this you are going on? Is it your own—I mean ours?"

"Yes."

"And you can not tell me what?"

He hesitated; then turned with a sudden impulse, and, in an altered tone and manner, said—

"Dorothy, I can not tell you more than this: I expect for the time we must seem to be separated. A terrible weight that has been pressing upon me for months. Ask me no more."

Dorothy heard him speak thus, saw him go without being able to satisfy that warning voice that called to her to avert some coming evil which she could not see, but the shadow of which was upon her; and she stood like one frozen from the desolate hall-window and stupefied. She sat down by the fire; and with her foot on the rocker of the cradle, her head against the mantle-piece, and her hands clasped in her lap, began again to think over all the idle gossip she had heard that day. The only thing that rested long on her mind was some thing about rosebuy shares, which Gabriel once told her he had bought, and from which he expected to make a fortune, but about which he had been strangely silent of late.

Hours passed; still she sat there. She remembered Gabriel's injunction about the light; but she could not make up her mind to go to bed in the large cold room, up two flights of wide, draughty stairs. Rather than do so that she ran to lay down and sit in darkness, which was only made more apparent by the occasional flickering of the fire. But before she was aware of it, Dorothy was in the melancholy howling of the wind, and the mysterious noises it made over the house, dislodging great lumps of the waiting snow, and the darkness she had become strangely nervous. If any thing should happen to the house while Gabriel was away! If Gabriel leaving the house with only a woman to guard it? she asked herself. So she rang the bell. Peacefully Hannah came running in at the sound of ringing pursued.

"Put your candle out, Hannah, and sit down," said Dorothy. "I feel dull sitting here alone with baby, and I want you to tell me something—the story of this house, or why they call it so. Perhaps it may relieve your mind, as I see all your thoughts are on it."

Hannah sat down, and rubbing her hands over the fire, and giving frightened glances over her shoulder, stood, like her head upstairs, and began—

"They're about awful, ma'am, to-night. I felt his cloak rushing by me all the way up stairs. I used to be bright there's nothing to frighten me, ma'am; but they don't often come for nothing."

"Tell me the story again, Hannah," said Dorothy; and Hannah drew her chair closer to the fire, and was soon lost in the legend of Madman's Marsh.

At first Dorothy listened absently, without paying much attention to her words, but by degrees, as Hannah got into her old monotonous tone of the story, it seemed to her as if she heard her own strange wild fancies put into words; and her eyes, as they were upon the solid wood-work, grew more larger and brighter every instant, and she hung upon her every whisper as if some great secret, but irresistible fascination; till at last, without being able to help herself, she felt as if it would take but a slight fall of ice in Hannah's voice, or a stir of the wind, which for the last minute or so was lulled, to make the creeping, nameless terror break out in frantic shrieks.

Suddenly Hannah stopped, raised her finger, and looked toward the door. Then she got up, opened it softly, and stood an instant listening. She rushed back and sank into her chair pale as death. Dorothy pushed back her chair on to her knees, and, clutching her arm, gasped hysterically,

"What, Hannah? What?"

But while she gazed up to Hannah's blanched face a low, muffled sound from below, as of a window being gently raised, broke upon the ear in unmistakable distinctness. As she listened her eyes fell upon the baby's cradle, and the light seemed to leave her with sudden strength. She rose quickly to her feet, and, with a scarlet spot on either cheek, her eyes dazzling her beautiful, and her small head circled, looked wildly round the room. Slung by leather bands over the mantle-piece was her husband's gun. It was always kept loaded. Dorothy's eyes fastened upon it, and she turned (perhaps to see what help she might expect from it) to Hannah. Groping, smothered footsteps began to ascend the stairs. The two women gazed wildly at each other. Then Dorothy clutched at the fastenings of the gun, took it down, dropped on her knees, and the gun on the table, pointed it toward the door open; then, trembling, yet resolved, stood with her finger on the trigger, and her eyes riveted on the black space without, intently listening.

For full a minute the only sound she heard was her baby's gentle breathing. Then the footsteps became one cautious footstep on the landing. Then another, and another. Groping hands moved along the wall, as if feeling for something, in the thick darkness. Dorothy hardly breathed. Next she heard a key turning, then the heavy clanging of the door of the great chest, and then a fast step this time near the door, as if to listen—so near that her heart seemed to give a sudden bound, and a cold perspiration stood upon her brow, and almost before she was aware of it, the loud report, the smoke, and the flash in the doorway, told her the gun had gone off. A deep, hollow groan mingled in her ears with the frightened screams of her child, and then a deadly faintness crept over her, and she felt as if it would be a blessed relief to give way to it and lose all sense of her horrible position. But somehow those agonized groans drew her feet irresistably toward the landing; till at last, scarcely conscious how she came there, she was supporting herself by the balusters, looking round with a lighted candle in her hand. Hannah, as she opened her eyes, saw her standing there, shading the candle with her hand, and so throwing a strong light upon her face. Good God! she thought, was it only the light, or did she really see a horrible, ghastly smile upon her mistress's face? In an instant shriek after shriek rent through the silence of the deserted room, and there succeeded a dead, heavy stillness. Hannah dragged herself to the door.

There, stretched across the landing, lay the tall and powerful form of a man: one had grasped the little iron mantle-piece, and blood streamed from the shoulder over it. On the other side knelt Dorothy, with her white face turned up to the roof, to heaven, while her lips moved dumbly; the other hand held back the crape from the man's face, and gazed on it. Aschuel! Aschuel! Gabriel! His glazing eyes were fixed upon her, and the sight of her misery seemed to bath his ground of pain. Even in the horrible agony, a sort of twofold mind caused crying, and not a sound broke the terrible silence. Slowly, and with a strange look of fear, he raised himself at last rose up. Her face was full of misery, but almost stony in firmness. She went to Hannah, and took the light from her. The old woman could hold to put her ear down to her mouth before she could catch a word.

"Fetch Dr. Hunt," she whispered. "Don't say a word of this; but tell him, for God's sake, to come in secret."

While Hannah was on her way across the black common, Dorothy stood again in the room where Dorothy wiped the drops of blood from the mouse-box, and put it back in the chest the same as before. Then she went to the bed, and laid her head upon the fire, and with compressed lips stood watching the unconscious face. Then, taking the sleeping child from the cradle, she went and sat down with it on the floor, at her husband's side, rocking it mechanically in her arms, and with her eyes still fixed on his face. His pallor was made more deathly by the jet of the long hair on his head and beard, but very changing the shroud. At one moment, when the eyelids quivered, or the broad chest heaved, or any other sign showed that life was not quite extinct to beat, the remembrance of his guilt would rush upon her, and make her own heart close sternly against it. At others, the bad gazed, minute after minute, without seeing a sign of life in that prostrate figure, and Gabriel's face was changed into an agony of cold, despairing remorse. At last she could bear the sight no longer. She got up, laid the sleeping child back in the cradle, and, sitting on her knees at his side, she breathed on his pantive lips, and listened to her breast, crying in a low, husky voice,

"Gabriel!"

Still the face was motionless.

"Gabriel!" Now her voice rose, and her passionate, imploring voice thrilled through the house. "I bid you speak to me! Say only one word, to tell me I have not killed you! O God!" And then, with a wild, heart-broken cry, "Gabriel, dear—dead by my hand! Dead, with a curse for me on his lips!"

Suddenly she was silent, for a low, shivering sigh escaped the white lips on which she gazed.

"Dorothy!"

She bent eagerly down, and he whispered:

"You know all?"

"Yes."

"I thought to make a short cut to fortune, by using what I knew of the secret affairs of others. But they fell greatly in value, and I had to pay incessant calls, and over one deception by another I became desperately ill—ill—you know the rest."

He stopped and gasped for breath, and Dorothy murmured—

"Hush, you must not speak now. Be still till the Doctor comes."

"The Doctor! You have sent for one? Then has you! I've done for you! Dorothy, forgive!"

"No, no," cried Dorothy, shuddering, and holding him down. "No one need know more than they know already. I will not leave you. I will swear you were supposed to be miles away; and I, in my fright, fired on you. There is nothing to fear if you will be still; but if—if you die, your death will be on my head, think of that! O think of it, Gabriel!"

"Dorothy, listen!" He spoke slowly and with great difficulty, but not a word was lost by those straining ears. "I have not long to live. Even if my sake don't let me leave you with that horrible feeling on your mind. Dorothy, I'm glad, I'm glad that you have saved me from the completion of my crime, and from a life of misery and shame. Dorothy, forgive! Dorothy, I love you!"

She answered nothing, but buried her face in his breast, and sobbed bitterly. Presently he gasped out, in a kind of hoarse breathing:

"Tell me some prayer, Dorothy. I forget all." She lifted her head, and raising his hand, and trying to steady her voice, she repeated a little, simple prayer that she had learned at her mother's like a child. He prayed for the soul that was to struggle yet on earth; she for that which was leaving yet to enter the presence of God.

When Hannah and the Doctor at last arrived they found Gabriel Dorothy sitting on the floor, with his side with a smile of strange beauty on her face. She knew that the soul had left the body, and she could not bear the sight of her husband's to feel his presence still. The love of their first days together had returned to her.

Hannah yelled her when they heard what they did hear of her sad story, little dreaming of all that it had included in her husband's dark and miserable breast. When her son had grown up, and gone forth into the world, she and Hannah lived alone in the old house; and it was rumored in Lowminster that every sixteenth of November Dorothy spent the night praying by herself on that desolate landing. On the morning after one of these nights, old Hannah saw her there asleep, she thought; and she covered her over, and sat down by her to watch her till she awoke. But soon the sun shining in upon her face, and the cold air, showed her that she showed her that Dorothy would wake no more. She was dead!

THE "WHITE HOUSE," ON THE PAMUNKEY, LATELY OCCUPIED BY THE UNION FORCES.

and the late building, somewhat different in form, was erected upon its site. This estate, as well as that of Arlington, near Washington city, was the property of the late G. W. P. Custis, the grandson of Mrs. Washington. Mary Custis, the wife of the rebel General Lee, is the sole heir of Mr. Custis, and all his property, real and personal, descended, according to the provisions of his will, during her natural life, and then became the patrimony of her children. One of her sons, formerly an officer in the army of the United States, but now Colonel of a rebel regiment at Richmond, has, since his marriage in 1859, been the occupant of the White House and the surrounding estate, the property of his mother. I repeat that the late "White House" was never rent by Washington, and that the estate is not the property of the "rebel General Lee." Mrs. Lee, his wife, is my authority for the assertion.

As the late "White House" itself possessed no rightful claim to our reverence, and never held a more tender one to the heart of the nation than the modern massive and estate of any other rebel family on the Pamunkey, all talk about its sanctity and of the Vandalism of its destroyers may very properly cease.

ACELDAMA.

JULY 1, 1862.

I SEE the fair new summer moon
Gilding along the tranquil sky;
It lights that field of blood where soon
Thousands must die!

Are dying—as we talk by starts,
With hushed low voices full of awe,
Or woe to some, and breaking hearts,
The end of war!

The horses' bridles even now
Are red with blood, the trampled field
Is reaped. War's sickle as the plow
Counts up its yield.

Night's languid perfumes, summer's breath
Will wrestle with sickening draughts; for there
Sulphurous, scorching, charged with Death,
Weighs down the air.

Earth puts on Paradise for us:
Their straining eyes have looked on hell!
In torments, anguish, curse,
Around them swell.

Men changed to demons! hate and rage
Lighting the dying fires of life
To hurl with oath and shout the gage
Of hellish strife.

Black parching lips and glazing eyes
Turned upward to this fair, soft light!
Shrieks, babbling, praying, moaning cries
Wear out the night.

This is the harvest of the tares
Sown while men slept. Oh fatal sleep!
Alas, what crimson sheaves it bears!
And all must reap!

Shall yet a fair harvest spring
From ground now manured by this blood?
Shall we a future grain sing
Of praise to God?

He only knows. Faith's eyes are dim
With bitter weeping for the slain.
A Nation's trust, placed all on Him,
Seems now in vain.

God hides himself. No wail, no cry
Can pierce the cloud, the end foresee;
Beneath His silence dumb we lie—
His "needs must be."

We need this anguish of suspense
To search our hearts and try our lives,
Till Faith, and not its proud pretense,
Alone survives.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 19, 1862.

ON TO RICHMOND!

AFTER one of the most exciting weeks of the war, we can at last thank God that the Army of the Potomac is safe, and is in reality nearer the accomplishment of the work that it has been appointed to do than it has ever been. That General M'Clellan was placed in a position of danger by the sudden appearance of Jackson's army on his right flank, and that in the six battles which occurred on 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th June, and July, we lost a large number of gallant men and officers, is true. But it is also true that the change of base from the Pamunkey to the James River had been determined, and actually began, before Jackson made his appearance. It is also true that, notwithstanding the unexpected and enormous rebel armies, M'Clellan's forces moved toward the James River by the roads and at the rate directed by their commander; and that, after five days' terrible fighting, reached the point he had selected for them ten days previously. At every point which our forces reached in their march to the James River their provident leader had planted on each height heavy batteries of cannon, whose fire mowed down the pursuing rebels by whole battalions and brigades. Lastly, it is also true that, while we may have lost from 15,000 to 18,000 men in killed, wounded, and missing, we have gained the support of the James River gun-boat flotilla, which is worth an army of 100,000 men.

On the other hand, the rebels, who, according to the papers, are returning thanks for a victory, have suffered so terribly that pressure of stations their loss at 40,000, and General Andrew Porter at 75,000 men. They have gained possession of the swamps where we have lost so many men by fever—nothing more.

On the whole, then, we have gained more than we have lost, and the rebels have lost more than they have gained, by the series of battles ending on 1st July. And now, if M'Clellan is promptly reinforced, and if Commodore Wilkes displays the energy which he has shown in other days, we shall soon see how absurd and wretched it was to talk of M'Clellan's movement as a reverse. Never was there a moment when it was more opportune to renew the cry, On to Richmond!

FOREIGN INTERVENTION ONCE MORE.

THE London Herald, a paper which, having long ago ceased to be profitable as a mercantile speculation, is now carried on at the expense of the secessionists in England; the Farlie Parish, whose leading editors are owned by John Slidell; and certain persons in this country whose loyalty is generally distrusted, continue to harp upon the subject of foreign intervention in our war. The open accessionists urge Great Britain and France to interfere: their covert allies affect to fear that they will do so. The object of both is nothing more than to dishearten the North and encourage the South.

For none of them really believe that intervention is at all likely.

There has been, however, so much said on the subject, and so many respectable people seem to entertain vague apprehensions of foreign troubles, that it is worth while to relieve the prospect seriously.

It is due to truth to say that international law affords no guarantee against foreign intervention. That law certainly denies, in general terms, the right of interference by one nation in the affairs of another. But it concedes the right when the course of events in any one nation menaces, directly or remotely, the peace or safety of its neighbors—those neighbors being, of course, the judges of what constitutes a menace. And it further concedes the right of intervention wherever "the interests of humanity" call for it; the intervening powers being again the judges of the nature of the exigency.

Thus, in 1854, war existed between Russia and Turkey, three other European Powers, having large interests in the Mediterranean, which they considered to be menaced by the advancing encroachments of Russia upon Turkey, made war upon the Czar and compelled him to pay, at least for a time, the advance of his flag in that direction.

So, in 1827, war having existed for many years between Turkey and her revolted province, Greece, and the war being prosecuted with circumstances of the most savage ferocity by the Turks, three European Powers, Great Britain, France, and Russia intervened, in the interests of humanity, recognized the independence of Greece, destroyed the Turkish fleet, and placed a German prince on the Greek throne.

It would be very easy to show that the success of the Union arms involves no menace to Europe and no detriment to humanity. Frequent allusions have been made to the combined intervention in Syria, and constituting a precedent for a similar proceeding in regard to the contest here. But the facts do not justify this view. The Greeks actually took arms against their Turkish oppressors in the year 1770—five years before the American colonies heard the first shot for independence; it was not till five-and-forty years afterward that Europe intervened. Fifty-seven years hence, if we have not suppressed the rebellion, Europe will be requested to send ambassadors to Richmond. From 1792 to 1827 there never was a period of three months during which the Greeks were not fighting, in some part of their country, for their independence. And during all these years Greeks were murdered, though the Greeks were Christians and their oppressors Turks; though, in 1821, every Greek who could be found in any Turkish city was brutally butchered; though, in 1822, Kara Ali absolutely depopulated the Greek island of Scio, slaughtering every man, and selling or sending away into slavery that the price of slaves for the harem fell fifty per cent.; though, in 1825, 76, 77, Ibrahim Pasha and the Moors cropped the ears of every prisoner he took, and then blew the mutilated bodies out of cannon. The writers who say that the same reasons which justified intervention in Greece would likewise justify intervention in the United States are evidently not familiar with the facts.

But it is clear that, if it was manifestly the interest of Great Britain and France to interfere in our war, they would have run no risks and sons for so doing. It is therefore of more consequence to us to find out where their interest lies in the matter than to trouble ourselves about laws and precedents.

The first overt act of interference by any foreign power would be instantly met by a declaration of war by the United States. Pending the rebellion, this country will patiently endure almost any amount of insult and injury, and will feign world. But interference is war. This is well understood—in Europe as here. It would be a sore trial to us, but we could and would. Instead of 600,000 men we should put 1,200,000 in the field, besides 150,000 negroes. Instead of $200,000,000, Congress would authorize Mr. Chase to issue $1,000,000,000 of Treasury Notes. Arrangements have already been made by which, in the fall, our iron-clad navy will be equal to that of France and England combined: we should, in the event of a foreign war, double that navy at once. The number of our iron-clad ships in England is not to be launched till February, 1863; it is probable that neither power now has a single iron-clad vessel which they would trust on the American coast. The Monitor, as is known, would sink the Warrior in about ten minutes. So much for us. Now for Europe.

In deciding to intervene in this country the Emperor of France and the Prime Minister of Great Britain would have to address their respective nations somewhat as follows:

"We have resolved to make war upon the United States because they are in trouble. We have no quarrel with them. On the contrary, our relations with that Power were never more amicable than they are at present, and by and and deed the Administration of Mr. Lincoln have testified their ardent desire to remain on friendly terms with us. We go to war with them for the purpose of destroying the Union, and securing the establishment of a new Confederacy based on the corner-stone of human slavery—an institution which we loathe and abhor, which we have abolished in our own colonies, and the extension of which we oppose. Our armies and spending large sums of money every year to prevent. Our enemies in this war will be a race of people with whom—since 1812—we have never had any serious misunderstanding; our allies will be the slaveholding aristocracy, whose principle of government will be filibustering aggrandizement, who have already twice attempted to wrest Cuba from Spain, and whose President, at this early stage, already announces, in his letter to Governor Brown, of Georgia, his intention of making war upon his neighbors generally for the purpose of extending the sphere of slave territory. If we succeed in our object, the first victims of the rapacity of the new Confederacy will be already by our own colonies and those of our ally Spain. This war will naturally involve some sacrifices. You are already paying pretty heavy taxes—about as heavy as many of you think you can bear. The war will double them. You are already suffering from the reduction of your trade with the United States in consequence of the rebellion. The war will destroy that trade altogether. You will not only sell no goods at all to the Americans, and get no cotton whatever, but you will get from them no gold, no breadstuffs, and no provisions. Food will advance from 20 to 100 per cent. in all your markets. Your foreign trade, if not destroyed altogether, will be prosecuted under circumstances of peculiar peril. Americans ships of war will at least endeavor to cut off your communication with India, Australia, the West Indies, and South America: the experience of 1812, when the American navy was less than one-fiftieth what it is at present, shows what can be done in this direction. In the mean time it will be necessary for you to keep a sharp eye on dangers at home. A large and powerful party in Ireland would doubtless recognize the opportunity of a war with the United States to strike a fresh blow for independence. In France the dangerous classes would require very close watching indeed. And finally, we learn with regret that Mr. Cameron, United States Minister to St. Petersburg, is carrying on a negotiation with Russia which may lead to very serious complications after our new war with the United States has broken out."

Such would have to be the language of the rulers of the maritime powers of Europe in announcing to their people their intervention in favor of this country. It is easy to understand what would be the response of the people.

No man, in either England and uncertain world, can be certain of the future. Men and nations have often acted as it seemed absurd and impossible for them to act. But, unless the case now stands, it seems gratuitous and absurd to doubt the sincerity of the emphatic declarations of the British and French Governments that they have no intention whatever of interfering in our quarrel.

THE RETORT COURTEOUS.

A DISTINGUISHED American conversing, a few days since, in Paris, with M. THOUVENEL, the French Minister of State, was asked rather impudently by the Frenchman,

"But, Sir, how much time do you want to take Richmond? How long must we wait?"

"I think, Monsieur, with great respect," was the courteous reply of our countryman, "that we shall be satisfied if we are granted as much time as the allies took to enter Sebastopol."

M. THOUVENEL changed the subject.

THE LOUNGER.

OUR HEROES.

It is impossible not to feel that there is a great deal that is consoling and inspiring even in the disasters of the week in the rebellious Virginia mud. It was one of the longest battles recorded in history. It was a contest between an overwhelming mass of desperate men, standing upon their own soil, well armed, ably led, terribly in earnest, and a smaller body of heroes, upon a strange soil, and inspired with the knowledge that they fought for the very principle of liberty and human civilization.

The battle raged for a week. Our men, fighting like heroes, were driven inch by inch every inch of the way, but neither routed nor appalled, and in retreating merely compacting themselves and forming a better base of operations. In the very midst of the battle, after it had raged for nearly a week, the gunnery of the rebel iron-clad steamer Yankees along his line, invoking his staggering but undaunted soldiers to strike once more and dashing—they are too utterly spent for that—to launch themselves slowly, sullenly, overwhelmingly upon the yelling and exultant foe, at once breathing death as they come:—on and on; not a lightning flash, but a lava stream—on and on; not a cry of rage, but the fall away before them of wild dismay, and the hush of the long conflict is a ghastly victory of ours!

The greatest bravery of our men through the bloody and dreadful week redeems the story of delay. They have always been the most splendid soldiers. Their conduct is the universal theme. The result is a lesson by which we are wise men to profit. It is not merely that we are not in Richmond—but that is still, and likely to be, a question of time. If the people who have remarched to the battle-field were marching to-day, we have, the delay will be only a challenge which will be gladly accepted and answered by hordes of men. If we have received a blow, so have the rebels. If we have not succeeded, it is no victory for them.

After Bull Run we had a right to doubt the result, because it seemed as if we were overwhelmed. But Chickahominy we have a right to be sure of our final triumph, because of the experience of heroism. We are learning war. It is a dreadful lesson, in a fearful school. But it will save us untold horrors hereafter.

M'CLELLAN.

WHEN Lexington, in Missouri, fell, and Halleck was captured, even the most faithful supporters of General M'Clellan felt sore misgivings. But did not admit that he was responsible. For he said under the circumstances the public sensibility was considered satisfied. But subsequently, in a fort-night, because of our final triumph, because of the heroism, we are learning war. It is a dreadful lesson, in a fearful school. But it will save us untold horrors hereafter.

M'CLELLAN.

The Lounger's faith in General Fremont did not fall with Lexington, nor has his confidence in General M'Clellan been shaken back with his army. Let us the simple fact.

M'Clellan hoped to take Richmond, and failed. The enemy defeated him, but, with his line, was not beaten back. They marched out a hundred and twenty or forty or forty thousand strong, and the upon M'Clellan's army of seventy or eighty men posted in a swamp and across a river. He so fought with forces of overwhelming number that he must crush him, or his retreat would be their defeat. For a week he resisted them with heroic and unquailing courage. He fought them out with out panic, but with splendid and terrible sallies. He fought them at last, routed them, pursued them, and drives back the swarming hordes of rebels, and remains fast and impregnable upon his new line of operations.

Of course Richmond, and not Harrison's Landing, is the point aimed at. That our campaign is not through such an overwhelming storm of battle safely to the James does not prove that it will not be. Of course the army is considered in safety on half of his. We must remember that immediately after the battle of Bull Run, before Banks and Shields' army reinforced Richmond, M'Clellan said that the enemy was stronger than he. Let us be fair. He did not win that battle against overpowering odds, he prevented the foe from winning it.

THE LESSON OF THE DAY.

EVERY event in this war teaches us the same lesson. It is as old as human history, but it has had to be learned. It has been urged a hundred times in this struggle of ours, and a hundred times forgotten. It is very simple, for it is only; don't give up.

From the beginning we have been told that the rebels had no money, no food, no ammunition, that they were demoralized, disheartened, and coerced: that their cause was hopeless, and that they must soon give it up. Every day that they were good at a bash, but had no persistence in war. Several times the back of the rebellion was broken. The "end of the war" approached for a long time: and the student and most suspicious papers have occasionally expressed the hope that, as the end of the world dear seems to every inch of the national domain.

We have all along been very confident. The loyal colonies have not failed to express it, but we never doubt the success of the nation in subduing this revolt. But the way is childish to learn. The suggestion of the loyal Governors in the beginning of the national heart. It is perfect prompting of the national heart. It is perfectly clear now that if we had had a million of men more or less enrolled, and armed as rapidly as possible, we should have taken no steps backward, and the world could not have had the kind of fun as to the prospects of the revolt.

But we must henceforth remember that this is a war; that the hate of men who have been taught to hate us for years is more bitter than the hate of foreigners; that the rebels feel their cause to be as sacred as ever our fathers felt any of the principles to be; that they have for long years been taught to hate us and despise us; that the more of them are profoundly ignorant and poor, and that their prejudice against us is malignant, and they look upon our army as an invading host, come to waste their homes and insult their families; that by a thousand reasons of conduct and of ignorance, and force of circumstance, they are in opposition to the Government. Moreover, a people so inflamed and desperate, practically armed square miles of fertile soil, will not starve immediately. If a piece of brown paper, by common consent, buys a loaf of bread, it is as good as gold. Disaffection, disappointment, disgust there may be in individual cases, and in the perhaps intentionally exaggerated rumors of designing stragglers. But after fifteen months of war the rebels stand today bitter, defiant, desperate; not hoping, of course, to subdue and overrun us, but expecting to hold out fiercely until Europe interposes.

Let no one mistake what we are saying. There is not the least reason for doubt in any loyal heart. But there is every reason for keeping our eyes steadily open upon the facts. A man is not depressed or gloomy because he thinks a huge and radical civil war is not a picnic, to be ended by an order of the day. If you expect to stand on the top of the mountain you must climb, and slip, and sweat, and fall, and bruise your shins, and up again, and up, and up. The job is difficult, so is this rebellion. But it is not in Yankee nature to be foiled. The tougher the resistance, the more resolutely, with grim good-humor, it settles itself to the task.

WHO DID IT?

INEVITABLY, after such severe work as our soldiers have seen before Richmond, every body raises his head from the details, and asks, Who did it? Who is responsible for it? Who shall be the scape-goat?

We are all responsible. It is very easy, after any event has occurred, to see and to say how a different combination might have produced different results. Suppose a storm had not scattered the Spanish armada. Suppose Hampden and Cromwell had come to New England. Suppose Julius Cæsar had never crossed the Rubicon. Suppose Alexander the Great had died of measles in his fourth year. Suppose the deluge had never dried up. Suppose any thing you please as a premise, and you may suppose what you choose as a logical conclusion. A month ago we all thought and said, "'Tis only a question of time. We shall have Richmond before the harvest." Even those who did not like M'Clellan's politics, and those who did not have great faith in his military genius, cried, "Of course. He must take Richmond. He can't help it."

Let us hope before these lines are read that he may have it. But let us also not be too sure. And when we read of the fighting and the carnage of the 28th, 29th, and 30th June, let us remember that, pitiful as the story may be, all had doubtless been done in preparation that the circumstances and the honesty of the leaders allowed. It would have been better doubtless to have had an army of fifty thousand men in the Shenandoah, and another of two hundred thousand in an airy and healthy and impregnable position before Richmond, and another of fifty thousand upon the Rappahannock, and a hundred thousand veterans around Washington. All this would have been better without question. But the general conviction of the country and of the Administration has been that there were men enough to do the work. Senator Wilson is as earnest a friend of ample and vigorous measures as there is in the country, but he thought and said long ago that we had plenty of men. It must never be forgotten that we are learning to make war by experience. When it is the universal conviction that half a million of volunteers are enough, a call for a million, upon the plea that the more men the surer the result, would fall heavily upon the public ear.

Let us all be our own scape-goats. We can not blame M'Clellan that he is not in Richmond (if he is not), nor the President, nor Mr. Stanton, nor the Cabinet, nor any individual. Suppose that General M'Clellan asked for more troops. The President would say, "I've none to send you."

"But I must have them."

"I haven't got them."

"But, my dear Sir, it is a military necessity, of which you are no judge."

"Very likely, my dear General, but I am nevertheless, and unluckily, if you choose, Commander-in-Chief. I wish I could see as you do, but I can not. I have no right to relinquish my own judgment. In this case I do not feel that I ought to. I wish I had fifty thousand troops to send you. I can call for them, if you say you must retire without them; but there are not too many in the Shenandoah, nor before Washington, and the West wants all it has."

"Very well, I understand; and I will do the best I can."

Clearly neither of the two is to be blamed. The difficulty is that there are not more men. That there ought to be more is very evident, but that is a fact which the public just perceives. Our delay before Richmond is as little any body's fault, and as much every body's misfortune, as can well be.

"THE UNION AT ANY PRICE."

FOR a year we have been saying that we wanted to save the Union at any cost. We are now called upon to show that we mean what we say. We have perhaps thought that half a million of armed men would suffice; that it was not necessary to employ any other means. But as parents ask children "How much do you love me? A dollar's worth? Twenty dollars? An apple?"—so we have now to ask ourselves how much do we love our Government and the cause of civil liberty and human freedom. The question is perfectly simple. If we can say truly that we love our country so strongly that we hold nothing dearer, except justice and honor, then we are safe. If not, we are already lost, and every one of our soldiers whom we henceforth allow to fall we murder. Let us see, then, how much we do love it, and at what cost we are willing to save it.

Mr. Ten Eyck, a Republican Senator from New Jersey, says that he doubts whether his fellow-citizens would fight for their country side by side with colored men. That is to say, their prejudice against the colored race is dearer to them than the Union.

Another Senator says that confiscating the property of rebels in arms is not to be thought of. A man may be slaughtering our brothers, sons, and fathers, but we must respect his property. Men who take this view are more unwilling to confiscate by proceedings in rem than they are to see the country divided and lost.

Another party say that it is frightful to think of General Hunter's regiment of colored men. If you ask them whether they would not save the Union upon the very principle of the Union, namely, the liberty of innocent men, they shake their heads. They would rather the Government should be ruined and the nation lost than that those who have been enslaved, in defiance of every human instinct and divine law, should be liberated.

These represent classes that have been hitherto very large in the country. But they are classes that diminish every day. It is gradually becoming plain to the blindest eyes that this country can be saved only by the heroic effort of all her children. The authorities are willing, but the people are the Government. The authorities must be stimulated and supported by public opinion, and every man must help to make that. If the world sees that we are trying with one hand to put down rebellion and with the other to save rebels, it is idle to expect its assent to the continuance of a war in which it has so much at stake. If, on the other hand, it sees that we have learned what we are not to be reproached for not having earlier admitted, that the extremest and most radical measures are not to be spared in the suppression of this insurrection, the world will pause, for it will see a purpose too dangerous and sincere to be trifled with.

The moral is radiantly clear. If we value the Union more than the claim of the rebels to their slaves and their property, we shall save it. If not, it is already lost. If we do not believe that we can constitutionally take any step short of dishonor, which is necessary for national self-preservation, then our salvation is constitutionally impossible.

DOUBLING THE CAPE.

IN the question of foreign meddling there is one point which should be remembered. There is no doubt that Mr. Yancey, upon the part of the rebels, offered as an inducement for foreign recognition the emancipation of the slaves. When, therefore, it is thought by Europe that the time has come to acknowledge the independence of the rebel section, England will insist upon some scheme of emancipation as a condition. It will do this because abolition is the traditional British policy, and because the English know perfectly well that the supply of cotton which depends upon slave-labor is necessarily an uncertain supply, because of the precarious condition of any slave society. Some scheme of emancipation will therefore be required, and it will be gladly granted by the rebels. Then what?

Then in fighting, as we have hitherto been, the Government will be fighting for slavery under the Union; but Europe and the South will be fighting not only for Southern independence, but for universal Liberty. Is it not worth while for us to secure that advantage? Is it not almost time for the President to call upon all loyal men in the land to rally to the support of the Government?

A NEW NOVEL.

"THE MORGESONS," the novel by Mrs. Stoddard, wife of the poet, is a very striking story of a certain aspect of New England life. With curious power and a kind of remorseless skill the author invests the homely details of Yankee shore-life with the tragical gloom of Greek fate. The detailed delineation of character and events, and the quiet reliance upon the essential interest of the subject, are admirable. Indeed, there is an intensity of reality in this story which will make the reader instinctively wonder whether the author has not strictly followed Sir Philip Sidney's charge, "Look into thine own heart, and write." Among the new novels "The Morgesons" is worthy the attention of every reader who seeks a remarkable story, or who is interested in American literature.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

IT is not always a mark of frankness to possess an open countenance. An alligator is a deceitful creature, and yet it possesses an open countenance when it is in the very act of taking you in.

"How d'ye, broder?" "So so, me tank ye; how you bin dis long time?" "Quite well, tank you. How you pass your time now, broder?" "Oh! me no pass me time at all, broder; me cock up me foot so let time pass himself."

EPITAPH AT NESTON ST. NICHOLAS.

"Here lies a certain Elizabeth Mann,
She lived an old maid and she died an old Mann."

GENT ON HORSEBACK. "Get out of the way, boy, get out of the way! My horse don't like donkeys!"
BOY ON DONKEY. "Doan't he? Then why doan't he kick thee orf?"

"Mr. Brown, I owe you a grudge, remember that!" "I shall not be frightened, then, for I never knew you to pay any thing that you owed."

Did you ever know a young lady who was too weak to stand up at church who could not dance all night without being tired at all?

The most infallible way of preventing a kitchen door from creaking is said to be to engage a servant girl whose sweet-heart comes to the house to see her.

"With all thy faults I love thee still," as the man said to his wife when she was giving him a curtain lecture.

A COUPLE OF SHAMS.—A sham count and a sham Abbé being in a company together, the count hearing the word Abbé always bandying about was piqued, and asked the Abbé where his abbey lay? The Abbé replied, "Bless me! do you not know it? It is in your county!"

"Mother," said Ike Partington, "did you know that the 'Iron Horse' has but one ear?" "One ear! merciful gracious, child, what do you mean?" "Why, the engin-ear, of course."

THE HEIGHT OF IMPUDENCE.—Taking shelter from a shower in an umbrella shop is the height of impudence.

A gentleman who was rather impatient at table declared he wished he could manage without servants, as they were a greater "plague than profit." "Why not have a dumb waiter?" suggested a friend. "Oh no," returned the other, "I have tried them—they don't answer."

A celebrated engineer being examined at a trial, made use of the expression "the creative power of a machine," upon which the judge somewhat offensively asked him what he meant by the phrase. "I mean, my lord," said the engineer, "that power which enables a man to convert a goat's tail into a judge's wig."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, June 30, in the Senate, a bill was introduced to punish persons giving or offering to give members of Congress or officers of the government any consideration for procuring contracts, office, or place under the United States Government. The bill providing that vessels and goods belonging to loyal citizens, which have been captured by the rebels, when retaken by the United States, shall be delivered to the owners without salvage, was passed. The bill prescribing an additional oath of office was also passed, as also the bill establishing certain national arsenals. An executive session was held, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the case of the New York Tribune, with regard to the Intelligencer printing, was transferred from the Judiciary Committee to a select committee for investigation. The remainder of the session was devoted to debate upon the bill for the construction of a ship-canal from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi. A motion to postpone the subject till the first Monday in January was negatived by one majority, and the House adjourned.

On Tuesday, July 1, in the Senate, the bill for the admission of Western Virginia into the Union as a State was discussed at considerable length, the question being on the amendment offered by Senator Sumner, prohibiting slavery in the territory after the 4th of July, 1863. Without taking a vote on the proposition, the bill was laid aside, and the Army Appropriation bill was taken up. The amendment limiting the number of the rank and file of the army to 750,000 was stricken out, and an amendment limiting the number of Major-Generals at forty, and the Brigadier-Generals to two hundred was adopted. Several other amendments were adopted, and the bill was then laid aside. A resolution, calling on the President for information as to whether Mr. Fulton, the editor of the Baltimore American, has been arrested, upon what charge, and for what reason, etc., was laid over. Some other business of no general interest was transacted, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the consideration of the Tariff bill was resumed in Committee of the Whole, various amendments were adopted, and the bill passed. The bill providing for the enlargement of the locks of the Illinois canal so as to admit of the passage of naval vessels, with the amendment for the enlargement of the locks of the Erie and Oswego canals, was laid on the table by two majority. Notice was given of a motion to reconsider the vote, with the view of postponing the subject till December next.

On Wednesday, July 2, in the Senate, Senator Powell, from the Judiciary Committee, reported back the bill to punish persons giving or offering to give consideration to members of Congress for procuring Government contracts, etc. Senator Wright, of Indiana, offered a resolution that, by the report of the Secretary of War of June 21, 1862, it appearing that Senator J. F. Simmons, of Rhode Island, used his official influence to procure a contract from the Government for one C. B. Schuberth, for which it was agreed that he (Mr. Simmons) should receive $50,000, therefore the said James F. Simmons be expelled from his seat in the Senate. The resolution was laid over. The bill changing the grade of line officers of the navy, creating admirals and commanders in addition to the present grades, was discussed. The bill authorizing an additional issue of Treasury Notes was then taken up, several important amendments adopted, and the bill passed, when the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War to communicate any information received by the Government from General M'Clellan relative to the operations at White House was adopted. The motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill for the enlargement of the Illinois and New York canal-locks was laid on the table was called up. A motion to lay the motion on the table was negatived—56 against 71. Pending a call for the yeas and nays on the main question, the subject was laid aside. A number of bills and resolutions relative to naval affairs were then passed, and the House adjourned.

On Thursday, July 3, in the Senate, a joint resolution adjourning Congress on the 10th inst. was laid over. An executive session was held, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Dunlap, of Kentucky, asked, but did not obtain, leave to introduce a resolution declaring the sentiments contained in Major-General Hunter's letter relative to arming of the slaves (read in the House on 2d) are eminently unjust to an American Congress—an insult to the American people and to our brave soldiers—and justly merit the consideration of this body. The Senate amendments to the Treasury Note bill were reported to the Committee of Ways and Means. A bill providing for the trial or discharge of State prisoners was introduced and ordered to be printed. The Confiscation bill, as returned from the Senate, was taken up, and the House non-concurred in the amendment substituting Mr. Clark's bill for that of the House.

On Friday, July 4, in the Senate no business of public importance was transacted.——The House was not in session.

On Saturday, July 5, the Senate adopted a resolution calling for Colonel Canby's reports of operations in New Mexico. The General Pension bill was taken up, several amendments agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House the Senate's amendments to the Treasury Note bill were non-concurred in, and a committee of conference ordered. The Senate's joint resolution fixing upon the first Tuesday in September as the time of meeting at Chicago of the Pacific Railroad corporators was adopted. A joint resolution was adopted authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish clothing to wounded and sick soldiers as a substitute for that lost by the casualties of war. A resolution was adopted calling on the Secretary of War for information whether any member of Congress has been interested in contracts since the 1st of April last. The remainder of the session was devoted to discussing the report of General Hunter on the subject of arming negroes.

On Monday, July 7, in the Senate, the Finance Committee reported back the Tariff bill with amendments. Senator Chandler offered a resolution, which lies over, calling on the Secretary of War for copies of all orders of the Executive to General M'Clellan relative to the advance of the Army of the Potomac on Richmond, and all the correspondence between the said General M'Clellan and the Executive from the date of the order of the 22d of February to the advance on Manassas up to May 1; also a statement of the numerical force of the Army of the Potomac, as shown by the roll in November, 1861, and in January, February, and March, 1862; also the number of troops General M'Clellan took from Fortress Monroe, the number at the fortress, and the reinforcements sent to him up to June 1, 1862. A Committee of Conference was ordered on the Treasury Note bill, and afterward the bill was passed. The general Pension bill was also passed. The bill to provide provisional governments in certain cases was then taken up, and a long and interesting debate ensued. Without taking action on the bill the Senate adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Diven, of New York, asked the House to excuse his colleagues, Messrs. Van Valkenburg and Pomeroy, and himself, from service for the remainder of the session, as they desired to return to their respective districts to aid in raising troops. The request was granted. The Senate bill establishing arsenals at Columbus, Ohio, Indianapolis, Indiana, and Rock Island, Illinois, for the deposit and repair of arms, etc., was passed. The Senate bill to carry into effect the treaty with Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave-trade was passed.

M'CLELLAN TO HIS SOLDIERS.

The following stirring appeal to the Army of the Potomac was issued on the Fourth:

HEAD-QUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
CAMP NEAR HARRISON'S LANDING, July 4, 1862.

SOLDIERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC!—Your achievements of the last ten days have illustrated the valor and endurance of the American soldier. Attacked by superior forces and without hope of reinforcements you have succeeded in changing your base of operations by a flank movement, always regarded as the most hazardous of military expedients. You have saved all your material, all your trains, and all your guns, except a few lost in battle, taking, in return, guns and colors from the enemy. Upon your march you have been assailed day after day with desperate fury, by men of the same race and nation, skillfully massed and led. Under every disadvantage of number, and necessarily of position also, you have in every conflict beaten back your foes with enormous slaughter. Your conduct ranks you among the celebrated armies of history. No one will now question that each of you may always with pride say, "I belong to the Army of the Potomac." You have reached the new base, complete in organization and unimpaired in spirit. The enemy may at any time attack you. We are prepared to meet them. I have personally established your lines. Let them come, and we will convert their repulse into a final defeat. Your Government is strengthening you with the resources of a great people. On this, our nation's birthday, we declare to our foes, who are rebels against the best interests of mankind, that this army shall enter the capital of the so-called Confederacy; that our National Constitution shall prevail, and that the Union, which can alone insure internal peace, and external security to each State, "Must and Shall be Preserved," cost what it may in time, treasure, and blood.

GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN.

SIX BATTLES IN A WEEK.

We give below the names of the localities of the various battles which were fought by the contending armies before Richmond, during the week ending July 1:

Thursday, June 26—Battle of Mechanicsville.
Friday, June 27—Battle of Gaines's Mills.
Saturday, June 28—Battle of the Chickahominy.
Sunday, June 29—Battle of Peach Orchard; battle of Savage's Station.
Monday, June 30—Battle of White Oak Swamp; battle of White Oak Creek; battle of Charles City Cross Roads.
Tuesday, July 1—Battle of Turkey Bend.

REBEL LOSSES THEREIN.

The rebel accounts of the late battles, published in the Richmond papers, admit a heavy loss on the side of the enemy, and would imply that they suffered terribly—far more so in dead than we did. The Richmond Examiner, for instance, states that out of one division of rebels engaged in Sunday's fight, only six thousand could be mustered, when fourteen thousand went into action. This exceeds by far any amount of loss which our records show, in the same number of men.

ANOTHER FIGHT.

General M'Clellan's army had another skirmish with the enemy on Friday last on our left wing, which resulted in the total defeat of the rebels, and the capture of one thousand of their men and three batteries. Our cavalry followed up the enemy through the White Oak Swamp.

A CALL FOR MORE TROOPS.

A document was presented to the President on 1st July, signed by the Governors of eighteen States—namely: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Michigan, Tennessee, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Minnesota, Illinois, Wisconsin, and the "President of the Military Board" of Kentucky, stating that they were of one accord in the hearty desire that the recent successes of the Federal arms may be followed up by measures which must insure the speedy restoration of the Union; and believing that, in view of the important military movements now in progress, and the reduced condition of our effective forces in the field, the time has arrived for prompt and vigorous measures to be adopted by the people in support of the great interests of the country, they request that he shall call upon the several States for such numbers of men as may be required to fill up all military organizations now in the field, and add to the army such additional number of men as may be necessary to garrison and hold all of the numerous cities and military positions that have been captured by our armies, and to speedily crush the rebellion that still exists in several of the Southern States, thus practically restoring to the civilized world our great and good government.

To this appeal the President replied that he decides upon calling for 300,000 more troops, chiefly infantry; that he hopes they will be raised without delay, and that an order fixing the quota required from each State will be issued by the War Department at once.

CAPTURE OF VICKSBURG.

It is stated by the daily papers that after a bombardment Vicksburg has been captured by Com. Farragut's fleet. He ran by the batteries on Wednesday, receiving a raking fire as his boats passed, but without suffering any damage. Commodore Farragut, from below, and Captain Davis, from above, on the Mississippi River, are now in communication, and therefore the whole river, from Cairo to New Orleans, is in possession of our troops. Vicksburg was nearly destroyed by the shells from our gunboats, and it is said that General Butler is cutting a canal across the bend on which Vicksburg stands, which will change the channel of the Mississippi entirely at that point.

BRILLIANT AFFAIR AT CORINTH.

A brilliant affair has recently taken place at Booneville, below Corinth, between a party of Colonel Sheridan's Michigan cavalry and a superior body of the rebels. Colonel Sheridan, it appears, had only 728 men under his command, and although opposed to a force of 4700 rebels, succeeded in defeating the latter after a desperate fight, which lasted seven hours. The loss on our side was only forty-one killed, wounded, and missing. That of the enemy could not be ascertained, but it must have been heavy, because sixty-five dead were found upon the field. Major-General Halleck, in officially announcing this magnificent encounter, very properly recommends Colonel Sheridan for promotion.

FOREIGN NEWS.

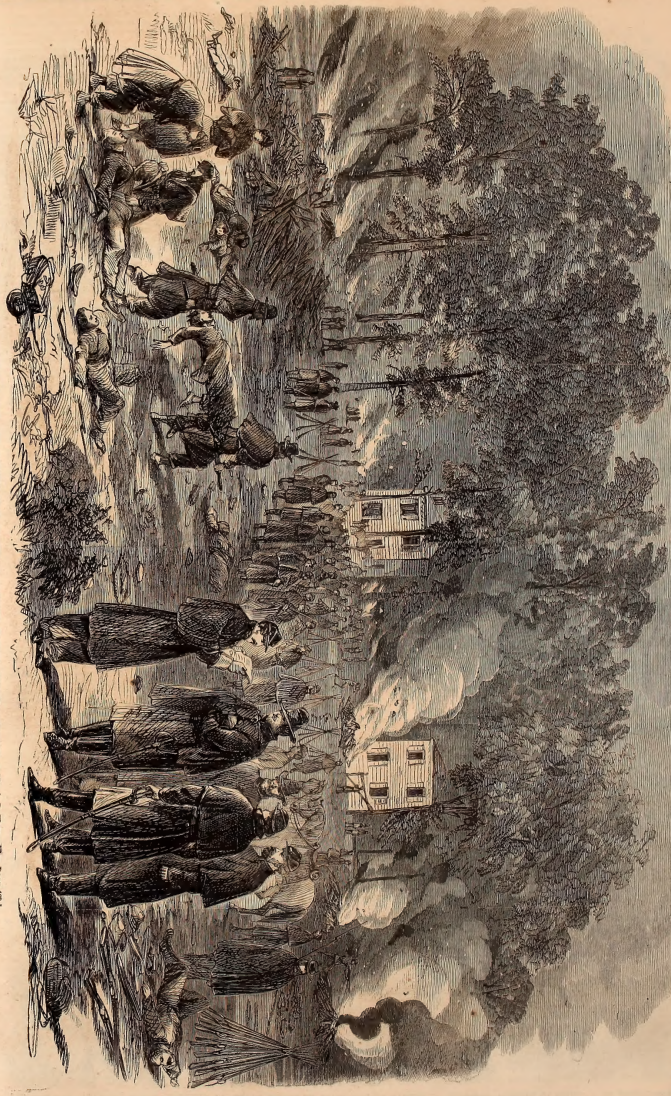
ENGLAND.

ANOTHER SECESH GROAN.

IN the British House of Commons, on the 19th of June, Mr. Lindsay, in postponing his notice on the subject of England's relations with America until Friday, 11th of July, expressed a hope that the Government in the mean time would see the necessity of recognizing the "independence" of the Confederate States, and of taking the matter out of the hands of private members, as it was "perfectly clear the Confederate States were now able to assert their independence."

FRANCE.

THE MEXICAN AFFAIR.



The Emperor of France has determined to send such an army to Mexico as will force its way to the capital against all obstacles. Admiral la Graviere is to take the command of a large concentrated naval force of France in the waters of America, the Paris Patrie saying that such a step is justified by events which "may arise out of the American war and Mexican affairs."

DEBATE IN THE CHAMBER.

In the French Chamber of Deputies M. Jules Favre censured the expedition to Mexico, and demanded an explanation of its purport. He argued that the honor of France required that she should treat with Mexico and withdraw. M. Billault, in reply, said that France had insults to avenge upon the Juarez Government. He declared that the Emperor would leave the people entirely free, when the French flag floats over the capital of Mexico, to vote for whatever government they might choose.

GENERAL FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

On page 449 we publish a portrait of Brigadier-General Fitz-John Porter, commanding a corps in the army of the Potomac, from a photograph by M'Clees, of Philadelphia.

General Porter was born in New Hampshire about the year 1824, and is consequently about thirty-eight years of age. He graduated at West Point in the 4th artillery on 1st July, 1845, and obtained promotion to a first-lieutenancy in May, 1847. He accompanied General Scott to Mexico, and for gallant and meritorious conduct at Molino del Rey was brevetted Captain. At Chapultepec he again distinguished himself, and obtained the brevet rank of Major. At the fight at the Belen Gate he was severely wounded. On the return of the army to the United States he was appointed Assistant-Instructor of Artillery at West Point, which office he filled, we believe, until the outbreak of the rebellion.

On the increase of the army, in May, 1861, Fitz-John Porter was appointed Colonel of the new 15th infantry, and, three days afterward, Brigadier-General of Volunteers. His command was in the Army of the Potomac. He rendered useful aid to General M'Clellan in reorganizing the army after the battle of Bull Run, and was soon placed in command of a division. He accompanied the army to Yorktown, and was there placed in command of the siege-works. After the evacuation of the place he was for a while Governor of Yorktown, but soon resumed his place in the advancing army. On 25th June he commanded the extreme right of our army, and bore the brunt of the terrible battles of 26th and 27th. No better or braver soldier lives than Fitz-John Porter.

BRIG.-GEN. GEORGE A. M'CALL.

GENERAL GEORGE ARCHIBALD M'CALL, whose portrait we give on page 449, is said to be wounded and a prisoner in the hands of the rebels. He was born in Pennsylvania about the year 1801, and is consequently over 60 years of age. He graduated at West Point, in the infantry, in 1822, and served many years in his regiment and likewise in the subsistence department. In the Florida war he won fame and his company under General Worth. At the outbreak of the Mexican war he served under General Taylor, and was brevetted Major for gallant conduct at Palo Alto, and Lieutenant-Colonel for the same at Resaca de la Palma. In December, 1847, he was promoted to a Majority, and in June, 1850, he became Inspector-General of the army with the rank of Colonel. On the outbreak of the rebellion he was appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and served with Patterson in his inglorious campaign on the Upper Potomac. He was subsequently transferred to the army of the Potomac, where he obtained command of a division.

At the terrible battle of the Chickahominy on the 26th ult., General M'Call's division bore the brunt of the first day's fighting and behaved like heroes. Their commander is known to have been wounded, and, as his horse has been found riderless, it is supposed that the gallant General fell into the hands of the enemy. We can not afford to spare so good a man.

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION.

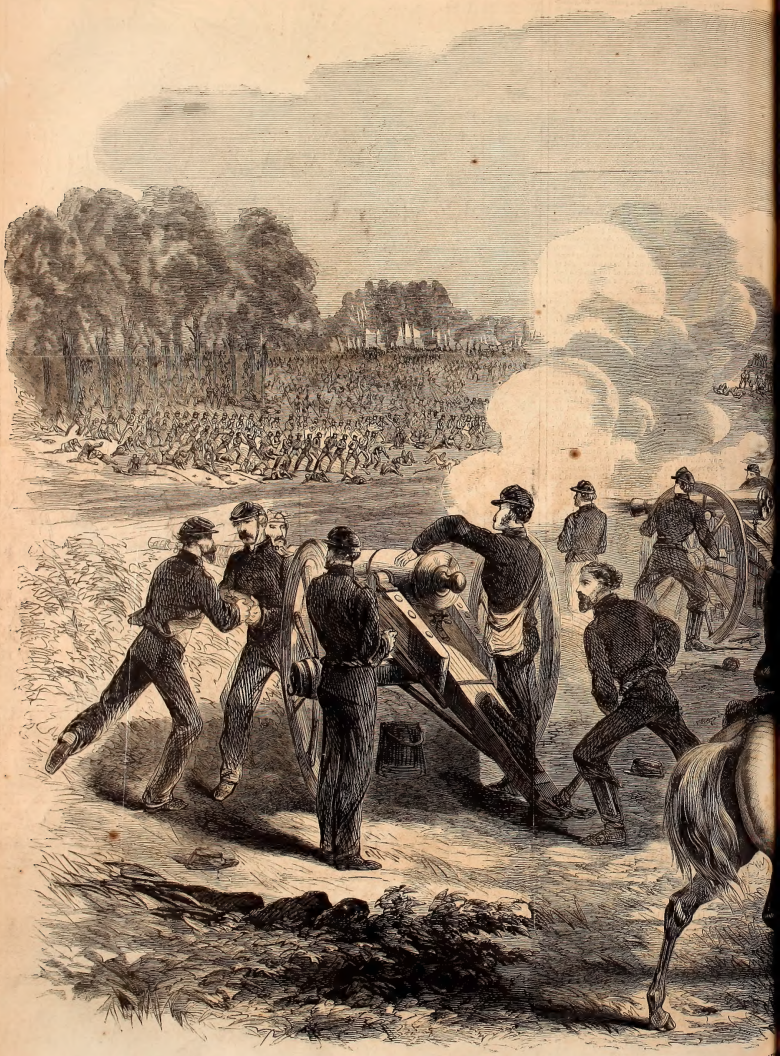
We publish on page 456 a couple of pictures from North Carolina, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. A. Wiser. One of them represents THE RECEPTION OF GOVERNOR STANLY, OF NORTH CAROLINA, AT WASHINGTON in that State. The Governor made a handsome address to the people, and was exceedingly well received.

The other picture represents the PRESENTATION OF A SWORD TO GENERAL BURNSIDE BY THE STATE OF RHODE ISLAND. We condense the following account of the affair from the Herald correspondence:

The ground selected for the presentation and grand review of this portion of the corps d'armée was situated about a mile from the railroad bridge. It is level, rather high, and large enough to permit the movements of, as I before said, upward of fifty thousand men. For some time before the arrival of the first regiment the people began to gather. Five was the hour; but at five times were few of the regiments on the spot. Shortly after, however, a sight was presented to all the lookers-on that can never be effaced from their memories. From one corner of this large field, leading from the bridge, came long lines of artillery and cavalry, while from every side came pouring in, to the strains of joyous music, regiment after regiment, who, after marching into the space, took up their positions and awaited further orders.

The appearance of the General was announced by a strain of Rhode Island, played by Captain Bidgen's band, which preceded the General and his staff immediately preceded to the centre of the field, where a sort of platform was erected on one of the eminences. The army was drawn up, forming a hollow square, or rather square with centre, in the centre of which were the staff officers of the different generals, who were also present. On the platform there were but four persons—General Burnside and Commodore Rowan to represent us, and General Maurice and aid on the part of Rhode Island. After the usual military salute, given along with the mustered thunder of the artillery, General Maurice approached General Burnside, bearing in his hands the magnificent gift.

He made a handsome speech to General Burnside, in reply to which the latter said:



In behalf of the gallant little army which surrounds you, I beg through you to thank the State of Rhode Island for this token of its appreciation of our services at the "Battle of Roanoke." Your excellent Governor has most fittingly said that the services of this army have been in this manner remembered through its commander. Without the skill, courage, patience, and fortitude of the general officers, field and staff officers, company officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of this corps d'armée, together with the full and hearty co-operation of our gallant navy in those waters, the State of Rhode Island would have been deprived the pleasure of giving, and I inherited the proud satisfaction of receiving, this elegant sword.

The ceremony took up but a short time, and at its conclusion a cheer was raised by the men that rivaled in force the roar of the cannon which had been heard during the morning by the commander of our forces. So earnest was giving vent to their feelings once, it was repeated and repeated, the woods throwing back the echo, until one would almost fancy a whole state had raised up its voice—and may be it will soon—and that, too, for the good and Union.

The General buckled on the sword, and, standing on the same place, remained there until the whole army had passed in review.

WIFE AND I.

We quarrel'd this morning, my wife and I,
We were out of temper, and scarce knew why,
Though the cause was trivial and common;
But to look in our eyes you'd have sworn that we both
Were a couple of enemies spiteful and wroth—
Not a wedded man and woman.

Wife, like a tragedy queen in a play,
Tossed her sweet little head in as lofty a way
As so little a woman was able;
She clenched her lips with a sneer and a frown,
While I, being rougher, stamped up and down,
Like a careless groom in a stable.

You'd have thought us the bitterest (seeing us then)
Of little women and little men,
You'd have laughed at our spite and passion;
And would never have dreamed that a storm like this
Would be rainbow'd to tears by that sunlight, a kiss,
Till we talked in the old fond fashion.

Yet the storm was over in less than an hour,
And was followed soon by a sunny shower,
And that again by embraces;
Yet so little the meaning was understood
That we almost felt ashamed to be good,
And wore a blush on our faces.

Then she, as a woman, much braver became,
And tried to bear the whole weight of the blame,
By her kindness herself reproving;
When, seeing her humble, and knowing her true,
I all at once became humble too,
And very contrite and loving.

But, seeing I acted an humble part,
She laughed outright with a frolic heart—
A laugh as careless as Cupid;
And the laughter wrangled along my brain
Till I almost felt in a passion again,
And became quite stubborn and stupid.

And this was the time for her arms to twine
Around this stubbornest neck of mine,
Like the arms of a maid round a lover;
And, feeling them there, with their warmth, you know,
I laughed quite a different laugh; and so
The storm (as I called it) was over.

So then we could talk with the power to please;
And though the passing of storms like these Leaves a certain fond facility
Of getting easily angry again,
Yet they free the heart and rebuke the brain,
And teach us a rough humility.

You see we love one another so well,
That we find more comfort than you can tell
In jingling our bells and corals;
In the fiercer fights of a world so drear,
We keep our spirits so close and clear
That we need such trivial quarrels.

In the great, fierce fights of the world we try
To shield one another, my wife and I,
Like brave strong man and woman;
But the trivial quarrels o' days and nights
Unshackle our souls for the great fierce fights,
And keep us lowly and human.

Clouds would grow in the quietest mind,
And make it unmeet to mix with its kind,
Were Nature less wise as a mother;
And with storms like ours there must flutter on
From the bosom the hoarded-up darkness and doubt—
The excess of our love for each other!

THE MAJOR'S DAUGHTER.

It was rather a gay scene at the judge's house, in Kurrackpore, at the beginning of the cool season, about three years ago. The rooms were brilliantly lighted, and the guests were arriving fast, so that the broad open space in the front of the house was crowded with buggies and palkis, and their swarthy attendants.

Society generally stagnates in India during the hot season. People exist as they best can—close their blinds and windows, and make it their grand object in life to keep out the scorching winds. But the hot season had passed, the rains had come and gone, and Kurrackpore society roused itself from its torpid state to an interchange of friendly meetings, which were to be inaugurated by this assembly, at the house of Mr. Grove, the judge. Every one was there; that is to say, every one who was recognized as any body at all, both civilian and military. There was an additional interest about the party, because the Major's daughter, who had just come out from England, was expected to make her first appearance there: and as young ladies were a decided novelty, there was a great amount of amusing speculation about her.

"I think I shall consign Miss Vinrace to you when she comes," Mrs. Grove said to the wife of a young civilian. "You must make her know every body: and I can trust you for finding out what she is made of," she added, laughing.

"Don't give me credit for too much penetration," rejoined Mrs. Stanley; "but I suppose she is little more than a school-girl?"

"It will be a wonder if she reaches your standard. But here she comes with the Major and his wife." And the busy, kind-hearted Mrs. Grove started up to receive them.

Major Vinrace was tall and portly, his hair was almost white, and his face beamed with kindness and good-humor. His wife looked pleasant and matronly, but rather worn with a long Indian life. Every one turned to look at Clara Vinrace, and every one looked twice. The sight of the bright young girl, fresh from England, brought a home-feeling to all their hearts. She was slight and fair, with soft brown hair, taken back simply from her face, and a bright color in her cheeks, but the eyes formed the great charm of her face, such merry, honest eyes—there was no resisting them. She was dressed in simple white muslin, with sash and trimmings of blue, and altogether formed a delightful contrast to the more gorgeous toilet of some of the elder ladies.

Miss Vinrace was soon engaged for the next quadrille, and, after dancing till she was tired, she found herself seated quietly on a couch by Mrs. Stanley, who amused her with rapid and good-humoredly satirical sketches of the different people as they passed near them.

"That stout lady is Mrs. A., who has not an idea in her head, or sufficient energy to learn Hindustanee, in order to manage her servants. That tall young officer with the yellow mustache is Lieutenant B., who is always making bad jokes. And that is Ensign C., who can not see a joke when every one else is laughing at it."

"Who is that intellectual-looking man with a tremendous beard, who is talking in so animated a manner?"

"He is my husband," said Mrs. Stanley, with a pleased smile.

"Indeed! And that noble-looking elderly man, to whom he is speaking, with the iron-gray hair, and such earnest, expressive eyes?"

"What, have you not been introduced to the Honorable Edward Neville? That is quite an oversight on the part of our good hostess. He is a splendid man. If he has a fault, he is a little too self-willed and authoritative, but that is quite pardonable with such a mind. He holds a high position under Government, and will leave us soon to settle affairs in rather a disturbed part of the district that has hardly got quieted down since the mutiny."

"Is his wife here?"

"He has been a widower for many years. His children are growing up. They are now in England finishing their education. But see, they are coming toward us."

The two gentlemen joined them, and sought an introduction to Miss Vinrace. They were soon engaged in an animated conversation, in which Mrs. Stanley took an active part, for, as she often said, there was no one so well worth talking to as Mr. Neville in the station, and conversation was certainly her forte.

Miss Vinrace was by no means a silent listener, but took her part gracefully and modestly, where she felt sure of her ground, perfectly charming the others by her playful sallies and sprightly replies. An hour slipped rapidly away, and when Major Vinrace came to look for his daughter, he was amused to see her so soon at home among her new friends.

"Well, Clara," he said, "and how do you like your first trial of Indian life?"

"I am quite delighted, papa," she replied, bidding them farewell with a pleased smile.

In short, Clara Vinrace became quite the rage at Kurrackpore, and in riding-excursions, tiffin-parties, and picnics, she and Mrs. Stanley were constant companions. Mrs. Stanley thought her the most delightful girl she had ever seen, with such sterling sense, united to such sweetness of temper and grace of manner.

Mr. Neville seemed very much of the same opinion, and finding in the society of this young girl the pleasantest relaxation from his grave duties, he became much more sociable than his wont, and, to every body's surprise, joined in all the pleasure-making excursions.

Some time after the evening spent at the judge's house, with which my story begins, Miss Vinrace was spending a few days with Mrs. Stanley. It was just after the second breakfast—for in India all who have any regard for health and enjoyment rise early, have a slight breakfast, and then take exercise in the cool morning air, and return to the ordinary meal. Mr. Stanley had left the ladies for his usual magisterial work, and they were sitting out in the veranda, reveling in letters and the new periodicals which had come in by the mail that morning. They were too much absorbed to hear approaching footsteps, and by a singular coincidence Clara was in the act of exclaiming, "Oh, Mrs. Stanley! here is a passage that would just suit Mr. Neville—I should like to watch his face when he reads it" when Mr. Neville himself stood before them. Of course Clara blushed, and looked very pretty in her momentary confusion, but she readily got out of her difficulty by saying gayly, "How very fortunate, Mr. Neville! I have no sooner expressed a wish than I find the opportunity of having it fulfilled;" to which Mr. Neville replied, "That he was only too glad to be able to gratify any wish of Miss Vinrace, and to prove her very great powers of discrimination;" and so they immediately proceeded to read and discuss the subject in hand. After half an hour had slipped away unconsciously, Mr. Neville started, looked at his watch, and turning to Mrs. Stanley, said:

"But I must not forget my errand. I came to ask you and Miss Vinrace to join in a picnic to-morrow, of my getting-up. It is a general holiday—a Hindoo festival; the courts will be closed, and we may as well make the best of the time. What do you say to a sail on the Chilka Lake?"

"Oh, it would be delightful!" cried Clara; "there is nothing I like better than a sail."

"You getting up a picnic, Mr. Neville! Well, this is wonderful!" said Mrs. Stanley, with an arch smile. "But can you really manage it?"

"Oh yes, some of us can ride, and those who prefer it may take palkis. I shall send my people on with a tent and provisions. Indeed, I will take no refusal, so don't let me see you hesitate. I am on my way now to make arrangements with Stanley."

"Thank you, Mr. Neville, you really carry all before you. I am sure we shall enjoy it beyond every thing."

Clara said she must get papa's and mamma's consent; so a messenger was immediately sent, who returned with a note from Mrs. Vinrace to the intent that she would be very glad for Clara to have the pleasure, and she would trust her dear girl to Mrs. Stanley's care.

The picnic came and went. To Clara it was like a new revelation. The gorgeous beauty of the Indian scenery, the magnificent luxuriance of vegetation, the magic painting of butterfly and bird, all heightened and enhanced by the intelligent comments and explanations of Neville and the Stanleys, made the day pass like a dream of wonder and delight. It was specially the attentions of Neville that effected the charm, for he generally found his place by her side; and contact with the fresh and energetic soul of his young companion seemed to call into play all his varied powers of mind and graces of conversation, and to clothe him with a new vigor and youth. He forgot his fifty summers, or remembered them only with a sigh, to call himself an old fool, and then to return and lose himself more deeply in the new interest that had stirred the pulses of his heart once more.

"My dear, my dear, will you step here for a moment?" cried the Major, in a perturbed voice to Mrs. Vinrace one morning: "here's a mess we are in!" He went on as soon as he found himself alone with his wife. "Would you believe it, I have had Mr. Neville here proposing for our Clara?"

"Impossible! Why he is old enough to be her father!"

"That's just where it is, my dear—it is perfectly ridiculous."

"How did you answer him?"

"Well, I told him I was quite taken by surprise, but that I could not entertain the idea for a moment. I said that I knew perfectly well that his position and that sort of thing was every way desirable, but that I considered all these advantages were quite overbalanced by the difference of age, and that I should never consider such a marriage as any thing but a sacrifice on the part of one so young as Clara. I said it was most unfortunate—that I regretted exceedingly that such a thing should ever happen, and I begged him not to say any thing to Clara, as it would only needlessly distress her. And now, my dear, have I not expressed your sentiments as well as my own?"

"Yes, quite, I think you are acting for the good of our dear child. I hope she will hear nothing of this. But what did he say?"

"He looked exceedingly cloudy and stern, and said it was quite unnecessary to caution him against speaking to Clara, as he should leave to-day for the Mofussil."

"But he was not offended with you?"

"Oh dear, no. He said he could hardly expect me to take a different view, and considered himself presumptuous to entertain the idea. I heartily wish it had never happened. I could say no to half a dozen young puppies without the slightest compunction, but such a man as this Neville—confound it!" And the Major sought consolation in a cheroot.

Morning light found Edward Neville many miles from Kurrackpore, and Clara, who was fast learning to refer every thing to his opinion—to measure every day's enjoyment by the time he had spent in her company—to find the society of other men a burden in contrast to his refined and gentlemanly attentions—when she heard of his sudden departure, without a word of farewell, felt that a cloud had fallen over her spirit which she could not shake off. Her parents guessed nothing of all this. She grew pale and listless, and they thought that the climate was already beginning to tell upon her, and trembled for her future health. Mrs. Stanley had already divined the cause, and she, too, wondered greatly at Neville's conduct.

Acting for their child's good, the Major and Mrs. Vinrace ruined her happiness by the very means they took to secure it. Had they only told her of Mr. Neville's attachment, she would, in all probability, have acquiesced quietly in their decision, living in secret on the thought of being loved by one whom she deemed so noble and wise. But, as it was, she was utterly distressed and perplexed—distressed, on the one hand, that she had been betrayed into any thing so unwomanly as to lose her affections to one who did not seek them—bitterly disappointed, on the other hand, that her hero should prove himself less worthy of the reverence she had felt. Either she had been forward, or he had been trifling, and both were equally hard to believe. Did he think of her as a mere child? Then why had he paid her such deference?—why had he shown such deep interest in all she said and did? A mere acquaintance would have called to say good-by. A friend would never have treated her so. Thus troubled and perplexed her health gave way, and though she struggled hard to maintain her usual cheerfulness, and to be all that her parents wished, still every one could perceive a change. The Major and Mrs. Vinrace, fearing that she could not stand a hot season, had already determined that she should return to England, and remain under the care of the aunt who had brought her up, and it was arranged that she should travel under the care of Mr. and Mrs. Grove, who were going home on furlough. She was spending a few days with Mrs. Stanley for the last time, as she expected to leave for Calcutta in a few weeks.

They were sitting quietly together when Mr. Stanley rushed in in an excited state:

"Frank, what is the matter?" cried his wife.

"I have had dreadful news: poor Neville has been nearly murdered in his bed."

"Horrible!" cried Mrs. Stanley, as she instinctively rushed to Clara, who looked so ghastly white that she expected to see her faint away, but she sat still and speechless as a statue.

Mr. Stanley went on.

"The worst of it is, he is quite alone, without a European near him, and there is not a moment's dependence to be placed on those dastardly natives. I propose taking our doctor immediately, and going to him myself. The matter must be inquired into without delay. The Commissioner agrees with me, and will send a military guard at once."

"I will go with you, Frank."

"Well, perhaps it will be best. I have given orders for a dawk to be laid, and we will start at once."

A *chuprassie was dispatched to the barracks, and Mrs. Vinrace came to fetch her daughter. She was shocked at the intelligence, and still more shocked at the effect it seemed to have upon Clara, and she took an opportunity of speaking to Mrs. Stanley about her. In the fullness of her heart she told her about Mr. Neville's unfortunate rejection.

"Ah, I see it all," Mrs. Stanley said. "This was the cause of his leaving so abruptly, and now he has been exposing himself to dangers, and drawing on himself the animosity of these treacherous natives. Frank is determined to sift it to the bottom, but the first thing to be thought of is his recovery;" and then she added, "for Clara's sake."

"What do you mean, Mrs. Stanley?"

"I mean that this attachment and not the climate has made Clara ill. It had gone quite too far to be cured by sending Mr. Neville away, and I mean that if he recovers, I for one will leave no stone unturned to bring them together again."

"My dear, I call all such disproportionate marriages a mere sacrifice."

"Oh! Mrs. Vinrace, would you sacrifice your daughter's health and happiness, and perhaps life, to this idea? In most cases I think you are right, but this is quite an exceptional one."

There was time for no more; a parting embrace between the friends; a whispered entreaty from Clara, "You will write and tell me," and Mrs. Vinrace took her daughter away.

The Stanleys reached D—— in about ten hours, and they found Mr. Neville still living, but in a very low state after the fearful event of the night before. All the particulars they could learn about the crime were, that Mr. Neville awaked from a swoon, as it is supposed, to find himself frightfully wounded in the head. He had just strength left to call his servants, when he again fell into an unconscious state, which lasted for some hours. The murderer had apparently come in the early morning. The wound must have been inflicted by a hatchet or a sword, and then the wretches must have left their victim for dead. The wonder is that the blow was not immediately fatal. For many days the danger appeared to be imminent, and very slender hopes of his recovery could Mrs. Stanley hold out in her first note to her friend. But by degrees, through the doctor's skill, and the constant care and attention of his friends, and the perfect stillness and quiet enforced, he appeared to rally; favorable symptoms showed themselves, and hopes of his complete restoration began to be entertained. Mr. and Mrs. Stanley remained in his place, and as soon as he was able to travel he was to proceed to Calcutta, and thence to England. Not for some time after conversation was allowed him had he ventured on the name of Vinrace; but at length, finding that Mrs. Stanley had discovered his secret, he sought her womanly sympathy and counsel. She would not, for any thing, betray Clara; yet she managed to give him some gleam of hope, and he determined, should his health be fully restored, to try again.

The last boat had put off from the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamship Vectis, bearing Major Vinrace back to the pier, and the engines had already begun to work; but though the air was sultry, and the sun was scorching, Clara would not leave the vessel's side till her straining eyes could no longer catch sight of her father's form. She stood alternately waving her handkerchief and wiping away her tears, regardless of Mrs. Grove's entreaties that she would come away into the shade. At length, as the town began to look indistinct and dim, her hand was gently taken, and a voice whose very tone thrilled through her, said:

"Miss Vinrace, I can not let you remain here any longer; you must positively come with me."

She looked up in utter astonishment, and her eyes met the deep, earnest gaze of Mr. Neville, and rested on his pale and emaciated countenance. She could hardly stammer out a word of greeting.

"Yes," he said kindly, in answer to her looks, "I am enough to frighten you; I am going to England to recruit, and then I hope I shall look something better than a skeleton. I have to thank the villains for leaving my face alone; as it is, I shall carry a scar to my grave, but it is fortunately out of sight."

He led her to Mr. and Mrs. Grove, who were delighted to find he was a fellow-voyager, and wondered what chance had brought them together. Mr. Neville explained that he had met Major Vinrace a few days before, and had had some conversation with him, and discovered to his pleasure that they were going in the vessel he had fixed upon—that he had come on board some hours earlier than they did, and had purposely kept below that he might not embarrass the moment of parting by his presence. He talked with all his old grace and animation, answering all Mr. and Mrs. Grove's inquiries about his accident and illness; about the unsuccessful efforts of "that incomparable fellow Stanley," to discover the perpetrator of the crime; and a hundred other topics of interest common to them all: and so the day wore on. Clara retired to rest that night with a lighter heart than she had known for many a day; with an undefined sense of happiness which she would not stop to analyze. She only felt that he was the same to her, and that this voyage, looked forward to with such unsupportable dreariness, would be brightened by the companionship she had feared to lose forever. She had consented to every thing that her parents proposed for her, and was willing to stay in England as long as they wished; for, with her present feelings, all places were alike to her. But she had felt acutely the parting with her parents, and with Mrs. Stanley, whom she might never see again, so changing and varied are the vicissitudes of Indian life.

They had a calm and pleasant voyage. Day after day slipped away in agreeable monotony. Mr. Neville and Clara were thrown much together. One day she was seated quietly on deck, watching the waves and the sea-birds, when he came to her, and placing himself by her side, "Miss Vinrace," he said, "you have never asked me why I left Kurrackpore so abruptly; you have never given me one reproachful word for my apparent neglect. Will you hear me patiently if I tell you all about it?"

Clara answered him with a look, and he went on: "I called on your father shortly after our excursion to the Chilka Lake, and told him—nay, Clara, do not turn away—I told him then of the depth of my attachment to you. He answered—but could I expect otherwise?—that the disparity of years between us made impossible to me the joy it would be to engage myself to think of it no more. I promised I would pursue the subject no further, for I feared that you, too, would be astonished at my presumption, and that, perhaps, after all, you looked on me more in the light of a father than a lover. I could not trust myself to see you once more, and to bid you good-by as a stranger, so I turned the arrangements for my journey and set off at once. You know what happened next. I lay between life and death through many days, and when I was saved, and I learned that love for you had become a portion part of my being. On my recovery I again determined I would make more efforts to win you. Then I learned to my great grief that your health was broken, and that your doctors were anxious to leave the country. I followed you and your father to Calcutta, and succeeded in getting on board the same ship as you, and in taking my passage in the Ferrie. He received me very cordially, came to see me on my arrival, and you gave me a patient hearing. At last he consented to my speaking to you, and told me, if I could win your love, his objections should be quite withdrawn. He gave me this for you—" and Mr. Neville drew out of his pocket-book the little piece of Chinese Gold's trembling hands. It ran thus:

MY CHILD,—Let your own heart choose. If you love him, say Yes; and God bless you.

YOUR AFFECTIONATE FATHER.

She sat looking at it some moments, and twisted and turned it in her fingers, while her color came and went. "And you love," said Mr. Neville, "as you never loved before. If you can give your happiness into my keeping, I will take it as a sacred trust. If you can not love me, say so frankly. My happiness we must at Point-de-Galle. I will stay there and wait for the next steamer, and you may rest in the assurance of my presence for the rest of the journey."

She pointed to her father's note in answer—"My heart has chosen," she murmured; and she was quiet at him through gathering tears.

So he went left behind him in Ceylon, and when six months afterward, they made the same journey together, it was as Mr. and Mrs. Edward Neville.

SANS CŒUR.

A NOTE sat shining on a tree,
Above the nest which was her home,
Caring for one infant, while she was
Went down in heaven's dome.

A wild-cat sat in the grass below,
In the air a merlin rose for his cat to climb,
But the dove was too high for the cat to climb,
And the hawk was too weak, I suppose.

A viper lolled up with diamond eyes,
And longed to be round her nest;
She could not abide such sins, she said,
As always happened there.

The hawk screamed, "She's too big for me;"
The cat said, "She's too high for cats;
So I, to fill my hungry maws,
Must munch the hides and bones of rats."

There came a man across the wood—
Oh, as beauty as the lilies that grow!
And he shot the wild dove over the nest.
"She was very good eating," said he.

A girl stood in the Hall that night,
Beside her open window-seat;
And the rest were nearly dying with sighs,
For the man stood gaily at her door.

The wild-cat stood and twirled his mustache,
The hawk left the card-room table,
And both were longing to slay off,
And only wished they were able.

And the viper came up, so mouth and lithe,
Hanging on her partner's arm—
Came to fall her, "My dove, my dear!"
And no sneer at once met her charm.

There came a man across the floor—
Oh, as beauty as human could be—
And over and over again they danced,
While the music held them high.

The hawk and the wild-cat sneered and sighed,
But the viper's remark came true,
"I never mean to care for her,
And she ought to have known it too."

The girl lies in the church-yard, dead;
The dove's fledgling finds its tree;
And he thought of both on his dying bed—
"I shot that second good agen," said he.

TOUJOURS FIDELE.

THE drawing-room was half in shadow; Vivia Bereole at the piano singing "Allan Percy" the moon shining full and softly through the trees, as though some of the Genii had hung out a huge lamp-country before his door. Vivia's voice was ringing in on the beach at the foot of the lawn with a low wash and ripple. "All sweet influences," thought Mrs. Ardway, sitting in a sort of esthetic dark-corner with which to let out the froth and foam of young Ottoman Velours's benignant attentions, and the more substantial sweets of an offer of himself and his half million to her daughter Est. And here she pondered the sofa cushions at her back, as if born in the days of Balaam it must have spoken: but that the sofa could speak and would not, was her own; on the contrary, she considered its purple velvet and embroidered stripes creditable. She was only thinking if it had been the fashion in the days of hot sitting over there in the bow-window, willfully wasting her opportunity while flirting with Phil Daryl.

Conversation was not in that dim window. Ideas were fast growing too many and too audacious, words too few and timid. Est was looking away to the water, her dark dress seeming a part of the shadow—arms and hands gleaming out white through her lace sleeves; a little tremor about the full, finely-cut lips; and the soft bliss that I have sometimes seen on a pansy leaf showing in the gray eyes, into which Phillip could never look. Without thinking of what he had somewhere read about "a clear shining after rain" not that he could look into those depths at all just now for rather than meet his eyes she had turned her head away till there was visible only the pink tip of one little ear. Suggestive tableau! Altogether a bad look-out for Ottoman Velours's slow declaration!

Came in together at that moment a breeze fresh from the roses and a voice—Grant Barcole's—

"Girls, get ready. Here is the host!"

Vivia stinted her song. Mrs. Ardway bustled up to the bow-window.

"Est," she said, "there is your 'tube.' Let me wrap it about your throat, and you must wear this cloak. I really HAVE caught cold." And she looked reproachfully at Phil, who, however, was not to be cowed—you will look after her, won't you, Mr. Velours?"

"I should do that," involuntarily answered Ottoman, with a bow.

Phil and Est flung out eye-signals of dismay. Phil in a huff home on furlough, leaves with the first gray glimmering of dawn to-morrow for his regiment. Est, very lovely enough, so many should have these circumstances into consideration?

Vivia, like the dear child that she is, came to the rescue.

"Mr. Daryle, what are you thinking of? Will you be so rude as to let me go alone? Est, save a place for me while I go for my cloak. Mr. Barcole, you are saying at the time to Phil, "Now be a good child, and don't pout, and you shall see."

Mrs. Ardway looked sweetly—that benchmarker of her subtle instinct detected influences in the moral atmosphere unfavorable to her plans; but the girls were gone, and Phil was left to sit with his faint shrieks and squalls, dainty holding up of skirts, and mysterious whisperings in the hall and cycles. Vivia would not sit by Est; that bonor she insisted on bestowing on Ottoman Velours, placing herself on the other side of Phil, who looked Est—this spite of all remonstrances; for said she, in a rapid aside to Est.

"My dear child, don't you see that I am manufacturing myself to friendship? Why not let the sacrifice be complete? I am contributing to the society of two men who are in love with somebody else. Could any thing be more unselfish? I love to keep in play the man who is my pet admiration. After that, what is the traditional honor of a nun in the nineteenth century?"

Est smiled faintly. She could only feel that Phillip was going, and a few words of farewell hurt more than death. The water broke in golden ripples about the sides of the boat, and quivered and glittered as the oars rose and fell; and every time were slipping strings of diamonds through her white fingers. Floating leaves and flowers followed the same course, caught their oars, and the girls were singing under their breath.

Vivia was singing still and her most dangerous smile.

"Mr. Velours, now is the time for our duet; don't you think so?"

And Ottoman, who was really a fine singer, fell at once into the trap, and Phil and Est, for the moment unwatched and forgotten,

Under the folds of her heavy cloak her hand was resting on Est's, which was seized, and held in a firm, warm clasp. She felt a ring slipped on her finger.

"It has a motto," said Philip, under his breath. "Toujours Fidèle." "Will you be? Are you strong enough? Dare you?"

Est answered by ever so slight a pressure of her little fingers, and Phil sighed out of light shadowy mess, tried to draw them away; and failing in that, looked up piously and met a curious smile, half fond, half disdainful, in the eyes of his host and friend her. Meanwhile Ottoman and Vivia, in every imaginable key, and combination, were singing. With eyes given in the commencement, to sleep as well as she could under the circumstances; some one else made out a sofa for Est in the drawing-room, and the rest of the company giggled, and whispered, and said "Hush!" and "Sh-sh!" and "Ah!" in various places. The water gurgled about them all gold and sparkle. Off under the shore it lay black and glassy still, bright gleams of light showing here through it as if from the windows of some submarine palace. Song after song. Then Vivia, Est and Phil Daryle was asking if she loved him; and, spite of herself, "Yes" looked out to him from the sad brown eyes.

Mrs. Ardway met them in the hall, looking as if her eyes had been through the room and knew it. Ottoman were together, he talking with a forty-stupid power, she listening graciously. Phil she thought seemed vexed and downcast, and smiled to herself as triumph as she laid a still white and dimpled hand on his arm.

"Captain Daryle, this is your last evening with us. I must have you to myself for a little while, and can't talk to one while I have two."

Phil went, with a rueful look at Est, who fidgeted and pouted at the other end of the room and smiled upon Ottoman Velours. Vivia came up, tea-cup and macaroon in hand.

"Est, please don't look cross if I borrow Mr. Velours, will you? But Lute and I have a dispute and a wager, and we want him as umpire."

By the time she had called the receding angel doubters heard him with Vivia in Sahara, but Est, with the dimples and spots and veils, as if for the advance of reinforcements. Then, for a moment, the head regiment gave back; but now word passed from mouth to mouth that ammunition was failing.

"I love we will do as they did at Bunker Hill—take stones!" cried Phil.

"Ay, ay; the—st regiment never runs!" shouted a gigantic soldier, who had fought like a lion at his side all that fearful day.

Whistled something close by their heads. Fresh reeled.

"I am struck, Phil. Kiss mother for me!"

Phil stooped to lift the bright young head to his shoulder. A shock—a sharp, stinging pain—a blinding flow of blood—and he fell beside his brother.

Perhaps it was at that very time that Est sat in the window, holding in her hand the flowers that Ottoman Velours had that morning sent her, and thinking how it would some day happen that she would yield to him a frigid, indifferent "Yes," simply to please her mother, and because she cared for nothing. The wind plowed up the moon's water in little foam-ridges, and swept with a cool rush among the leaves. The flowers rested in long, wave-like undulations, surging up like foam on the broad, black surface of the lake in the moonlight. She began to wish that it was all this beauty and fragrance that brought a new thought to Est.

Then, if Phillip had been with her, as he had dreamed, she would have endured even to the end; and suddenly she seemed to hear Phillip's voice again: "Toujours Fidèle. Will you be? Dare you?" And all at once it burst on her like a revelation that Phillip was a divine treasure, a flower, a bargain, or a matter of calculation; and springing on her feet, she spoke out as if to an actual presence: "I will be faithful, and I will be true to him and myself. I will! I will!"

Still no letter from Phil; only one from Vivia, saying that she had buried nothing. The next day the papers brought the little village news. Ottoman Velours joined her.

"Now, Miss Ardway! We have had a battle at Williamsburg."

"Ah!" in the most languid of tones, for there was no letter for her in the box.

"Yes; the—st regiment was in it."

Color flushed at once to face and cheeks.

"It behaved nobly—stood two hours under the fire of more than double their number. Never was there a more splendid; but more terribly cut up, specially the officers. I see Phil Daryle is down in the list of the killed. Why, what is the matter?" for Est was looking at him with ashy lips and eyes of horror.

"Last day! Quick! quick! for God's sake tell me!—the list of what?"

"Killed and wounded. He is—are you mad?" for Est burst from his detaining grasp like flame, and springing into her saddle, galloped home at a pace that would have made her nerve horse shy.

"Mother," she said, abruptly, as she met Mrs. Ardway in the hall; "Phil—Captain Daryle is wounded."

"Oh! is he?"

"Mother, will you order early lunch? I must catch the two o'clock train."

"For what?"

"I am going to him."

"To whom does your masculine pronoun refer? Est, you are not going to confess myself unable to understand them."

"Captain Daryle. Have him—he loves me—we are fiancé, and my place now is by his side."

Ethel seemed to hurt out these facts from her in jerks. A look and tone showing how desperately in earnest she was.

Mrs. Ardway changed color.

"Esther Ardway, you are a lunatic! I shall prevent your going, if only in pity to yourself."

"Oh, no, mother!" and she kissed the grave black with intense fire. "You mistake—you will be so good as to let me go. I give you notice before; but now, if you proceed to extremities so will I."

The tender and the passionate mood conquerors were broken up. Seeing Ottoman Velours (who had galloped after Est as soon as his astonishment would permit) coming in at the gate, she sent for him, told him passionately of Est's resolution, and desired him to interfere. The latter developed him in a new character—that of a man.

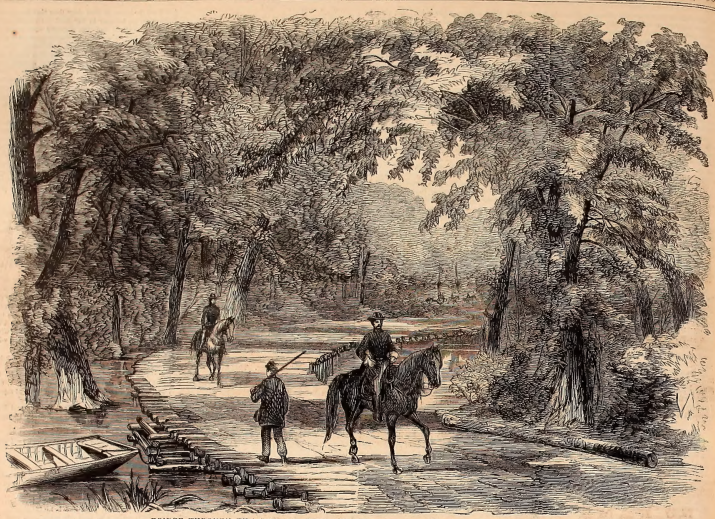
"Mrs. Ardway, I don't think the case one for interference. Est is a good fellow and behaved like a trump. I admire Miss Ardway's pluck, and if I can help her in any way I am quite at her service."

True greatness nowhere so exhibits itself as in the defeat. Mrs. Ardway wonked, and stormed and poured out her sorrows in Mrs. Grundy's ever ready ear. Mrs. Ardway did not. Cried two hours in her own room—that just to show that she was woman—came down then, screens at ever, in traveling costume, and Est looking surprised.

"My child," she said, with something like feeling, "I can not approve of your conduct, but since you see you regard it as scandal and suspicion. I will go with you."

Est-Sobered Est melted at once in tears and contrition, and had not the carriage been at the door might have ended by going back. But when it was, in process of time she dawned at Phillip's bedside, seeming first to him an incredible angel, and his remembered the depth and the fire of the nature that he had seen looking out of her clear gray eyes, and slowly began to believe in the reality. Mrs. Ardway, however, he persistently considered a creature of his delirium till she said to him,

"Phillip, my child, you must not fret with your strength, for you know we are going to take you home with us."



That convinced him. He was quite sure that even in his wildest ravings he could never have imagined that, and sunk back once more into a comfortable sigh to the full enjoyment of his happiness.

Phil's wounds are doing well. He is getting strong, and the approaching marriage are formally announced. Mrs. Ardway performs that office herself.

"Dear Est has made precisely the choice that I could have wished. Every one knows how attentive Mr. Velours has been, but I should wish for her something besides wealth. Captain Daryle is really a charming young man."

She goes about with them every where, being the benignant-maternal. It is a pretty sight; the mother—little woman—and the slender, handsome girl on either side of the lame young hero, looking up at her with the eyes of love and devotion.

Reader, look out for them; they are often to be seen in Fifth Avenue and Broadway.

CHAPTER IV.

MRS. LECOUNT returned to the parlor with the fragment of Magdalen's dress in one hand, and with Captain Wragge's letter in the other.

"Have you got rid of her?" asked Mr. Noel Vanstone. "Have you shut the door at last on Miss Garth?"

"Don't call her Miss Garth, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount, smiling contemptuously. "She is as much Miss Garth as you are. We have been favored by the performance of a clever masquerade; and if we had taken the disguise off our visitor I think we should have found under it Miss Vanstone herself. Here is a letter for you, Sir, which the postman has just left."

She put the letter on the table, within her master's reach. Mr. Noel Vanstone's amazement at the discovery just communicated to him kept his whole attention concentrated on the housekeeper's face. He never so much as looked at the letter when she placed it before him.

"Take my word for it, Sir," proceeded Mrs. Lecount, composedly taking a chair. "When your visitor gets home she will put her gray hair away in a box, and will cure that sad affliction in her eyes with warm water and a sponge. If she had painted the marks on her face as well as she painted the inflammation in her eyes, the light would have shown me nothing, and I should certainly have been deceived. But I saw the marks; I saw a young woman's skin under that dirty complexion of hers; I heard, in this room, a true voice in a passion, as well as a false voice talking with an accent—and I don't believe in one morsel of that lady's personal appearance, from top to toe. The girl herself, in my opinion, Mr. Noel—and a bold girl too."

"Why didn't you lock the door and send for the police?" asked Mr. Noel. "My father would have sent for the police. You know, as well as I do, Lecount, my father would have sent for the police?"

"Pardon me, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount; "I think your father would have waited until he had got something more for the police to do than we have got for them yet. We shall see this lady again, Sir. Perhaps she will come here next time with her own face and her own voice. I am curious to see what her own face is like; I am curious to know whether what I have heard of her voice in a passion is enough to make me recognize her voice when she is calm. I possess a little memorial of her visit of which she is not aware, and she will not escape me so easily as she thinks. If it turns out a useful memorial, you shall know what it is. If not, I will abstain from troubling you on so trifling a subject. Allow me to remind you, Sir, of the letter under your hand. You have not looked at it yet."

Mr. Noel Vanstone opened the letter. He started as his eye fell on the first lines—hesitated—and then hurriedly read it through. The paper dropped from his hand, and he sank back in his chair. Mrs. Lecount sprang to her feet with the alacrity of a young woman and picked up the letter.

"What has happened, Sir?" she asked. Her face altered as she put the question, and her large black eyes hardened fiercely in genuine astonishment and alarm.

"Send for the police!" exclaimed her master.

"Lecount, I insist on being protected. Send for the police!"

"May I read the letter, Sir?"

He feebly waved his hand. Mrs. Lecount read the letter attentively, and put it aside on the table without a word when she had done.

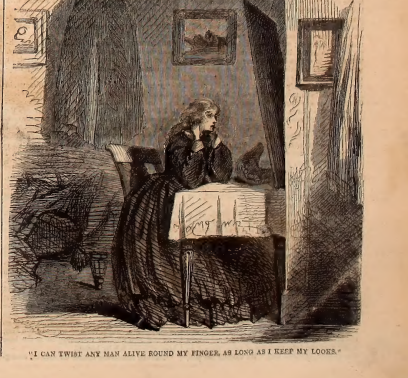
"Have you nothing to say to me?" asked Mr. Noel Vanstone, staring at his housekeeper in blank dismay. "Lecount, I'm to be robbed! The scoundrel who wrote that letter knows all about it, and won't tell me any thing unless I pay him. I'm to be robbed! Here's property on this table worth thousands of pounds—property that can never be replaced—property that all the crowned heads in Europe could not produce if they tried. Lock me in, Lecount, and send for the police!"

Instead of sending for the police Mrs. Lecount took a large green-paper fan from the chimney-piece and seated herself opposite her master.

"You are agitated, Mr. Noel," she said; "you are heated. Let me cool you."

With her face as hard as ever—with less tenderness of look and manner than most women would have shown if they had been rescuing a half-drowned fly from a milk-jug—she silently and patiently fanned him for five minutes or more. No practiced eye observing the peculiar bluish pallor of his complexion, and the marked difficulty with which he drew his breath, could have failed to perceive that the great organ of life was in this man, what the housekeeper had stated it to be, too weak for the function which it was called on to perform. The heart labored over its work as if it had been the heart of a worn-out old man.

"Are you relieved, Sir?" asked Mrs. Lecount. "Can you think a little? Can you exercise your better judgment?"



She rose and put her hand over his heart with as much mechanical attention and as little genuine interest as if she had been feeling the plates at dinner to ascertain if they were properly warmed. "Yes," she went on, seating herself again, and resuming the exercise of the fan; "you are getting better already, Mr. Noel. Don't ask me about this anonymous letter until you have thought for yourself, and have given your own opinion first." She went on with the fanning, and looked him hard in the face all the time.

"Think," she said; "think, Sir, without troubling yourself to express your thoughts. Trust to my intimate sympathy with you to read them. Yes, Mr. Noel, this letter is a paltry attempt to frighten you. What does it say? It says you are the object of a conspiracy, directed by Miss Vanstone. We know that already—the lady of the inflamed eyes has told us. We snap our fingers at the conspiracy. What does the letter say next? It says the writer has valuable information to give you, if you will pay for it. What did you call this person yourself just now, Sir?"

"I called him a scoundrel," said Mr. Noel Vanstone, recovering his self-importance, and raising himself gradually in his chair.

"I agree with you in that, Sir, as I agree in every thing else," proceeded Mrs. Lecount. "He is a scoundrel who really has this information, and who means what he says; or he is a mere piece of Miss Vanstone's, and she has caused this letter to be written for the purpose of puzzling us by another form of disguise. Whether the letter is true, or whether the letter is false—

"I CAN TWIST ANY MAN ALIVE ROUND MY FINGER, AS LONG AS I KEEP MY LOOKS."

am I not reading your own wiser thoughts now, Mr. Noel?—you know better than to put your enemies on their guard by employing the police in this matter too soon. I quite agree with you —so [illegible] yet. You will allow this anonymous man or anonymous woman to suppose you are easily frightened; you will lay a trap for the information in return for the trap laid for your money; you will answer the letter, and see what comes of the answer; and you will only pay the expense of employing the police when you know the expense is necessary. I quite agree with you again—no expense, if we can help it. In every particular, Mr. Noel, my mind and your mind in this matter are one."

"It strikes you in that light, Lecount—does it?" said Mr. Noel Vanstone. "I think so myself: I certainly think so. I won't pay the police a farthing if I can help it. Stop! I'll tell you what we'll do. We'll go up the letter again, and become fruitful pay. plexed over a second reading of it. "But the man wants money!" he broke out, impatiently.

"You seem to forget, Lecount, that the man wants money!"

"Most which you offer him, Sir," rejoined Mrs. Lecount; "but—as your thoughts have already anticipated—money which you don't give him. No! no! you say to this man, 'Hold, not your hand, Sir;' and when he has held it, you your hand, Sir;' and when he has held it, you give him a smack for his pains, and put your own hand back in your pocket. I am so glad to see you laughing, Mr. Noel; you are very near getting back your good spirits. We will answer the letter by advertisement, as the most private form of advertisement is to choose? Your poor head is trembling a little—shall I hold the pen for you? I am not in the least afraid of writing a letter dictate to hold the pen."

Without waiting for his reply she went into the back parlor and returned with pen, ink, and paper. Arranging a blotting-book on her knees, and looking a model of attentive submission, she placed herself once more in front of her master's chair.

"Shall I write from your dictation, Sir?" she inquired.

"Or shall I make a little sketch, and will you correct it afterward? I will make a little sketch. Let me see the letter. We are to advertise in the Times, and we are to address it 'An Honest Friend.' What is the date, Noel? Stay: I will write it, and then you can see for yourself. 'An Honest Friend' is requested to mention (by advertisement) an address at which a letter can reach him. The receipt of the information which he sends will be acknowledged by a reward of—' What sum of money are you with me at present, Sir?"

"Set down nothing," said Mr. Noel Vanstone, with a sudden outbreak of impatience. "No more matters are my business—I mean no matters are my business, Lecount. Leave it to me."

"Certainly, Sir," replied Mrs. Lecount, handing her master the blotting-book. "You will not forget to be liberal in offering money when you know beforehand you don't mean to pay with it?"

"Don't dictate, Lecount! I won't submit to dictation!" said Mr. Noel Vanstone, asserting his own independence more and more impatiently. "I mean to conduct this business for myself. I am master, Lecount!"

"You are master, Sir."

"My father was master before me. And I am my father's son!"

Mrs. Lecount bowed submissively.

"I mean to set down any sum of money I think right," pursued Mr. Noel Vanstone, nodding his little beaten head vehemently. "I mean to send this advertisement myself. The servant shall take it to the stationer's to be put into the Times. When I ring the bell twice send the servant. You understand, Lecount? Send the servant."

Mrs. Lecount bowed again, and walked slowly to the door. She knew to a minute when to lead her master, and when to let him go on alone. Experience had taught her to govern him in all essential things by giving way to him attorney on all points of minor detail. It was a characteristic of his weak nature—as it is of all weak natures—to assert itself obstinately on trifles. The filling in of the blank in the advertisement was the trifle in this case. Mrs. Lecount quieted her master's suspicions that she was leading him by instantly conceding it. "My mutt has kicked," she thought to herself, "in her own language, so she opened the door. "I can do no more with him to-day."

"Lecount!" cried her master, as she stepped into the passage. "Come back."

Mrs. Lecount came back.

"You're not offended with me, are you?" asked Mr. Noel Vanstone, uneasily.

"Certainly not, Sir," replied Mrs. Lecount. "As you said just now, you are master."

"Good creature! Give me your hand." He kissed her hand, and smiled in high approval of his own affectionate proceeding. "Lecount, you are a worthy creature!"

"Thank you, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount. She courtesied and went out. "If this is the way to win that monkey-head of his," she said to herself in the passage, "what a rascal he would be!"

Left by himself, Mr. Noel Vanstone sat absorbed in anxious reflection over the blank space in the advertisement. The one thing which apparently superfluous hint to him, to be liberal in offering money when he knew he had no intention of parting with it, had been founded on an intimate knowledge of his character. He had inherited his father's sordid love of money without inheriting his father's hard-headed capacity for seeing the uses to which money can be put. His one idea in connection with his wealth was the idea of keeping it. He was such an inborn miser that the bare prospect of laying out, in theory only, hundred him. He took up the pen, laid it down again, and read the anonymous letter for the third time, shaking his head over it suspiciously. "If I offer this man a large sum of money," he thought, on a sudden, "how do I know he may not find a means of making me actually pay it? Women are always in a hurry. Lecount is always in a hurry. I have got the afternoon before me—I'll take the afternoon to consider it."

He fretfully put away the blotting-book and the sheet of note-paper on which he had made which Mrs. Lecount had just left. As he returned to his own seat he shook his little head solemnly, and muttered to his dressing-gown over his knees, with the air of a man absorbed in anxious thought. His state of mind was passed away in the quarters and the half hours succeeded each other on the dial of Mrs. Lecount's watch, and still Mr. Noel Vanstone remained lost in doubt—still no summons for the servant disturbed the tranquillity of the parlor bell.

Meanwhile, after parting with Mrs. Lecount, Magdalen Vanstone cautiously made her way across the road to her lodgings, and had only ventured to return after making a circuit of the neighborhood. When she found herself once more in Vauxhall Walk, the first object which attracted her observation was an old man at the door of the lodgings. A few steps more in advance showed her the landlord's daughter standing at the door, engaged in a dispute with the driver on the subject of his fare. No sooner did the girl turn her head toward her, Magdalen instantly profited by that circumstance, and slipped unobserved into the house.

She glided up the first flight of stairs, and found herself on the first landing. Face to face with her room—in companionship. There stood Mrs. Wragge, with a pile of small parcels hugged up in her arms, anxiously waiting the issue of the dispute at the footpath in the street. To return was impossible—the sound of the angry voices below was fatal to further trespassing. To hesitate was worse than useless. But one choice was left—the choice of going on—and Magdalen instantly took it. She pushed by Mrs. Wragge without a word; ran into her own room, tore off her cloak, bonnet, and veil, and threw them down out of sight, in the blank space between the sofa-bedstead and the wall.

For the first few moments astonishment bereft Mrs. Wragge of the power of speech, and rooted her to the spot where she stood. The cool of the collection of parcels in her arms fell from them on the stairs. The sight of Miss Vanstone, she roused her. "Thieves!" cried Mrs. Wragge, suddenly struck by an idea. "Thieves!"

Magdalen slipped through the room door which she had not had time to close completely. "Is that you at work, Mrs. Wragge?" said Miss Vanstone. "What is the matter?" She snatched up a towel while she spoke, dipped it in water, and passed it over her face in her lower part of her face. At the sound of the familiar voice Mrs. Wragge turned round suddenly on her third parcel—and, forgetting it in her astonishment, ascended the second flight of stairs. Magdalen stepped on the first-floor landing, wiped the towel held over her forehead as if she was suffering from headache. She had now obtained required time for their removal, and a headache assumed for the occasion, suggested the most convenient excuse for her sudden flight in taking them as they were hidden now.

"What are you disturbing the house for?" she asked. "Pray be quiet. I am half blind with the headache."

"Any thing wrong, ma'am?" inquired the landlady from the passage.

"Nothing whatever," replied Magdalen. "My friend is timid, and the dispute with the cabman has frightened her. Pay the man what he wants, and let him go."

"Where is she?" asked Mrs. Wragge, in a tremulous whisper. "Where's the woman who tried to sell me into your service?"

"Pooh!" said Magdalen. "No woman sold me to you, as you call it. Look in and see for yourself."

She threw open the door. Mrs. Wragge walked in, discovered nobody, looked all round suspiciously, and indicated her astonishment as the result by dropping a fourth parcel and trembling helplessly from head to foot.

"I saw her go in here," said Mrs. Wragge, in awe-struck accents. "I saw her with my own eyes, and a spoke bonnet. A rude woman. She scuttled by me on the stairs—she did. Here's the room, and no woman in it. Give us a Prayer Book!" cried Mrs. Wragge, turning deadly pale, and losing another parcel. "Give us a Prayer Book!" parcels fall about her in a little cascade of commotion. "I want to read something Good. I want to think of Heaven. I want to pray to Ghost!"

"Nonsense!" said Magdalen. "You're dreaming; the shopping-has been too much for you. Go into your own room, and take your bonnet off."

"I've heard tell of ghosts in night-gowns, ghosts in shawls, and ghosts in bandages, I've creeded Mrs. Wragge, standing petrified in her own magic circle of linen-draper's parcels. Here's a ghost in a spoke bonnet. I'll see the ghost in a grey cloak and a poke bonnet. I will, that is!" repeated Mrs. Wragge, plunging into penitent tears. "It's a judgment on me for being so happy away from the captain. It's a judgment on me for having been down at best in half the shops in London, first with one shoe and then with the other, all the time I've been out. I'm a sinful creature. Don't let go of me—whatever you do, my dear, don't let go of me!" She caught Magdalen fast by the arm, and fell into another trembling fit at the bare idea of being left by herself.

The one remaining chance in such an emergency as this was to submit to circumstances. Magdalen took Mrs. Wragge to a chair, having first placed it in such a position as to enable her to turn her back on her traveling-companion while she removed the false eyebrows by the help of a little cream. "Wait a minute there," she said, "and try if you can compose yourself while I bathe my head."

"Compose myself?" repeated Mrs. Wragge. "How am I to compose myself when my head is off its hooks? I'm not myself, and never had with the Cookery-book was nothing to the Buzzing I've got now. I'm a fright, I'm a object, miserable and to a holiday! You may take me back again, my dear, whenever you like —I've had enough of it already."

Having at last succeeded in removing the eyebrows, Magdalen was free to combat the other difficulties produced on her companion's mind by every weapon of persuasion which her ingenuity could devise.

The attempt proved useless. Mrs. Wragge persisted—on every side which, it may be remarked, Magdalen could see—in the satisfied many wiser ghost-seers than herself—in believing that she had been supernaturally favored by a visitor from the world of spirits. All that Magdalen could do was to ascertain by cautious investigation that Mrs. Wragge had not been observant enough to identify the supposed ghost with the person of the old Northcote lady in the Entertainment. Having satisfied herself on this point, she had no resource but to leave the rest to the natural possibility of time and circumstances—unless those impressions were perpetually renewed—which now seemed to be among the infirmities of her companion's weak mind. After fortifying Mrs. Wragge by reiterated assurances that the supernatural visitor (according to all laws and regulations of ghosts) meant nothing unless it was immediately followed by more visitors, and then, discarding back her attention to the parcels dropped on the floor and on the stairs, and after prevailing on Mrs. Wragge to accompany her on the errand, Magdalen left the room.

What advantage had she gained to set against these drawbacks? The advantage of ascertaining that of Noel Vanstone and of Mrs. Lecount than she might have discovered in a month of days. She trusted to inquiries made for her by others. One uncertainty which had hitherto perplexed her was at an end. The scheme of which she had privately devised against Michael Vanstone—which Captain Wragge's sharp insight had penetrated from the first—was the scheme of a man that their partnership must be dissolved—was a scheme which, in the event of success, would be abandoned as hopeless in the case of Michael Vanstone's son. The father's habits of speculative enterprise, the son's timid love of money, his cheery of her meditated conspiracy had been counterpoised by the fear of its discovery which was discoverable in the ghostly sordid character of the son. Mr. Noel Vanstone was invincible through the very qualities which had rendered him in his father so open to attack.

Such were the results of this consideration, how was she to shape her future course? What new means could she discover which would lead her secretly to her aim? Was there any hope in disguise, ingenious vigilance, and Noel Vanstone's miserly distrust?

She was seated before the looking-glass, mechanically combing out her hair, while that allimportant question presented itself to her mind. The agitation of the moment had raised a feverish color in her cheeks, and had brightened the light in her large grey eyes. Under the influence of looking her best; conscious how her beauty gained by excitement after the restraint of her disguise. Her lovely light-brown hair looked thicker and softer than ever now that it had escaped from the imprisonment of the grey wig. She twisted it this way and then, with quick, dexterous hands, drew it down low on her shoulders; she threw it back from them in a heap, and turned sideways to see how it fell—to see how her large grey eyes looked in the superficial deformities of the padded cloak. After a moment she faced the looking-glass once more, threw back both hands deep in her hair, and, resting her elbows on the table, looked closer and closer at the reflection in the glass, as if she would begin to dim the glass. "I can twist any man alive round my finger," she thought, with a smile of self-reliance. "as long as I can look myself out of that commonplace wretch saw me now—" She broke off suddenly, and looked at her hair with a sudden horror of herself; she drew back from the glass, shuddering, and put her hands up to her face. "Oh, Frank!" she exclaimed, "but for you, what a wretch I might be!" Her eager fingers smoothed the hair back from her face from its hiding-place in her bosom; her lips devoured it with silent kisses. "My darling! my darling!" she cried, "as long as I live, I will be doubt into her eyes. She passionately dried her handkerchief, and rose to look once more her back on the looking-glass. "No more of myself," she thought; "no more of my mad, miserable self for to-day!"

Shrinking from all further contemplation of her next step in advance—shrinking from the fast-darkening future, with which Noel Vanstone was now associated in her inmost thoughts—she looked impatiently about the room for some homely occupation which might take her out of herself. The dinner which she had fixed down between the veil and the bed recurred to her memory. It was impossible to leave it there. Mrs. Wragge (now occupied in sorting her parcels) might weary of her employment, might come in again at a moment's notice, might go near the bed and see the gray cloak. What was to be done?

Her first thought was to put the disguise back in her trunk. But after what had happened there was danger in trusting it near to her while she and Mrs. Wragge were together under the same roof. She must find a safer place than evening, and boldly determined on sending it back to Birmingham. Her bonnet-box fitted into her trunk. She slowly packed together first the wig and cloak, and remorselessly destroyed the false eyebrows (which, by the bye, she had not yet taken off) was her own (which Wragge had been accustomed to see her in, there was no need to send the gown back. Before closing the box she hastily traced these lines on a sheet of letter-paper, which she found lying away by mistake. Please keep them for me with the rest of my luggage. I will possession until you hear from me again." Pushing the box to the top of the bonnet she directed the box to Captain Wragge, of Birmingham, left the room, stairs immediately, and sent the landlady's daughter away with it to the nearest Receiving-house. Her last difficulty disposed of in this thought, as she went back to her own room again.

Mrs. Wragge was still occupied in sorting her parcels on her narrow little bed. She turned round with a look of relief when Magdalen looked in at her. "I thought it was the ghost again," said Mrs. Wragge, "I'm glad it isn't. I'm warning, my dear, by what's happened to me, to put all my parcels straight, just as the captain likes to see them, and to go out and buy him a pair of shoes. If I close my eyes to-night—which I don't think I shall—I'll wake up in the morning as my legs will let me. And I'll start on another holiday as long as I live. I hope I may, I'm sure," said Mrs. Wragge, mournfully shaking her head. "I'm only hope I may, I'm sure."

"Forgiven!" repeated Magdalen. If other women wanted as little forgiving as you do, they'd walk about naked, and never trouble their parcels. Come! I want to see what you have been buying to day."

Mrs. Wragge hesitated, sighed pensively, considered a little, stretched out her hand unwillingly toward a parcel, and withdrew it with supernatural warning, and shrank back from her own purchases with a desperate exertion of self-control.

"Open this one," said Magdalen to encourage her. "What is in it?"

Mrs. Wragge's faded blue eyes began to brighten dimly in spite of her remorse, but she still denying herself the luxury of the immediate action of shopping might claim his own again—but the ghost was not laid yet.

"Did you get a bargain?" asked Magdalen, confidentially.

"Dirt cheap," cried poor Mrs. Wragge, with her headlong into the snare, and darting at the parcel as eagerly as if nothing had happened.

Magdalen left the gossiping over her purchases for an hour or more, and then wisely abstained to the last moment from referring to their recollections in another way by taking her out for a walk.

After they left the lodgings the door of Noel Vanstone's house opened, and the woman-servant appeared. The advertisement which had apparently charged with a letter on this occasion, which she carried carefully in her hand. Conscious of the important plan she had formed for attack or defense, Magdalen wondered, with a momentary dread, whether Mrs. Lecount had decided already on opening such communications, and whether the letter was directed to Miss Garth.

The letter bore no such address. Mr. Noel Vanstone had solved his pecuniary problem. The letter to the "Honest Friend" advertisement was filled up, and Mrs. Lecount's acknowledgment of the receipt of the communication was now in its way to insertion in the Times.

THE END OF THE THIRD SCENE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC

We devote a large portion of our space to illustrations of the Army of the Potomac, which has been the theme of the nation's talk and thoughts during the past week.

BATTLE OF GAINES'S MILLS.

On page 461 we publish an illustration of CAPTAIN DE HAHN'S BATTERY SHELLING THE REBEL ENTRANCE AT GAINES'S MILLS ON THE CHICKAHOMINY, on Friday, June 27. It will be remembered that on Thursday, 26th, General Fitz-John Porter's division was attacked at Mechanicsville, Beaver Dam Creek. There the enemy attacked him. The correspondent of the Times gives a full account of the skillful retreat of this division:

McCALL'S brigade of Pennsylvania reserves, and Reid's brigade of regulars, were ordered upon the right of the line, overlooking the valley of the Chickahominy, entrenched and near the bridges at Gaines's Mill and Woodbury's Bridge.

Reid's brigade, consisting of the Third, Fourth Twelfth, and Thirteenth United States Infantry, Dorman's battalion of regulars, and Griffin's battery, under Captain Charles K. G. Buchanan, were disposed on the left of the line of battle, and Reid's brigade was attached to the right of the line. Seymour's brigade was upon the extreme right field. Seeing the line of the enemy's approach, the reserves were placed to the right, left, and rear, on the same field and along the road. Captain WAGNER'S position of the strength of the enemy's force, which from the Coal Harbor road to our right, found an admirable position for the battery of Captain Porter in a field about forty rods to the right of his original position of which commanded a view of the whole ground, and a rising that to Cool Harbor. How he could cover a wide front and keep his troops in hand, and yet have a powerful considerable body of the rebels to the right. Porter perceived soon showed that this position was not chosen by proved during the day one of the hottest in the fight. Captain De Hart's battery was posted further to the left, and thereby confronted the rebels, when they appeared. He did not as yet precisely know, was partially revealed by the lurid smoke of artillery. Captain De Hart's battery consisted of two 3-inch rifles, under Napoleon guns, besides which there were a battery of 3-inch rifled guns, of wrought iron, belonging to the reserve. Captain Easton's battery was on his left, and Captain Dyer's further to his left.

About ten o'clock the pickets at our right were driven back from the woods along the line of the road, and shortly afterward these stationed on the Cross Roads toward the Coal Harbor road, were also driven in. The attack was evidently creeping up to the right. Simultaneously he made his appearance in a great force, fully prepared for the most desperate of battle, and in five minutes their batteries opened on our lines with shell. Captain De Hart's battery was also placed a battery in position. The fire of the two rebel batteries being at an angle of 45 degrees to our positions, the shells passed

The position of these batteries and of Sykes's command was not essentially changed during the day. They held their own under a most terrific fire, and the skill of Colonel Tidball's batteries is unquestionably due the credit of preventing the flanking of our right.

At the contest thickened, the energy of the rebel attack is constantly augmented. The fire from the side of battle swayed to the left, and finally covered the entire rolling land covering the valley. * * *

By two o'clock the woods covering the hill were thronged by the two contending armies. The enemy appeared to be massed in three lines, the first firing and falling down while that behind repeated the same movement. By one time the third line had discharged their pieces the first had loaded and were ready to load and fire again.

That the battle raged, the enemy at times giving way before the impetuous charge of our men only to rally, covering and advancing. The fiercest portion of the fight was near the brow of hills. Battalions successively were hurled forward, and the dim and noise of the contending hosts were terrific.

It was apparent that the rebels were constantly bringing up fresh troops upon their left, and that we were literally cut to their number.

SHOWERS OF CANISTER.

Reinforcements were sent for and received, but the enemy continued to outnumber our forces, and toward nightfall our wearied troops gave way and forward the Chickahominy. A scene in this retreat forms the subject of our picture on page 465 of this number. It represents GRIFFIN'S AND MARTIN'S BATTERIES POURING CANISTER INTO THE REBEL RANKS. The World correspondent says:

Griffin's and Martin's batteries did splendid service in checking the advance of the enemy, pouring canister and shell with terrible effect. Probably the greatest damage of this kind was produced by the two successive discharges of double-charged canister from the brass Napoleons of Martin's battery. The shot was fired when the hollow between two small hills. The enemy advanced from the opposite side of the hollow in a dense column, with arms at right shoulder-shift, but being able to see the battery until they reached the crest of the hill, about one hundred yards of it, when Martin opened on them, sweeping them from the field like chaff in the wind. Twice again they formed and advanced, their officers behaving gallantly; but the steady action Martin's men showed was being too terrible to withstand. The advance of the fresh troops having checked the enemy, our troops were literally on the conflict ceased, and both parties quietly lay on their arms.

The Tribune writer says:

As six o'clock the engagement assumed a determined attack on our extreme left, evidently with a design of flanking us. It was then a stiff fighting that continued from that smoke-clouded valley—not heavier than echo in the earlier part of the engagement, but more steadily and determined. I am told that some men on the other side and further up the river saw more than a dozen rebel regiments march in at that point, and, remaining only a few minutes, file out a little distance up the valley. This was met by overbearing exhausted men with fresh ones than the enemy succeeded in forcing that flank, as at present declared, only to wall. And he accomplished it in three-quarters of an hour. Our men fell back, and the enemy, others following, took their turn to be beaten.

Then they only took themselves from the poles of attack, some by guns, fortunately posted in the proper spot for such an emergency, and within had not yet made a sign, opened a terrible fire of canister at short range, and the day was ended. The bridge of Lodi was not half so terrible. Until night set in, and the Valley of the Chickahominy was canopied with sulphur, until their ammunition was exhausted—and many of them went upon the field with over 100 rounds—did these guns hold the raging enemy at bay.

A PICKET.

On page 460 we reproduce a sketch by our artist, Mr. C. R. Waud, representing A PICKET ON THE CHICKAHOMINY. The relief is approaching through the wood, and the anxious watch of the faithful picket is nearly ended. The attitude of the man is varied and yet truthful; the scene is one that is impressed itself firmly on the mind.

On the same page we give a picture of the RETREAT ACROSS THE CHICKAHOMINY, also from a sketch by Mr. Waud. He says:

BRIDGE OVER THE CHICKAHOMINY.

Our brave army is falling in the face of the enemy, but does an immense amount of work, of which the construction of bridges has formed no inconsiderable portion. This has been necessary to secure our position in the face of the enemy.

The picture presents a fair idea of the bridge—a solid work of logs, laid corduroy fashion, covered with a layer of earth, and strengthened through the otherwise impassable swamp.

On page 463 we publish a large picture, likewise from a sketch by Mr. Waud, illustrating THE PLAIN OF FAIROAKS after the battle. Mr. Waud says:

FAIROAKS.

Fairoaks is a railroad station, used principally as a depôt to supply the engines with wood, which it cut in large quantities in the swamps and woodlands of the vicinity. It takes its name from the plantation near by, which is called Fairoaks, from the group of green oak-trees which surround the twin-houses represented in the picture.

An effort has been made to change the name of the battle to Seven Pines. As no such assemblage of evergreens exists near—locusts growing on the place called Seven Pines—it is clearly as well to let the battle's name alone; and as McClellan was its sponsor, good-breeding ought to suggest this to the most limited military capacity.

HARRISON'S LANDING.

On page 461 we reproduce a sketch sent us by an attentive correspondent, representing HARRISON'S LANDING, the new base of the Army of the Potomac. The Herald correspondent thus describes the spot:

The Army of the Potomac is now massed on the left bank of the James River, on a space of two miles square, which is bounded on the south by the stream of three miles back therefrom. The point of this line is Harrison's Bar. The spot is designated as Harrison's Landing. It is 35 miles southeast of Richmond, and is not as high up the river as we had expected to find it; it is nearly twice as far by water. The plantation is the usual one, large, generally rich and fertile, the wheat being either just cut or also ready for the sickle. The river is here about a mile and down to the water's edge. The river bottom itself is a broad expanse of marsh, which is dry land only when the water near the shore exceedingly shallow. In order to afford shipping room for the fleet of vessels, long wharves piers or wharves are built, running far out into the stream.

The landing-place of the steamers is at the lower corner of the bluff which we built them and upon whose piers they now lie.

The general headquarters at Harrison's Landing is admirably situated for defense. The army, since its arrival here, has made the most of these natural advantages, and is now strongly intrenched. As all of our heavy siege guns, with the exception of one battery, are now in position, they have been saved, it will be seen at once that we are in a position to withstand a siege. It is the strongest place attempt one. But this is not expected.

The Army of the Potomac now has two smaller bases adjoining, as well as several ungun huts in the vicinity, are in active operation, and this department of our military business has been since last March, and are now efficient. Before the army commenced its active march on its new base of operations, it had built in the town of Yorktown, on the York River, a large wharf, 1,200 feet in length, around which were grouped store-houses, &c. This ground around the house are one mass of mud, and in two hours after a rain our streets would be impassable. Large sheds were covered with a thick layer of the sacred soil, which, when thronged with men gathered into them, soon ruined them. Upon these once elegant but now muddy floors were piled boxes and cartons of every size, and the clerks employed together. Two of the rooms down stairs were used for amputation, and in this department of surgery the surgeons have been busy all day. For the want of room the sick and the badly wounded soldiers are made to go outside the house, there not being room enough inside for the attendants to move around. There are a great number of steamers and sailing vessels out in the stream, ready to receive the sick and wounded, and to convey troops and men, and in a day or two they will all be removed to comfortable quarters.

Every Man his own Printer.
Portable Printing Offices,

For the use of the Army and Navy, Druggists, Merchants, and Business Men generally.

From the Pennsylvania Thirteenth, Jan. 28, 1862.

P Our circulation has increased to 1500 copies, which were worked in three and a half hours on the Cottage Press of Messrs. ADAMS PRESS CO., of New York. The work is admirably calculated for the purposes. By turning a crank, the impression is taken off, and by turning a cylinder, which gives the impression; out at the other end, and the tympan raised. We can recommend it to all. By turning the crank, the Quotation is rejected. Our paper has now reached the circulation of 2000, and the whole expense to date the printers refusing all compensation, has been as follows:

Press, Type, &c., &c.	$ 75
Paper and Ink	13 75
Sundry Expenses	4 00
A Total of only	$ 93 75

We would advise all who need a small printing establishment to address the A. P. C. on the subject.

THE NEW REBEL IRON-CLAD "RICHMOND," OR "VIRGINIA NO. 2."—FROM SKETCHES FOUND ON BOARD THE "TRAZER."—[See next Page.]

THE "VIRGINIA" No. 2.

On page 465 we publish a picture and diagrams of the Richmond, or Virginia No. 2, the new iron-clad gun-boat which the rebels are building at Richmond, Virginia. We may mention here that we published diagrams of the Merrimac some three months before her famous raid of March 9, which had they been attended to, would have saved the Congress and the Cumberland. Our artist writes

"the Richmond's Reticence, July 12, 1862.

"I send you some sketches of a new rebel ram, the plans of which were found on board a rebel pilot, who was captured a few days since by the Monticello. The specifications for this vessel also accompanied the drawings, but it was beyond my power to obtain them. We are expecting to see this monster (she is considered by rebels more than the Merrimac) out, but our officers predict for her a speedy rout or capture.

"Although we are not overanxious to see her, we will do by her as the Merrimac did by the Monitor. I am sorry that I am not able to give you a detailed description of the vessel; possibly are this some of the indefatigable newspaper reporters have obtained full particulars of her and etc. She is now lying at Richmond, and I learn that all haste is being made to fit her for service.

"Truly yours, Gun-boat."

M'CLELLAN.

Friend, in this fearful struggle for the Right,
Oh brother wrestler in our common cause!
Upholder of our ruddy-trampled laws,
God wreathe our arms in the fight!

I stretch to thee a not unworthy hand,
In that my soul is large enough to know
And feel the mighty trouble that nerve thee so
To battle for our land!

I give thee greeting through my rising tears,
I say, God-speed thee on thy venturous way!
I say, I love thee with this desperate day,
Through the thick-coming years

A voice shall utter how thy strength went forth
To nerve thine upright heart, thine honest hand,
Stanliest among the brothers of the land,
The heroes of the North!

WAYS AND MEANS.

CONGRESS may have adjourned before this paper is published, after one of the most important sessions in the history of the nation. Its control of affairs has been in hard measures. These consist, in brief, of the laws authorizing the borrowing of money in various forms; of the tax bill; and of the new tariff.

By acts passed at this session Mr. Chase is authorized to issue $100,000,000 more Treasury Notes, of which $50,000,000 are to be of denominations below $5; to negotiate at or above par $500,000,000 of six per cent. bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after five years, and absolutely redeemable at the expiration of twenty years; to receive temporary deposits to the extent of $50,000,000 at four per cent. per annum; finally, to issue to all creditors certificates of indebtedness maturing in one year from date, and bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum. These resources are in addition to those heretofore provided by Congress. Acts passed at the same session in July and August, 1861, and at the beginning of the present session, enabled Mr. Chase to negotiate $150,000,000 of 7.3 Treasury Notes, $44,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds maturing in 1881, $58,000,000 of demand notes, $500,000,000 of legal tender notes, and an uncertain amount of two-year six per cent. notes. These resources are now exhausted. If Congress should adjourn, the way and means of Government for the prosecution of the war during the recess will be somewhat as follows:

New legal tender notes,	$500,000,000
Par bonds, at or above par, nearly,	$50,000,000
Balance receivable on deposits, about,	$30,000,000
Certificates of indebtedness,	unlimited.

There is, therefore, no reason to fear that the Government will run any risk of embarrassment from want of money. If fortune favors our arms, bodies of national currency will convert their money into six per cent. bonds, new bonds fast enough to supply all the wants of Government. If we meet with reverses the new legal tender notes will suffice to pay our army and navy, and contractors can be paid in certificates of indebtedness.

All this financial structure rests upon a basis of public confidence. The negotiability of Government bonds and debt certificates, the currency of legal tender notes, and the willingness of the public to deposit money with Government at low rates of interest, all depend upon the maintenance of the public credit, and upon a general belief that the United States can and will pay the interest and principal of their debt. In order to insure the maintenance of public credit and public confidence in the financial solidity of the Government, Congress has passed a tax law, and a tariff.

The two are co-ordinate parts of one integral system; the one bearing upon citizens and their labor and their property, the other bearing upon foreigners and the articles they send here for sale.

It is impossible to analyze either within the limits of a single article. It may be said, however, comprehensively, that the Tax law levies a duty of 3 per cent. on the products of all kinds of labor in this country, and on the net profits of every description of business; while the tariff adds about 5 per cent. to the previously established duty on all products of foreign labor and industry. As the total of the tariff and addition is made was considered so high as to insure a large reduction of our import trade, it may be presumed that the new tariff will yield the number of articles imported to those only which can not be produced here. It will still, however, yield a handsome revenue. The tariff itself is a rough estimate of the amount which will probably be received for duties upon articles which are now to be imported.

Silk goods	7,000,000
Cigars	600,000	Total	$84,850,000

Here is more than enough from a few articles to pay the whole interest on the debt as it will be by July next; and as the duties are payable in gold the demand upon all the bills absorbed within a year—the Treasury Department will, after the absorption of these notes, be relieved from all pressure in maintaining at a premium on the precious metals.

Of the probable revenue to be derived from the direct tax bill it is impossible to form a reliable estimate. The men who framed the bill in Committee of Congress reckon that it will yield $120,000,000 per annum. But its practical working remains to be tested. The product of the income tax especially, which is expected to prove the most important of all the taxes, is very uncertain. No such tax is suited to a country where the vast majority of the taxpayers are engaged in mercantile pursuits, and where, in consequence, incomes are extremely fluctuating and uncertain. If, however, the Tax bill should yield the amount expected, and the tariff yields, in the aggregate, $75,000,000, as is expected by Congress, Government will have a revenue of $185,000,000 to meet an expenditure of something like $850,000,000. Under these circumstances Mr. Chase's task will be easy, and the Government secure from failure.

We have said nothing about confiscation as a financial resource. The law just passed by Congress absolutely confiscates the property of rebels. Should this bill be rigorously carried out, Government would obtain, by stripping the traitors, immense wealth. It would secure the whole cost of the war. Persons lately from Memphis and New Orleans report, for instance, that there is in the South at present not less than 5,000,000 bales of cotton. At present prices this would be worth about $160 a bale. If prices fell fifty per cent. the cotton at the South—all of which is undoubtedly the property of rebels, and liable to confiscation—would still be worth a Government sum of $400,000,000, to say nothing of sugar, tobacco, and other products.

THE LOUNGER.

THE PRACTICAL QUESTION.

Throughout this war the people have confided fully in the purpose and honesty of the President. His conviction upon the question which the war of war sprung were perfectly well known. His persuasion that there was a permanent union of all the nation until the angry discord was removed either by the final triumph of one principle or the other has never been concealed. He has declared that the solution could be and ought to be worked out by the peaceful operation of our system was equally understood. Fully aware that his conviction was not shared by a very large part of the loyal defenders of the Union, he has waited, of course, in respect to the essential question, which has been moderate and wise. He has represented the average feeling of the people.

Now as that feeling changes, we may expect a change in the opinion upon the part of the Administration. When it was the general faith that half a million of armed men could readily suppress the rebellion, while the people were not prepared, the Administration could not have expected a hearty sympathy in the measures of a people's war on a wider scope. We constantly said that we wanted to put down the insurrection at any cost; but it was evident that as long as the will of the Government estimated very correctly the real value of that assertion,

We said "at any cost," because we did not think the price was to be very high. But as events develop we begin to weigh words more carefully, and to see that "at any cost" means a great deal. And we are not afraid that it should. So far as we may rely upon significant signs, the people that a year ago supposed the war was to end soon and leave things pretty much as they were, are now clearly convinced that the war can end only after a very radical derangement of things as they were. If the war is to be ended at all, except by the surrender of the Government and the dissolution of the Union, it must be conducted on the principles of war. We must weaken the enemy and strengthen ourselves. And we must weaken him in order to weaken ourselves.

If the war could be practically ended in six months by the absolute victory of the Government, would it not be the best conceivable thing for the peace, prosperity, and perpetuity of the Union? And could not this be done if every loyal inhabitant of the country were summoned to its defense, in such a way and under such regulations as might be advisable? If there is any man who is unwilling to fight he will probably do other loyal work for the country and the Government, his loyalty is a conditional loyalty—that is, a modified treason. If such a man be the representative of the majority of citizens, the cause is not worth another life or another dollar. Before finally, by drafting, the rebel element to Commodore Dupont, has shown himself just as worthy of confidence, trusted, and cooperation of every loyal man in the land as President Lincoln, or General M'Clellan, or Governor Andrew, and if a man, however eminent, refuses to fight for a cause for which Robert Smalls is fighting, or digging, or working, there is a spirit which is not ready to save the country at any honorable cost.

But such men are not the representatives of a great class. The country is intelligently loved, and the country is in peril; consequently the people are ready to pay any price for any and all means which may speedily secure its safety. We can not but think the Administration that it shall continue faithfully to represent the public sentiment. The executive action is the visible test to the country. It is its own exhibition. Let its reflection be accurate. Let the nation see that its principle "at any cost" is the theme of the Government. Let it see that the ardent hearts, the strong hands, the cheerful tempers, the enduring frames of those who are perilling their lives to share and lighten the toils of war, are not cruelly and madly rejected. The people will then know that they are well served. Can we afford to lose any chance to save our country?

MILITARY PARTISANSHIP.

It is a profound pity for the cause of the country and good party politics that the General who is now in front of the enemy at Richmond, the citizen of the rebel State in which the heart of the war is struck, is the favorite General of all those in the country who sorrowly with the success of the conspiracy, or whose loyalty is a haggling, democratic-compelled patriotism. Mr. Fernando Wood, the Copperhead politician, and his newspaper, obviously labor to defeat the restoration of the Union by proposing the conditions upon which it should be done. In the light of dividing public sentiment, are all the most vehement and unscrupulous partisans of General M'Clellan. They endeavor to make it appear that the Government is opposed to him, in order to use his military popularity as a lever against the Administration and the war.

Two of these newspapers have lately published, under the form of letters from the camp, insinuations that the Government would not submit to the removal of M'Clellan. When now Fremont was removed in the West, they openly hoped that he would try some kind of resistance. When he was at his request relieved in the Shenandoah they insinuated, with a tremendous air of gratified malice, that no single man is of the least account in this war. Except in the interest of a party there is neither Fremont nor M'Clellan, nor any general or statesman whatever, is of the least importance in comparison with the cause. It is now unquestionable that General M'Clellan should be kept free from the contemptible sympathy of men who have nothing for him, and who would rather see the Union should be shivered into thirty-four parts than maintained upon condition of equal justice to every man.

It is essential, because at last the citizen-soldiers of this country, who are soberly engaged in the hard efforts to save it, who have been in the field for a year, and have learned the ghastly and unspeakable price of brave men for the cause, a thousand times repeated—who know and hate the savage and relentless ferocity of the enemy, to be assured that their leader, whom they personally love and respect, is not the object of party zeal, or of the support of all secret friends of the rebellion, and of all who are not willing to save the country at any cost, or who think that the flag, and the uniform, and the hard rules, are they more under his orders.

Our own faith in General M'Clellan's loyalty and ability is not in the least shaken by the recklessness applause of men whose political principles are as contemptible as their patriotism is questionable. He has had the great good sense to hold his tongue about the Tribune and Mr. Wood. But the interests of no one man are of the least importance in this war. It is for any reason whatever his presence in the Potomac army should be removed, the wise and patriotic and final success of our cause, however guiltless and able we may think him, we should most earnestly advocate that removal. We do not see how to express how his presence should become undesirable except by unsuccessful military efforts; but the open unfold of the least warmest supporters of the war. The moment the people believe that he has the least sympathy with the spirit of the party which most vehemently praise him at the expense of every body else, that moment his usefulness as a Union General is gone.

THE POSITION.

That it is necessary fully to understand and frankly to concede the ability and desperation and resources of the rebellion we have always insisted, because only upon entering upon it could success be war dangerously. But when all allowance has been made for that, there is another and quite opposite view: which is, that the insurrection is now as numerically strong as it ever can be.

By volunteering and conscription, by universal pride and terror, every available man at the South has been called to the field. If this had not been so, the army of Beauregard would not have melted away from Corinth. The rebels made their treacherous attack from Corinth because they had to. The consequence is a deeper and more stringent resolution on the part of the people of the country to root out the rebellion. If we are graver, it is not because we are more doubtful, but only because we are more determined. Certainly we thought the job easier than it proves to be, but the difficulty does not in the least affect our intention to do it.

If it be necessary to draft men it will not be because men are not willing to volunteer, but because the draft settles the question that they are really wanted. There are thousands who will not go up whenever they feel that it is necessary, and the draft will be the proof of the necessity. Moreover, there has been such an intermittent policy and cumbrous-enervating calling upon men and now stopping recruiting, that uncertainty must be removed.

When, therefore, the rebels see that their rush for Washington has failed, and that victory our army, that has awakened a sterner purpose, they must return to digging, or their resources to the best probable advantage. At any moment we may hear of a strike from them. The thing that promises most is the fight by Vicksburg. Richmond is a point of sentiment and pride, and will be defended accordingly, for that reason. But Vicksburg is dishonored if they can retain it. Everything is a complication elsewhere. Their grand purpose has been, it is, and will be, to retain the river. Being fewer in numbers than we, their point is to make those numbers most profitably; and there is nothing so profitable to them as to leave.

Our conduct, therefore, must be somewhat governed by theirs. We will not be overstrong at every point where they may advantageously strike; our forces are to be so distributed that they can be concentrated against the enemy's strongest point they may really pursue. We must gain all the knowledge that fugitives can give. We must will ingest—live upon the enemy's land—in the country lawful weapon against him.

Obviously we are more and means pour in upon our side, and the foe is at the end of his resources. In effect it is the struggle of throwing fresh and robust reserves in battle upon an exhausted army whose reserves are already engaged. Our duty is not to halt, but to push on with the greatest energy. In other words, we must not be out-generaled. For it is not numbers only, but the management of numbers that wins the victory.

One thing, however, is clear: and that is, that we are willing to learn from experience. If we do not yet know how to make war, we are perfectly willing to be taught.

CONCEALING UNPLEASANT NEWS.

In his late admirable speech in the Senate Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, hoped that the Administration would henceforth freely tell the truth to the citizen to the people, not revealing, of course, any piece of military information the enemy can use, but there seems to be a quite general impression that the War Department tried to conceal the news of the retreat from Harrison's Landing.

The first public intimation of the battles was the dispatch from Mr. Bowles to the Springfield Republican, published on Monday morning of the seventh week. He had left the Peninsula on Saturday, by the last train which left Harrison's Landing, and therefore was familiar with the events of the week at White House. The battles had been nearly a week, with varying fortune in different parts of the field. Messengers were leaving correspondents were sending off their story continuously tone during all this time. The Government did not know, M'Clellan did not know, nor the army nor the rebels, nor any body else that the Republican could any body know—the result until Saturday morning, when the news was so promptly published that M'Clellan was safely resting upon his new line.

During the week we had every kind of letter and report and surmise from the field of operations; and that the public knew substantially of the fact the Government knew there is no reason to doubt. Would it have been wise then—would it be wise now—to have distinctly and officially told the citizen M'Clellan had at the beginning of the week, and have made it known to Gen. Dix that the Government at any time to have claimed a victory or confessed a defeat? Was not the whole week confused and confusing? Is not the whole history of war like it now?

When Mr. Fessenden says that the idea of not telling the country just what the state of things is and just what is required is a delusion and fraud he tells the simple truth; but every body is told that there has been some weak concealment of recent facts, which does not at all appear.

Unquestionably the Government ought to say; what the nation is rapidly coming to perceive, that a campaign of years is before us which is to be fought barbarous in purpose and mercilessly savage in method, intrenched in the strongest and most inaccessible of natural fastnesses, defended with more than a year's life in arms, is not to be suppressed only by the concentration of every resource and the utmost power of the nation. The Government ought to say to the people, of whom will it be said hereafter, "If you will not fight to prevent it strike bravely where the foe is weakest—if you are willing to hurt him or his property, or distract his institutions, however much they strengthen him—if you have any other purpose than that he submit and that nation be saved at any cost, of all, of exterminating the rebels—the contest is already hopeless."

ANOTHER SPECTATOR.

To the list of the intelligent Englishmen who have spoken of our affairs ought to be added the name of Edward Dicey, who is the correspondent of the London Spectator, and who contributes notes of travel to Macmillan's Magazine. He has a quick perception of facts in the light in which make his observations really valuable, especially in the Border States, in which he depicts the aspect of life and the general feeling with remarkable fidelity.

Speaking of the want of striking indications of Union feeling upon the border, he hits the nail in saying: "Men may grow convinced of the folly of secession—may even wish for the victory of the Union; but their hearts must be, after all, with the side for which their kinsmen and friends are fighting.....I am anxious not to convey the impression from my description that I believe in the Southern, or, rather, the Confederate doctrine, of an innate and unconquerable aversion between the Southern and the Northern States. When once the insurrection is suppressed and order is restored, I have little doubt the Southern States will acquiesce in what is inevitable. There is no difference in race, or language, or religion, to keep the two divisions of the Union apart. Whether the difference in domestic institutions may prove an insuperable cause of disunion, I can not say. If it should so prove, the North will suppress or remove this cause before it consents to the separation of North and South. But the time for that is not yet."

This paper was written just after the battle of Pittsburg Landing, and when it was possible, or, as he says, "still on the cards," that Beauregard would defeat us at Corinth; but Mr. Dicey remarks: "It is easy enough for a spectator in the Northern States to see that the Confederates are fighting a losing fight, and that even a return of fortune to their arms would only somewhat prolong a now hopeless struggle."

This is interesting as the opinion of an intelligent and disinterested spectator at a time when the rebel prospects were much more flattering than they are now. English readers will gradually learn from such observers as Mr. Trollope and Mr. Dicey that a great nationality is not to be as easily extinguished as a tallow dip; and that millions of free, industrious, intelligent, and prosperous citizens do not mean to be politically annihilated without as desperate a resistance as coolness, intelligence, skill, and heroism know how to make.

ANTI-TAPLEY.

MR. MARK TAPLEY is not the best conceivable model either for nations or men. If a general wants to fight well, he must understand his position exactly; and if a nation would be equal to its situation, it must see what its precise situation is.

The object of the rebels is foreign recognition. They hope to hold out until Europe shall say to us, "Come! come! for fifteen months these people have maintained their independence. You have had an immense opportunity, your own time, your own preparations, the forbearance of the world, and you don't do the work. Hadn't you better make terms? At any rate we, for our parts, recognize them as a legitimate government." This is the hope of the rebellion, and if it is not fully and palpably suppressed, in a very short time this hope will be fulfilled.

Of course recognition is war. At the present moment the feeling between the countries is such, the Mexican complication is of so grave a character, the air is so electrical, that the explosion may certainly be regarded as imminent.

The arguments drawn from the want of advantage to be gained by foreign Powers, the comparison of naval force, and all the arguments of reason combined, do not count very heavily against the probability. War is not such a very reasonable and argumentative matter. The general aspects of the case are always sufficient. Nothing could be more elaborately unreasonable than our first contest with Great Britain; and to all the reasoning that could be urged against the success of foreign interference now, there would be one sufficient answer: Europe would say to us, "Haven't you your hands full enough now, and would the necessity of fighting us make you any stronger?"

Mr. Mark Tapley will probably call this a depressing view. But neither Mr. Tapley, as we said, nor the African ostrich are the best models for us at this moment. The more distinctly the Yankee sees all the circumstances of the situation, the cooler and braver he becomes.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WEIGHING.—"Husband, I hope you have no objection to my being weighed." "Certainly not, my dear; but why do you ask the question?" "Only to see, love, if you would let me have my weigh once."

We are told to have hope and trust; but what's a poor fellow to do when he can no longer get any trust?

A REQUEST.—"Good morn, Mister Grimes! I come over to see if you'd lend our dad your pickaxe, to saw off a board to make a chicken coop to put our dog in; he runs after our neighbor's cows, and then they won't come about any more, so we have to drink our coffee without cream or sugar."

The author of the following lines is destined to occupy a good position among our American poets. Who is he?

"O wunst I luved annuther gal

A country paper, speaking of the funeral of a suicide, says indignantly, "They buried the woman like a dog, with all her clothes on!"

"I say, Sambo, does you know de key to de prosperity ob de Souf?" "Key to de prosperity ob de Souf?—big words, Juno! Guess you must ab been eatin' massa's dickshunary. Golly, I ain't larned nuff to answer dat." "Well, chile, 'tis de dar-key."

The following epitaph was written on reading of the death of a lady whose name was Stone:

"Curious enough, we all must say,
That what was Stone should now be clay;
Most curious still, to own we must,
That what was Stone will soon be dust."

A MILE OF CHILDREN.—There is a farmer in Berkshire who has a mile of children. His name is Furlong, and he has four boys and four girls. Eight furlongs always make a mile.

A PERFECT CURE.—An amorous swain, who had been severely afflicted with palpitation of the heart, says he found instant relief by the application of another palpitating heart. Another triumph of homeopathy. "Like cures like."

AN ADVANTAGE.—A boy and girl of tender years were disputing as to what their mothers could do. Getting impatient, the little damsel blurted out, by way of a climax and a clencher, "Well, there is one thing that my mother can do that yours can't—my mother can take every one of her teeth out at once!"

Mrs. Partington says she may be old now, but she has seen the day when she was as young as ever she was.

Theodore Hook met a friend just after leaving the King's Bench Prison, who said to him that he was getting fat. "Yes," replied Hook, "I was enlarged to-day."

THE RETORT COURTEOUS.

SHOPMAN (thinking to have a joke upon the lady). "You want a very long and a very stout pair, I presume."

LADY (not appearing to see the point). "I want them very stout, of course; and as for their length, a size smaller than your ears, I think, will just suit."

Why is a sawyer like a lawyer?—Because whichever way he goes down comes the dust.

Almost every young lady is public-spirited enough to be willing to have her father's house used as a court-house.

It is difficult to keep one's temper in a hot day; but getting under a shady tree is the best way of taking umbrage.

It is well for a man to get the start in a race, but bad for a ship's plank to start in a storm.

"It's all over with us!" as the passenger said when the coach upset.

Every man knows best when he plays the knave; but his neighbors know best when he plays the fool.

"YOU HAVE YOUR CHOICE."—A steamer burst her boiler a few years since, and a gentleman found, on reaching the ground, that an iron bar six feet long had gone in at his stomach and projected from his back. A surgeon informed him that if the bar remained it would cause mortification, and if it was removed it would cause him to bleed to death. "Science has its limits," remarked the doctor, "and you have your choice."

One of the neatest replies we ever heard of was that of a certain Earl Marshal, who, being found fault with by his Sovereign for some misarrangement of a coronation, said, "Please your Majesty, I will try and do better next time."

"That is the end of my tale," as the tadpole said when he turned into a bull-frog.

"How is the market, neighbor?" "Very quiet." "Any thing doing in cheese?" "Not a mite."

An Irish auctioneer, puffing off a pair of jet ear-rings to a very respectable company of ladies, said that they were "just the sort of articles he himself would purchase for his wife were she a widow."

Muggins was passing down Fleet Street one day with a friend, when he observed a poor dog, that had been killed, lying in the gutter. Muggins paused, and gazed intently at the defunct animal, and at last said,

"Here is another shipwreck."
"Shipwreck! where?"
"There's a bark that's lost forever."
His companion growled and they passed on.

A newly-married gentleman and lady, riding in a chaise, were unfortunately overturned. A person coming to their assistance observed it was a very shocking sight. "Very shocking, indeed," replied the gentleman, "to see a new-married couple fall out so soon."

ANOTHER BULL.—"How odd it is," said Pat, as he trudged along on foot one hot, sultry day, "that a man never meets a team going the same way he is!"

The sensitive actor, who couldn't stay in the same room with a tea-urn on account of its hissing, has just been killed by a burst of applause.

The best dowry to advance the marriage of a young lady is to have in her countenance mildness, in her speech wisdom, and in her behavior modesty.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

When is a blind man like a wig?
When he is curled (cur-led).

Why are young ladies' affections always doubtful?
Because they are only mis-givings.

Why is a mile-stone a very unsociable fellow?
Because you never see two together.

My whole is a noun of plural number,
Devoid of ease and peaceful slumber;
But add to it the letter S,
And, wondrous metamorphosis!
Plural is plural now no more,
And sweet what bitter was before.

Cares—caress.

Keep me clean, and I am like every body; scratch me on the back, and I am like nobody?
A looking-glass.

Why are beggars like fishermen and shepherds?
Because they live by hook and by crook.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Tuesday, July 8, in the Senate, the Confiscation bill, as returned from the House, was taken up. Senator Sherman moved that the Senate recede from its amendment and agree to the House bill. This was negatived—14 against 23. Senator Clark, of New Hampshire, moved for a committee of conference on the disagreeing amendment, which was carried by a vote of 28 against 10. The resolution for the expulsion of Senator Simmons, of Rhode Island, for receiving sums of money for procuring Government contracts was laid over, and the Tariff bill was taken up, the amendments adopted, and the bill passed. A bill was introduced amending the act of 1795 relative to calling out the militia for suppressing invasion. A bill amendatory of the act prohibiting the African slave-trade was introduced. The consideration of the bill to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the navy was then resumed. Several amendments were adopted, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the bill providing for the discharge of State prisoners and others was passed. The bill defining the pay and emoluments of army officers, etc., and the Civil Appropriation bill, were also passed. A Committee of Conference on the Confiscation bill was ordered, and the House adjourned.

On Wednesday, July 9, in the Senate, bills relative to the grade of naval officers; authorizing the President to make arrangements with foreign governments, and especially with Denmark, for the colonization of captured Africans; and making appropriations for sundry civil expenses, were passed. The Naval Appropriation bill was also passed. A bill to declare another punishment for the crime of treason was introduced and referred to the Judiciary Committee. The bill amendatory of the act of 1795, calling out the militia, etc., was then taken up. Senator Grimes offered an amendment providing for the employment of negroes in the military service; and Senator King moved to amend the amendment so as to authorize the employment of blacks in constructing intrenchments, or other camp service or labor, and declaring forever free the mother, wife, and children of negroes so employed. The scheme, in fact, comprehends the enrollment of the blacks in the military service, and the general emancipation of slaves. An interesting debate ensued, in which Senators Sherman, Fessenden, Wilson, and Rice advocated the policy of arming the blacks, but without taking action on the amendments, the Senate went into executive session and subsequently adjourned.——In the House, the Tariff and Pension bills were referred to conference committees. The bill to promote the efficacy of the Engineers' corps, and the Ordnance and Quarter-master's Departments, was passed; also the Naval Appropriation bill; the bill supplementary to the act abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, and the Post-Route bill. The Senate resolution requiring the weekly publication of lists of all Government contracts, and the names of the persons interested in them, was adopted. The House then adjourned.

On Thursday, July 10, in the Senate, a communication was received from the War Department, transmitting copies of all instructions to the generals of the army relative to freeing the slaves of the rebels. The House resolution authorizing supplies of clothing to be furnished to sick and wounded soldiers was passed; also the bill relative to the stolen Indian Trust bonds. Senator Saulsbury offered a resolution inquiring for the number of troops under General Fremont and General Banks at the date of General M'Clellan's departure for the Peninsula; also the number of troops in and around Washington, also the number of troops between Washington and the Rappahannock; and also the number of troops actually in service under General M'Clellan in the recent engagements before Richmond. A long and interesting discussion on the conduct of the campaign on the Peninsula ensued, and finally the resolution was adopted. The bill relative to calling out the militia, with the amendments authorizing the arming of the blacks, their employment on intrenchments, etc., and freeing the wife, mother, and children of negroes so employed, was then called up. A motion to postpone indefinitely was disagreed to by a vote of 9 against 27. An amendment that loyal persons shall be compensated for loss of service of slaves taken under the bill was agreed to. The section authorizing the President to receive negroes into the military service was then passed. On taking the question on the section giving freedom to the mother, wife, and children of negroes so employed by the Government there was no quorum, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Senate joint resolution to suspend all payments under the act of March last, "To secure to the officers and men actually employed in the Western or Missouri Department, their pay, bounty, and pensions," and to appoint three Commissioners to investigate and examine all claims and report on the same to the Secretary of War, was adopted. A joint resolution providing medals of honor for soldiers who may distinguish themselves was also adopted. The Senate bill for the better government of the navy, and the resolution of thanks to Commodore Foote was agreed to, and the House adjourned.

On Friday, July 11, in the Senate, the General Pension bill and several unimportant bills were passed, and the remainder of the session was occupied in debate on the amendment to the Militia bill, authorizing the employment of negroes in the military service, and freeing the mothers, wives, and children of those so employed; but no vote was taken on the subject.——In the House, the bill to prevent officials from receiving pay for procuring contracts was passed. The Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill providing for a national currency, secured by United States stock, and for the circulation and redemption thereof. It was recommitted and ordered to be printed. The Conference Committee on the Confiscation bill made a report, combining some of the main points of both the Senate and House bills on that subject, which was accepted. The Tariff bill passed both Houses of Congress.

On Saturday, July 12, in the Senate, the report of the Conference Committee on the Confiscation bill was agreed to by a vote of twenty-seven against thirteen. The bill has thus passed both Houses of Congress. The resolution requesting the President to have a statement of the trade and commerce of the Pacific States prepared was adopted. A resolution reported by the Finance Committee, fixing the time for final adjournment of Congress on Wednesday next, was adopted. An executive session was held, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Committee of Ways and Means reported their last appropriation, being for miscellaneous objects, but it was laid on the table by a majority of ten. Several other subjects were acted on, none of them, however, of general importance, and the House adjourned.

On Monday, July 14, in the Senate, the resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore A. H. Foote for his gallant services in the West, was adopted. The bill for the admission of West Virginia into the Union was passed by a vote of twenty-three to seventeen. The bill provides that all slaves born within the limits of the State after the 4th of July next shall be free; all slaves who at that time are under ten years of age shall be free when they are twenty-one; and all over ten and under twenty-one, shall be free when they are twenty-five. A message was received from the President, transmitting the draft of a bill for compensating any State which may abolish slavery. We give it below. The bill to prevent Congressmen and Government officers receiving consideration for procuring contracts was passed. An executive session was held, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a bill making sundry appropriations for civil expenditures was reported and passed. The Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill imposing an additional tax of one cent per pound on domestic sugar under the internal tax law. A proviso was added that the tax should not apply to sugar manufactured from sorghum, and the bill was then passed.

AN EMANCIPATION BILL.

The following Message from the President was delivered to Congress on Monday:

FELLOW-CITIZENS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

Herewith is the draft of the bill to compensate any State which may abolish slavery within its limits, the passage of which, substantially as presented, I respectfully and earnestly recommend. ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any State shall have lawfully abolished slavery within and throughout such State, either immediately or gradually, it shall be the duty of the President, assisted by the Secretary of the Treasury, to prepare and deliver to each State an amount of six per cent. interest-bearing bonds of the United States, equal to the aggregate value at —— dollars per head of all the slaves within such State, as reported by the census of one thousand eight hundred and sixty; the whole amount for any one State to be delivered at once, if the abolishment be immediate, or in equal annual installments if it be gradual, interest to begin running on each bond at the time of delivery, and not before.

And be it further enacted, That if any State having so received any such bonds shall at any time afterward by law reintroduce or tolerate slavery within its limits, contrary to the act of abolishment upon which such bonds shall have been received, said bonds so received by said State shall at once be null and void in whosesoever hands they may be, and such State shall refund to the United States all interest which may have been paid on such bonds.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

Dispatches from Fortress Monroe announce the fact that the rebels have disappeared from before the Army of the Potomac, none of them being within miles of our position. A brief telegram from General M'Clellan, received in Philadelphia on Friday, stated that the enemy had retreated. An explanation of this movement of the rebel forces will probably be found in the fact that, from lack of transportation, they have been forced to fall back nearer Richmond, their base of supplies.

THE PRESIDENT ON THE PENINSULA.

The President has taken a trip to the peninsula to see the position of the army for himself. He had an interview with General Burnside at Fortress Monroe on Tuesday, 8th, and then proceeded up the James River to visit General M'Clellan.

He reviewed the entire line, in company with General M'Clellan and his Staff, and was every where received with the greatest enthusiasm by the troops, who mingled their cheers with the salvos of artillery with which he was greeted. Subsequent to the review, he returned to the steamer on which he went up the James, accompanied by General M'Clellan, and after an hour's consultation, quietly took his departure.

During his visit he made a speech to the serried masses of armed men who had just come out of seven days' terrific combat. Dismounting from his horse and mounting upon a rail fence he addressed the army in these words: "Be of good cheer; all is well. The country owes you an inextinguishable debt for your services. I am under immeasurable obligations to you. You have, like heroes, endured, and fought, and conquered. Yes, I say conquered; for though apparently checked once, you conquered afterward and secured the position of your choice. You shall be strengthened and rewarded. God bless you all!"

THE SOUTHERN ACCOUNT OF THE LATE BATTLES.

The Southern account of the late battles, during the withdrawal of General M'Clellan's army to the James River, is given in the Richmond papers. The enemy admit the strength of our army's new position, which they designate as the strongest on the peninsula, and, indeed, demonstrate the fact by furnishing the geographical and topographical features of the location. The general tone of the rebel journals indicates dissatisfaction with the result of the movement, and by no means shows that it is regarded in the light of a success for the rebel arms.

GENERAL POPE'S ADDRESS TO HIS ARMY.

The following has been issued.

WASHINGTON, July ., 1862.

TO THE OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS OF THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA:

By special assignment of the President of the United States I have assumed command of this army.

I have spent two weeks in learning your whereabouts, your condition, and your wants; in preparing you for active operations, and in placing you in positions from which you can act promptly and to the purpose.

I have come to you from the West, where we have always seen the backs of our enemies, from an army whose business it has been to seek the adversary, and to beat him when found, whose policy has been attack, and not defense.

In but one instance has the enemy been able to place our Western armies in a defensive attitude.

I presume that I have been called here to pursue the same system, and to lead you against the enemy.

It is my purpose to do so, and that speedily.

I am sure you long for an opportunity to win the distinction you are capable of achieving. That opportunity I shall endeavor to give you.

Meantime, I desire you to dismiss from your minds certain phrases which I am sorry to find much in vogue among you.

I hear constantly of taking strong positions and holding them—of lines of retreat and of bases of supplies. Let us discard such ideas.

The strongest position a soldier should desire to occupy is one from which he can most easily advance against the enemy.

Let us study the probable lines of retreat of our opponents, and leave our own to take care of themselves.

Let us look before, and not behind.

Success and glory are in the advance.

Disaster and shame lurk in the rear.

Let us act on this understanding, and it is safe to predict that your banners shall be inscribed with many a glorious deed, and that your names will be dear to your countrymen forever.

JOHN POPE, Major-General Commanding.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF VICKSBURG.

The bombardment of Vicksburg still continued at last accounts received from Memphis. Our mortars from above and below are shelling the city. The cutting of the canal by negroes, which is destined to make Vicksburg an inland and insignificant town, is progressing rapidly. The report that Commodore Farragut has been wounded is not officially confirmed; but it is said that he had a narrow escape.

REBEL RAID ON MURFREESBORO.

According to rumors prevalent in Nashville on Saturday, and since confirmed, a force of rebel cavalry, under Colonel Forrest, assaulted the town of Murfreesboro, capturing the Ninth Michigan regiment, Colonel Parkhurst, and making prisoners also of General Crittenden, of Indiana, General Duffield, and several other officers. The Third Minnesota, Colonel Leslie, and Hewitt's First Kentucky battery made a gallant resistance. Their bravery is beyond praise. They saved the railroad track and bridges, losing but few men. The rebels destroyed the railroad dépôt and other property, including the telegraph office. The town was being shelled by Hewitt's battery at the last report—three o'clock P.M. on 12th.

REPORTED CAPTURE OF BATON ROUGE.

The capture of Baton Rouge by the rebels under General Van Dorn is reported in the Richmond papers received by dispatches from Mobile. The Mississippian states that General Butler visited Baton Rouge on Saturday, the 5th inst.

AFFAIRS AT NEW ORLEANS.

General Butler has suspended the functions of the City Councils of New Orleans, and has appointed bureaus of Finance and of Streets and Landings, consisting of three persons each, among whom the duties of the Councils are divided. This action has been rendered necessary in consequence of the refusal of the city authorities to take the oath of allegiance, in accordance with General Butler's orders. The moneyed classes in the city are still very backward in owning allegiance to the National Government, but there is a much better feeling among the working classes. Provisions, vegetables, and fruit are freely allowed to come to the city, and the condition of the poorer classes is much improved. Cotton plants of the new crop are beginning to make their appearance.

TREASON PUNISHED IN MEMPHIS.

The Memphis Avalanche having published an incendiary and treasonable article headed "Mischief-makers," on the 1st of July, General Grant ordered that paper to be suspended. The order was subsequently countermanded on the withdrawal of the editor who wrote the article from the Avalanche establishment.

A SLANDER EXPLODED.

A correspondence from General M'Clellan to the War Department, concerning the occupation of General Lee's residence at White House and the several slanderous stories thereto attached, has been presented to Congress, and the whole affair is reduced to a very miserable and contemptible compass. General M'Clellan in his letter says, that "those who have originated the false statements concerning the White House, yard, and spring, are in fact, as stated in my dispatch of the 7th instant, enemies of this army and the cause in which it is fighting. They have imposed upon the Surgeon-General, and caused him to make official representations which on examination, prove to be unfounded in fact, and which are disrespectful to his superior officer. They have unnecessarily occupied the attention of the Secretary of War, and have interrupted the Commander and the Medical Director of this army in the midst of the most arduous duties."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MEDIATION AGAIN.

OUR affairs have again been discussed in both Houses of the British Parliament. Lord Palmerston, speaking in the Lower House, said that he could see no reason at the present time for offers of mediation in our affairs, but that the Government would gladly take advantage of any favorable opening that might occur for friendly interference. Lord Brougham had a few words to say in the Upper House, explanatory of a former speech, to the effect that he wished to remonstrate with the Americans "as fellow-Christians" with the noble lord on the course of the civil war, which he thought would prove of a fatal character to the whole American people.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL TRUMAN SEYMOUR.

IT gives us real pleasure to publish, on page 468, a portrait of our old and valued correspondent General Truman Seymour, whose sketches are familiar to the readers of this journal, and whose distinguished gallantry at the battles before Richmond have attracted such universal admiration.

General Seymour was born at Albany, New York, about the year 1827, and entered West Point in 1842, graduating in 1846. He went to Mexico to join the army under General Scott, and had the battle of Cerro Gordo won the brevet rank of First Lieutenant. At the attack on Contreras he and Lieutenant (now General) Brannan led on the van of the attacking army. At the close of the war Lieutenant Seymour spent some years on the topographical drawing: we can testify that he was admirably qualified for the post. After a brief campaign against Billy Bowlegs in Florida, he assumed the dull routine of garrison duty, and, at the outbreak of the rebellion, found himself with Major Anderson at Fort Sumter. He was one of the most heroic and gallant of that brave little garrison, and came out of the fort in very bad health in consequence of his sufferings. He was soon afterward brevetted Major, and appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers. In the late fights before Richmond he commanded a brigade in McCall's Division, consisting of four regiments of the Pennsylvania Reserves, and won imperishable glory. We are permitted to make the following extracts from private letters from this gallant friend:

BELOW RICHMOND, Night of July 1, 1862.

MY DEAR ——: You will be glad to get even this line from me, though you know how very busy I am. I am on the James River, and a gun-boat can carry a mail. The evening is clear, and the sunset scene of the battle yesterday has just ceased, in pursuit of a flying foe, and after a magnificent battle scene. The fighting was terrible now, although it seemed so last night. We have had the hottest kind of work, and I have escaped to the fourth battle. All of my staff have been killed or wounded except Lieutenant Ayres. At Mechanicsville, on our right flank, our troops were driven back with such a cry for help to me, and when compelled to withdraw, did so in such a manner as to have afforded the high-priced "Chivalry" a chance to set myself can claim all the glory of the fight, for so almost unanimous. I had three horses shot under me on Friday, in the afternoon (the battle of Gaines'ville was fought—18,000 against nearly 30,000, as they number). Colonel Reynolds present, etc. My escapes were wonderful. At one time I had command of about fifteen men, all five regiments into the heavy fight besides my own brigade, and as those two days I fed four hundred men, or my command. Well, two days afterward yesterday, while fold, lay on my edge in the ditch back on the road, and I had a great fight along the whole line, where we hardly held our own. Night came on, and I was ordered to the rear to rest my horse. My staff had been all killed or broken. By the mercy of God alone have I escaped—many others were killed. I was ordered to rest—had been killed. Meade was wounded and McCall either killed or captured. The division was cut to pieces. Our regiment of 800 men has lost all but 50; and it is reduced now from 1600 to about 1000 men, of which 400 are in command.

Well, we can not go to Richmond just now—the rebels have been much too strong for us. The skill with which, has his movements have been made will be celebrated in the world for ages, and must place McClellan very high as a soldier man.

All the while we have had nothing to eat but hard bread and salt pork; we destroyed nothing, and left nothing; we carried nothing but our satchels in our pockets, and I have had no change of clothing since I left my regt, which I crossed with only my sword and pistols, and with every thing seeming to promise well if the country will only support us. I shall sleep soundly to-night, and up and be ready for a fight to-morrow.

HEADQUARTERS, July 5, 1862—4 a.m.

Arrived this morning early at Robinson's Landing, marching 11 miles, and fighting 4½, starting at 11 p.m. It is raised all day—the ground is very soft; in the field, a pleasanton, the whole army is accumulating. We have a full of transports; troops are arriving—a few days rest we have a small start again to Richmond." After being very sad hungry all day I fed that they may surgeon have come up and than my night's rest. A serious, if they may does not attack, as he should do if he means to annihilate us. But what can McClellan do more for us? I think I shall be able to do my duty at least as well as I have done. To-day I have eaten nothing but wheat flour and salt, and we were under fire watching and care, and you will see that we have been fighting. Nothing to eat—nothing to sleep. Nothing to do but to meet the enemy. Good-by, my Fort Sumter trials included. May God bless our men, and give us yet such strength as to-day—and we are sure to fall of heart, and only asks a fair field and that God will be with us.

GENERAL BUTTERFIELD.

IN the dark days of April, 1861, when the capital was in danger and the existence of the Government doubtful, one of the earliest of the calls to hasten to Washington with a tender of his services was DANIEL BUTTERFIELD, commanding the Twelfth Regiment New York Militia, whose country that we give on page 465. He found an attack momentarily expected, and an organization of officers and citizens hastily formed, known as the Clay Guard, for the protection of the city from the bombarding and hand-grenade attacks then presented for its "subjugation" by "Wise the Writer." Colonel Butterfield, enrolled himself at once, and many senators, judges, lawyers, and other prominent citizens who served as privates in the ranks of the Clay Guard for the memorable nights of the 17th and 18th of April will remember him in the young, orderly-sergeant who drilled them, and watch his career with additional interest as a commander on a larger field. While engaged in this sacred duty Colonel Butterfield had obtained the permission of the Secretary of War to reorganize, fill up, and report his regiment at Washington on the 20th, prepared for duty. With this end in view Colonel Butterfield made his way through Baltimore, set with the gore of fraternal citizens shed by "the gentlemen" turned "scouts" in its mad frenzy, and overtaken bridges and torn up tracks arrived in New York on Thursday night of the 20th, filled up his regiment (like most of our militia organizations, then merely a skeleton) from some 250 to 1000 men, and left with them on Sunday afternoon in the Baltic, bound for Washington, by the way of Fortress Monroe, looking to a passage up the Potomac and then, by information there obtained, to Annapolis. Assigned to the army corps of Patterson, the Twelfth saw their hopes of active service disappear in dreary marches and countermarches over the "sacred soil," while Bull Run was being fought and the vanity of the South in arms' supplied with material for taunting. In Patterson's division General Butterfield (then Lieutenant-Colonel of the Twelfth United States Infantry by a recent appointment) commanded a brigade, and sought for permission to lead it into action. Soon afterward he received the full appointment of Brigadier in an unsolicited and gratifying manner. During the autumn and winter General Butterfield was profitably occupied in drilling and disciplining his brigade and converting them into those "solid and invincible columns" which marched into the South.

In the movement before Yorktown General Fitz John Porter's command was always prominently engaged, and generally in the advance. Butterfield's brigade, composed of the regiments of Colonel Bethel and Harold's Mill, and was with Porter when he made his first approaches and attack on Yorktown, and on the night of the capture of the brigade repulsed a sortie of the enemy, receiving high encomiums from General Porter for the intrepidity of the line of Hanover on the first sound of firing General Butterfield left his sick bed for the saddle, and on receiving the order to advance at once led his brigade forward in two lines: Lansing's Seventeenth New York and the gallant Eighty-third Pennsylvania in the first, and Weeks's Twelfth New York and Stockton's Sixteenth Michigan in the second, these last in double column in the rear. The enemy, after a heavy firing in the front that he was wanted, Butterfield pushed on to the slashed timber, where skirmishers thrown out they dashed through the woods, halting on its edge for a moment only to form their line and remember the enemy, and then pushed forward into the wheat-field adjoining the splendid line that he was every moment expecting. Here the Seventeenth New York captured one of the enemy's guns, a brass 12-pounder. Pushing on in the same order the regiments came on to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and Hanover Court-house, which, from the position of the main activity since its strokes were brought from Hudson in 1755. At the Court-house the news reached him that the enemy were in force on our rear train and threatened the left flank. This was met by General Porter with great promptness and success. General Butterfield posted the Twelfth to maintain this attack with the Second Maine, the Forty-fourth New York, and Battery C, Forty-fourth New York, and a section of Martin's Battery. This was one of the severest contested fights of the whole war, the enemy pressing boldly in front while advancing themselves in a comparatively open field. Every foot of ground was fought for. Porter to deal with in Generals Porter, Morrell, and Martindale, and a fourth was on his way—for Butterfield, leaf by leaf, and the fifty-second bridge-quicking back his weary men to the relief of one of his regiments, now full of fight. Forty-fourth's, which was already warmly engaged supporting a section of Martin's Battery, and arriving on the left flank of the enemy, Butterfield poured in the enemy's flank, poured in a murderous fire, and the combined forces drove the enemy in utter rout and flight." Again at the battles of Mechanicsville and Gaines's Mills General Butterfield won glory and fame, and on the 1st of July, at Malvern Hill, was so struck by his gallantry that he presented him with a horse in token of his regard.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

WE continue in this number our series of engravings of the battles before Richmond. On page 470 we reproduce a sketch by Mr. A. R. WARD, representing where McCall's division, in Fitz-John Porter's corps, was attacked by a large force of rebels under Ripley and Branch. The enemy had made a bridge below Mechanicsville, with the intention of cutting off McClellan's communication with the James River. The cutting off McCall's command from the rest of the army, that General withdrew his forces across Beaver Creek. Here he made a determined stand, a fight lasting till after dark, when, having repulsed the enemy, McCall fell back still further. The issuance of McClellan's plan of drawing his right wing across the Chickahominy, and taking the James River as his base of supplies, and by that add the following description of the country from the Pamunkey to Richmond:

The battle was fought in dense woods. Our forces were posted in the open ground on the edge of the woods for two miles long, the general course of which was nearly parallel with the Chickahominy. The enemy were more than 60 to 100 rods: a small stream flows the entire length, and the scene of action is a valley or low ground. The field over the brow and crest of the hills on either side in the rifle-pits constructed by the rebels, and also in the bottom land of the Chickahominy. On the left the enemy were posted in the woods, and on the right, as I have when I reached the field, our pickets occupied the top of the hill across the road, and our line was in the woods. They reported a battery of the enemy at Gaines's House, a mile to the right, and that the enemy were in force in that view. The battery soon exchanged shots with guns on the right. Half an hour later the enemy's line of fire with an occasional shell from a position to the left of the road. Soon after the enemy's line of battle appeared in a large and extended line, with a reserve force in the rear. The fire of our batteries on the right gradually grew more and more destructive, and the fire of the left of the line had been few casualties. Would the enemy make a serious attack upon our left? A volley from the enemy's line met on the left, directed at so many of the enemy we appeared to be overwhelmed. Regiment after regiment broke back, did not answer the repeated exhortations of their officers, and fled to the rear. The enemy's line of answer came, and it was unmistakable—it was a tornado of musketry.

The ball opened with the coarse, but only a moment, and the tornado swept right and left as if an electrical electricity had discharged every man's musket. Officers and men were mingled in one confused mass as they rushed into that open ground where new scenes met them at once. A spatter of rebel lead lifted little puffs of dust on the hill from which, with shrieking eyes, I in vain sought to penetrate those dark recesses. A dull, heavy smoke-cloud hung over the woods, and from the left, the whizzing of a rasion Minie overhead, the incessant roar of musketry, and by the wounded and the dead long before out of the area of death.

On page 468 we reproduce Mr. Waud's sketch of the

which was fought on Friday, 27th. We have already described this fight, and will only add Mr. Waud's account of it: "The next day the rebels in great force attacked M'Call again, now sustained by Porter's division, Slocum's division, and Sykes's brigade of regulars, and part of Sumner's division. These sustained an unequal and bloody fight with the rebels on Friday afternoon, when they were withdrawn across the Chickahominy, blowing up the fine bridges and burning the boats built by their rear. Our sketch represents Sykes's brigade waiting form before the rebel efforts to overwhelm our right. The rebels, on the right, are in the M'Call and Franklin's; but the smoke was so heavy that it was difficult to see much of the field of fight. The heavy smoke beyond was caused by the destruction of commissary stores by fire, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy.

On page 477 will be found another picture, also from a sketch by Mr. Waud, illustrating the fought on Saturday, 28th. Mr. Waud writes:

"On Saturday the wagon trains were gradually got to the rear, and our lines remained comparatively free from attack. Before daylight Sunday the rear guard troops were withdrawn, and the Fifth Massachusetts battery being the last to leave the outposts. Covering the trains, Franklin's troops passed across the Chickahominy at Sumner's Bridge. Then mistaking the movement for a retreat, came on with the greatest confidence, to be fully checked—some at Fairoaks Station and then at Savage's—when, notwithstanding that they attacked our troops before they had all come to the rear, they received a heavy repulse, the Irish brigade acting particularly well.

"The rebels were massing in the woods beyond the railroad at Savage's Station, the rebels in the distance, pressing on their infantry covered by a heavy fire of artillery, which was answered from Sumner's Heights, quicking into position."

Pages 472 and 473 we illustrate the fight of the long series of bloody fights, the

where the enemy attacked General M'Clellan on the afternoon of Tuesday, July 1. The General, anticipating the attack, had placed his cannon on a height in front of the fifty-pounders, and on a falling back when the pieces became heated. It was the fire of the fifty-pounders that so terribly repeated the army under Magruder. In our picture the reader will remark that the rebels are in the foreground, and the army artillery on the high ground. The following account of the battle we take from the Herald:

"The battle of the 1st was the most open and undoubting, presenting a splendid position near the centre of our line, which the enemy could not turn, and which they could not fail back during the night and took up the most eligible position on the heights in front of Malvern House. Our right is the left, and our left the right, of the position. The enemy, anticipating a vigorous pursuit by the rebels, had left their blankets and knapsacks in the rear of his army, and personally placed his troops in position, disposed to meet the attack. The battle was a magnificent conflict. General Keyes was on the extreme right, with Couch's division. General Sumner's command occupied Keyes's left, and next in order from right to left were General Heintzelman's corps, embracing a part of Sedgwick's division; Hetzelzimas's corps, embracing Hooker's and Kearney's divisions; next General Porter's division, which was detached from Keyes's command; while General Morell's division and the regulars, formed the extreme left. The reserve consisted of Smith's division, which was posted on the road leading to Richmond, and Couch's division, completely commanded by our artillery and the gun-boats. The battle commenced at about half-past one P.M., the reason the position was found to be untenable afterward. The enemy did not get his artillery into position until about ten in the afternoon. For several hours heavy cannonading was kept up on both sides, and when the enemy's artillery did, were ringed in a splendid position near the centre of our line, and poured a murderous volley into the ranks of the enemy as they were being brought forward and formed for attack. At about half-past three o'clock in the afternoon, the shot and shell filled the air, and a most terrific cannonading was kept up with unabated vigor. About half past three o'clock the enemy's attendance of the rebels were formed to the front under cover of the artillery fire, and charged upon the left of the centre, and the gradually overpowering force bore down upon the left of the centre, compelling them to fall back. Heavy reinforcements were brought up to the support of the right, and aggressiveness were entertained that the enemy were pressing in a certain direction; but before the powerful apprehensions were not realized. The rebels hurled their forces upon the left of the centre, and General Couch, who had immediate command of that portion of the line, with his gallant troops maintained the position of his regiment where he wanted them, and inspired the whole command with confidence. The enemy suffered by than those engaged in this battle. After the firing was commenced, General Porter rode down the line to greet Sumner for reinforcements, and several regiments of Sumner's division were sent to the front. The battle was headed by the largest concentration of artillery ever seen on this continent, the most signal service. Lieutenant-Colonel Tidball, of the Second New York, was severely accompanied by a portion of his staff, rode along the field, and, by his presence, encouraged the men. The battle, which closed soon after darkness set in, the rebels did not gain a single point. Our line was drawn from the same point with fearful loss. Where our artillery opened with grape and canister the killed and wounded rebels were actually piled upon each other. Several rebel regiments which came on in defiant style were literally mowed down by the battle-was brief, but bloody. The rebel loss must be very heavy, as it was concentrated. It is impossible to accurately estimate our own, as circumstances compelled us to leave many on the field. It is believed, however, that our aforesaid will more than cover it.

On page 470 we illustrate the representation of the GUN-BOATS "GALENA" AND "MARIANA" during the fight of 1st. Our picture is from the pencil of an officer on board one of our vessels. He writes:

"Having cleared the James River up to Fort Darling and the obstructions, the gun-boats, on account of the high banks and their inability to operate or occupy for inland, have been obliged to hold merely what they had attained, to await the co-operation of the army. On Tuesday last the latter, having been two days in its retreat, had come out on the James River. Here, at a point near Turkey Island, our rear-guard were enabled to make a stand, being most effectually covered in their operations by the gun-boats. Here the enemy were twice repulsed and several pieces of artillery, with caissons, the latter from the Richmond arsenal, and 100-pounder rifled guns of the boats, after a flight of frequently two or three miles, dropping and exploding in the midst of the retreating foe. Our shots were mostly directed by signals made from the top of the vessels, which gave them a wide command, and answered from our top-mast by an officer of the army signal corps."

On page 469 we reproduce a sketch by our artist, Mr. WAUD, representing before the late movement from Chickahominy to the James River. Mr. Waud writes:

"No. 1 represents the Railroad from West Point to Richmond, at or about the bridge where it leaves our lines, some six miles from the city. It is a single-track road, but it is an immense convenience to the army in transporting the large supplies necessary for such an enormous body of men. The country, without being at all striking, is picturesque along the road, the wild camps of our troops adding to the effect. The trees are left one or twice a rebel locomotive has made its appearance on the track, shouldering very quick when the cars appear in sight.

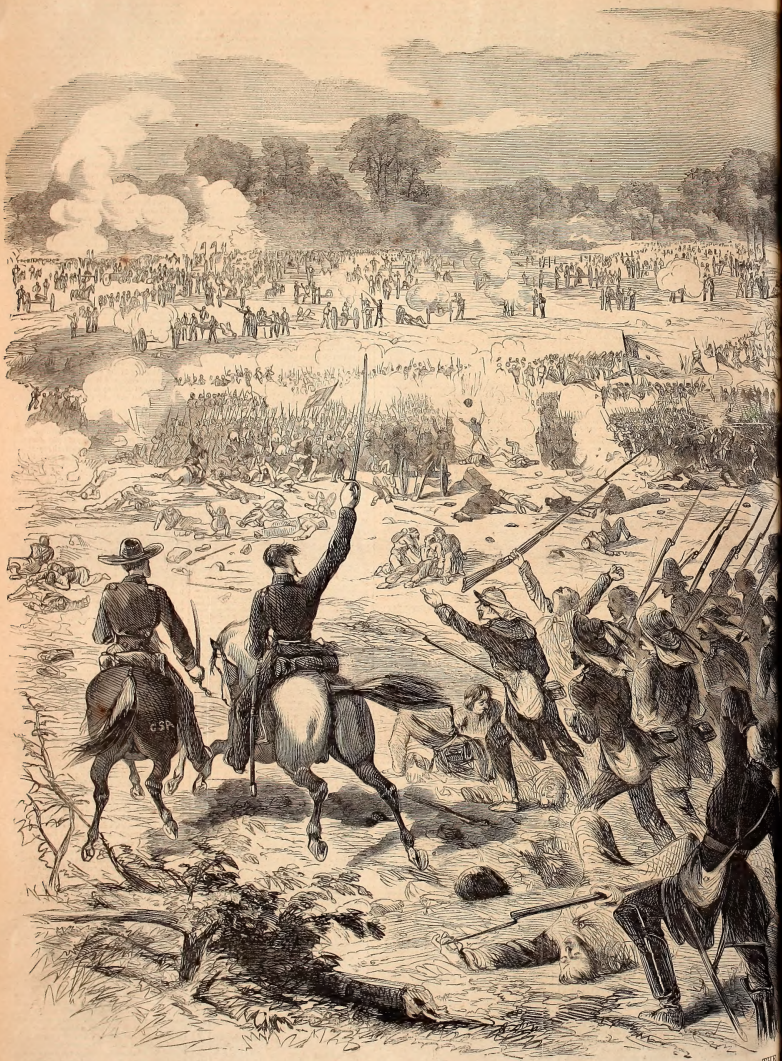
"No. 2 is the Trestle-work over the Chickahominy bridge, about seven hundred yards in length at this point.

"No. 3 is a sketch of Sick and Wounded Soldiers on their way to the White House, refreshing themselves at a pure spring of water by the side of the railroad while waiting for the cars.

"No. 4 gives a good idea of the pleasures of bridge-building in the swamp, where the atmosphere is so dense, and it is so impossible to get at the builders to stand up to their middle in water, and stretch out and carry the logs to construct the bridge with.

"No. 5. Along some parts of the line quite a good deal of wood is among the trees. The rebel cannot shew by so not fire, and the rebels leave their trees and logs behind them, thus greatly benefiting Richmond papers for the New York papers, and making themselves generally agreeable. Richmond has not experienced a large conflagration yet, even warfare; yet it is open to doubt whether the destruction of unoccupied property, especially in evils on the other hand: neither can it be considered expedient that the rebels should have recent supplies of Richmond papers.

"No. 6. The Soldier's last Resting-place. Also, several soldiers' graves in the field, and many more will soon be flattened out by the action of the weather, the slight wooden head-board overturned, and its inscription lost. The soldiers' graves are among the best approach to a slab that your comrades could raise upon which to record your name, country, and death; is not calculated to retain that inscription long: although even that fleeting memorial is more than thousands of soldiers have on their graves, containing from one to fifty in each, mark where the original tools of treason fell and received the last rites from patriots."



THE BOMBARDMENT OF VICKSBURG.

WE devote page 476 to illustrations of the ATTACK ON VICKSBURG, Mississippi, and to the engagement between the rebel ram GENERAL VAN DORN and the gun-boats Benton, Carondelet, Lancaster, and Cincinnati, with a number of rams; we found that Farragut had run by the batteries of Vicksburg, and passed the fleet, and found that, though capable of driving the rebels from the batteries, he could not hold them, as there is somewhat knocked to pieces by this time. The town is situated in the bend of the river, and just above the town the bluff on which it stands forms the neck of land, which will have the effect of ruining the city, as it will be the means of changing the course of the river. This the people have been fearful of for some time, for by so doing Vicksburg would be left inland, and useless. The Federals are permanently changes its course. In order to prevent this the levee was built, for the law prevents cutting a railroad.

"I went across the short neck of land, and on board the Octorara saw Porter and Bissell. Grant is expected to be down here by land in five days, when it is intended to take a few seconds of the fleet to the Yazoo and Vicksburg, while Mobile is sure when we want it. The shells from his mortar-boats are very destructive, and are every now and then right into the rebel batteries.

"The second trial to capture some of the rebel schooners.

"Commodore Porter's mortar fleet lying just off the Yazoo, Admiral Farragut and staff arrived, induced a belief among the rebels that they could board the vessels, and by one grand attack gain possession of them, also defeating any inferior number of troops opposed to them. To accomplish this General Van Dorn marched a brigade from their encampment and cautiously through the woods approached our vessels. When two hundred yards distant the rebels made a charge, but were received by terrific storms of grape that drove them back in confusion. They retired completely defeated."

BATTLE OF MALVERN HILL, VIRGINIA, JULY 1, 1862.—THE

S REPULSED BY THE UNION ARTILLERY.—[See Page 471.]

BY THE SEA-SIDE.

TWO swift winds run
Under the sun,
And under the silver moon:
They have taken away my little one:
May they bring him back to me soon.

He is strong and tough,
And manly enough,
But he hath a wayward will:
My son is a sailor rude and rough,
But he seems my little one still.

Blow, winds, blow!
And may he know
The comfort that mothers lack;
Follow him swift where'er he shall go,
And change him, and bring him back.

He smiled away
On a stormy day
So many long years ago;
For his heart was free and stubborn—Say,
Is my little one dead or no?

If the cold sea moans
O'er my little one's bones,
Let the waters be tranquil and blue;
But blow him back, if he live, for he owns
A willful nature like you.

Blow! blow!
Go, winds, go
Over the salt sea-foam;
And when, with your changes, he changes, oh,
Let the sweet change waft him home.

Ye winds, I trow
I am now not
Though your wild sea-mirth he his drunk,
He is still my little one, though his brow
Be as dark as the sea-weed dank.

Though his eyes be cold
As the sea-caves old,
Though his hand be fierce as foam,
Though he be waywarder twentyfold,
Bring my little one home.

Fice, winds, flee!
Ye are dear to me
For the sake of my little one;
Full many a year, in my place by the sea,
Ye have put me in mind of my son.

Full many a year
Have ye both been dear!
After him, swift winds, fly:
Come back together, that I may hear
Your voices mingling, and die.

MY UNCLE'S CASHIER.

"MY dear Charles, It is a question for you, not for me—you must decide yourself; I can only state the conditions upon which that decision will be founded! If you go to college you must go with a very small allowance indeed, and you must work hard for a fellowship of some kind, for I can leave you nothing, as you know that, beyond a provision for your mother and the unmarried girls. I shall have nothing behind me when I go. If you do go to college, you will enter a circle the entering of which will multiply ten-fold your chances of success in after-life: I will give you a position in society of which nothing but bad conduct on your part can deprive you, and will put you in the fair road to become what I should like to see you—a scholar and a gentleman. If, on the other hand, you accept your uncle's offer, you will have a far larger allowance at once, and, if you can live upon under any circumstances, the chance of succeeding him in a very lucrative business, and soon becoming a man of some importance in the commercial world. I need say no more—you must choose for yourself; I shall await your answer to-morrow in time to post; go and think it over. Don't say any thing to your uncle, or they'll persuade you to go to Paris for the chance of visiting you there."

Such was my father's address to me at the age of seventeen. It was a difficult question to decide—Oxford or Paris? Still I did decide, and next day announced that decision.

"I should prefer going to college, father, at all events."

"Glad to hear it, my boy, though the other course would have been the cheaper for me; still I am glad to hear it. You'll need to work hard, you'll be reading you to college I can do more than I can in any other way. If there's any thing in you it will come out there; if not, you will be only spoiled for other things afterward; so God-speed you, my boy!"

To college therefore I went, with only one more word of advice from my father. As I left the gate in the lovely house for the station, he said:

"God bless you, my boy! if you mean to be any thing, don't hear midnight strike too often."

Three years passed, and I was "getting on," as my mother used to tell her friends; in a few months more I had hopes of getting something worth having in the shape of my degree with honors and a fellowship. Alas! My hopes were vain. I had hardly returned to college at the end of my third long vacation when I received a telegram announcing my father's illness, and reached home too late to see him again alive. My college dreams were over—I had not a penny in the world—I must work for all I was to have.

My uncle now wrote to repeat his former offer. I joyfully accepted it; and a month after my father's death I was in Paris.

My uncle's house was in one of the small streets lying between the Rue Vivienne and the Rue Montmartre, just north of the Bourse. It was, as may be supposed from its situation, an old rambling place, with the banking-offices on one side of the court-yard and the residence on the other. The offices, the scene of my new duties, consisted of a suit of three rooms, communicating by swing doors; in the farthest sat my uncle, the next was the chief cashier's or clerk's, and the third the office-boy's. A common stove stood along the whole length of the room, and on top of the counter ran a high, strong, wire-guard, with two or three small circular openings, through which the money was passed and papers were taken. Behind this guard I was to sit as third cashier or clerk. My uncle's business was that of a banker, bill-discounter, and money-lender; and to judge by the rate at which he lived he must for some years have employed a very large amount of capital, or have lent his money at a little more than five per cent per annum.

My uncle having shown me the offices took me over to the house.

"My daughter, Mr. Wardes; Victorine, my dear. Mr. Wardes, a nephew of mine."

I looked at my cousin once and again—she was worth looking at—a most singular mixture of races was visible in her features. She had a light forehead, thoughtful, German forehead—a man's rather than a girl's—a delicate chin and mouth, with the small teeth so characteristic of the more Oriental of the French nature, and a nose and eyes unmistakably English in the clear brilliant color of the one and the peculiar gray-brown gaze of the others. She was a curiosity—a new thing—and I determined to study Victorine, my cousin.

"You must dine with us at six o'clock. Where did you sleep last night?"

"At a hotel."

"You'd better bring your trunks here; your room is ready."

"Really I had no idea that I was to live here."

"Where else, boy? Where else? I prefer to let a cheap place for young men; you'll live here cheaper than any where else; more comfortably, I dare say, than in a common lodging-house."

This was more than I had hoped for, to find myself domiciled in my uncle's house. I thought he had done much in receiving me into his family, and vicious refusal, but this overcame me.

"Sir, I really very grateful to you for all your kindness."

"All right, my lad, all right! See and get your things here, or you'll be late for dinner."

At dinner I was introduced to the chief clerk—or rather, the manager of my uncle's business. Once or twice I noticed his eyes fix themselves on me in a way that gave me the idea of his measuring me. I felt almost at this; and could detect, in a little, perhaps, in the tone of my voice as I answered his inquiries as to the practices of English universities.

"Oh!" said my uncle, "he knows nothing about the matter, Monsieur Verony—he has to recite to you a chorus from the 'Antigone' and he'll repeat half the book; but of commerce—of banking—he knows nothing."

"We shall be able to teach him our system in a few years, if he shall stay so long with us."

"He'll stay longer than I shall, I dare say, M. Verony."

"Let me hope not, M. Wardes; you are a young man yet—quite a young man."

"That may be, sir; but I don't mean to spend all my life in your dear Paris, M. Verony. Oh no."

Whatever comes, we shall do our best with the young gentleman, and make him useful."

I felt angry and vexed at this conversation; though the banker spoke in a kind and even a complaisant enough, I did not like this contemptuous treatment from his manager.

Moreover, I felt assured M. Verony paid most assiduous and graceful attentions to Victorine, who accepted them as her due, and smiled, and this made me still more inclined to dislike him.

My work was easy enough—too easy. I copied letters; paid away money quietly. Victorine came down, bearing I had come in.

"Charles, you must breakfast with you—you look so ill and pale. What has happened? Do, pray, tell me; so cold, too. Come up stairs, there's a nice fire in my sitting-room."

She made me go with her—made me take some brandy, and then asked me what was the matter. I told her. We had reached that delicious stage of affection when, though nothing has been said, we feel by both that there is love and interest between them. She was almost incredulous at my account of the incident, and at my conduct of having witnessed the scene. I showed her the blotting paper, and it convinced her.

"It's no use telling my father to-night, he has such confidence in M. Verony that he will not believe it; you must tell him to-morrow morning."

I told him in the morning what I had heard and seen.

"My dear nephew, you must have been very drunk, or else—no, that is not possible, your father's child could not get drunk. I do, myself, believe that you have not deliberately lie. No, my dear Charles, M. Verony is an old and tried friend of mine; I will not believe this story. I will not insult him by it. You were drunk, Sir, very drunk. Don't let me hear of it again."

This was in my uncle's private room. M. Verony came in with my uncle.

"Charles, did you balance your cash last night?"

"Yes, Sir. I always do."

"It was right?"

"Quite right."

"There's a mistake somewhere," said M. Verony. "There is missing a sum of 1000 francs."

"I can't be in my accounts, uncle; for here is the book, and here is the balance to correspond."

"True."

"Let me cast it," said Verony.

He did—220, 340.

"Try that, M. Wardes. I do not make it correct; I make it more."

I cast it again, and it was more by just 1000 francs. I cast it again—221 it was. My uncle cast it—221 it was.

This one idea of fraud kept forcing itself before me constantly. M. Verony's jealous acts of particular books and keys, his constant endeavors to make my uncle take "one glass more" than was good for him, and the strange, suspicious-looking people who came to him first, and then drew out money from the bank, all compelled me to think of it. I was more than confirmed in my suspicions by an incident which occurred some few months after this idea first entered my mind.

I had lent myself in one of the Faubourgs rather late one evening, and entered a small, mean-looking restaurant to ask my way. There were a number of men in the room, and as I glanced in I thought a face there was no mistaking—that of M. Verony. He was sitting at one of the little, round marble-topped tables with two companions, with his face to the wall, and his skilface reflected in the glass. I saw him clearly, but from his position he could not see me. Instead of asking my way I took a seat near the party, and took up the paper. They spoke in French and rapidly, in a low tone.

"I tell you," said Verony, "it will not do; you always have to ask me before you draw, and unless you can do it in my way it can not be done."

"Repeat," said one, "repeat; what is your way?"

"This," said Verony. "I will give you a check now for the whole sum, and the Marquis de ——'s signature. Lizette will bring it; she must come in her carriage and call it to-morrow—and—"

"That is my cue!" said—"what are we to do?"

"Give me notes for 45,000 francs to-night."

45,000—that is only 5000 francs, and a carriage and horses, and Lizette's dress—it is but little more, but you will get the money: I like the old way best; I will come as usual."

You can not do this without risk of discovery. That prying English nephew is suspicious—he has the eyes of an eagle—an owl I ought to say, for he can see in the dark."

"Can't you quiet him? There is water under all the locks and keys of office!"

"He's too happy for that; happy men don't drown themselves."

"Down by the sea at night? An appointment with a pretty girl might tempt him."

"Not at all—he's in love with Victorine."

"That is serious, Verony—she was to be yours."

"That may be yet. Now, will you have it, or shall I go to Lizette myself, and make the offer?"

The two consulted for a moment, and one of them left the room. In a few minutes he returned (I was deeply absorbed in the paper, which completely hid my face); he said to his companion:

"I have it."

"You are agreed, then?"

"Yes. Will you take the check?"

Verony drew from his pocket-book a blank check, filled it up for 45,000 francs, and dated it.

"Now the notes. All good?"

"All good. To be sure."

Verony looked carefully at the notes, and then signing the check, handed it over to his companions.

"Thus!"

"Oh, at two; and tell her not to talk too much."

He rose and left the room with his companions. I hardly knew when I saw the table vacant whether I had dreamed it or not. I looked at the notes, and there was nothing that would help me to rest for the truth; but under the table lay a piece of paper, torn from a book, and found that it was a piece of blotting paper similar to that I had used in the office, and on it was the blackened impression of the signature of the check. I reached home in a state of anxiety that may easily be imagined, and found my uncle in his room with his cash-box. He was always a little "comfortable," as kind wives say, toward evening; to-night he was asleep in his arm-chair, and snoring violently. Victorine came down, hearing I had come in.

"Charles, you must breakfast with you—you look so ill and pale. What has happened? Do, pray, tell me; so cold, too. Come up stairs, there's a nice fire in my sitting-room."

She made me go with her—made me take some brandy, and then asked me what was the matter. I told her. No, my dear Charles, M. Verony is an old and tried friend of mine; I will not believe this story. I will not insult him by it. You were drunk, Sir, very drunk. Don't let me hear of it again."

This was in my uncle's private apartment. M. Verony came in with my uncle.

"Charles, did you balance your cash last night?"

"Yes, Sir. I always do."

"It was right?"

"Quite right."

"There's a mistake somewhere," said M. Verony. "There is missing a sum of 1000 francs."

"I can't be in my accounts, uncle; for here is the book, and here is the balance to correspond."

He did—220, 340.

"Try that, M. Wardes. I do not make it correct; I make it more."

I cast it again, and it was more by just 1000 francs. I cast it again—221 it was. My uncle cast it—221 it was.

"How is this, Charles? you said you made the balance right. Did you look over your cash last night?"

I did. I can assert that the balance last night in the book and the cash-box was the same. I can prove it. I posted it, according to M. Verony's system, in the daily balance-book."

It is 320 here, M. Wardes."

He handed the book to my uncle. The door opened.

"Well, Francois, what is it?"

"Only that I shall give this to Monsieur Wardes. I have found it in his chamber."

He held out a paper to me; it was a note for 1000 francs.

"Charles, my boy, you should let me know when you want money. M. Verony, see these books are corrected." And my uncle walked away.

How the day went I do not know. I noticed, however, that M. Verony once or twice went down to the strong room and brought up other books, and that no woman came for money.

About five o'clock M. Verony came to me, after the other clerk and my uncle had gone, and said:

"M. Wardes, we have been looking at the accounts of Madame la Marquise de ——, and can help me to carry down these books? the porter has gone; I am rather late."

I took the books and followed him down into the basement. He unlocked the outer gate of the court safe, then the general banker's were kept, and passed through to the inner safe in which were kept the deeds and valuable securities on which my uncle lent money; this was separated from the outer safe by an iron gate in the daytime, and at night by a strong wooden door.

He put his books on the shelf, and requested me to put mine on the same shelf in the proper order. The number in the books was almost illegible, and I was some time, even in the strong gas-light, trying to read them.

"Can I help you, M. Wardes?"

"No, thank you, I've just done."

I put up the last book, and turned to go. The heavy door swung rapidly on its hinges—I heard the spring catch, and the key turn, and I was in black darkness.

"M. Verony! M. Verony! The door is shut—I know it is! Let me out! Let me out! It is sickness: "you have access to all my books now."

I heard the heavy clash of the door of the outer safe, and the distance, as the key again was round me. I did not swoon or faint. I felt I was the victim of a most horrible plot, and was waiting more—I should be released in the morning, and I would make him repent it. I heard presently a hissing sound as escaping from a powerful gas. I should never see the morning. I should be stifled with the gas—the pain would be before me now. An accident—no one knew I helped him with the books—he did not know I was in the safe, and he shut the door in the ordinary use of those accidents that will happen.

Still my reason filled like a serpent before its fatal spring. I must stop that, I felt round the walls for the burner, and soon found it. There was no tap! I ascertained that the tap was in the outer safe, and the gas was lighted in the inner one by a long stick between the bars of the gate. My fingers were numbed, but I could not keep my finger there always. I tried, and the arm became so heavy that I could not support my head, that I could not keep my finger over it to save my life. I thought of some other plan. I had a light—I could—but there was no means to do it; and if I had it would only have consumed the gas, the walls of which were already like lit self. At last I thought of something that would do; I tore some corners of the leaves of a book, I twisted them into a spill, and with the bellows in the tube, pressing it in hard—the hissing ceased. I breathed more freely, and recalled another burner —I had one for the less. I then began to think seriously as to the chances of the air lasting me till morning. Was it morning? Was it evening? this was—O God! Saturday! Saturday! Sunday—two days and a night! Sunday! There was no hope! I might have lived till the morning, but on Sunday there was no business done, and I was always safe to be unsuspected for by that horrible mistake in my books.

Two days! Two days—two long hours! To Sunday night at five, twenty-four. To Monday morning at ten, seventeen. Forty-one long hours! Light—darkness—light—darkness—how many times must I eat me too! I felt round the door; it was all but air-proof. If I could make them hear! It was impossible; the house was the other side of a noisy court-yard—I must die! And Victorine! No, no one should die but me. I—I—I—I will live.

I bethought me of my old store of knowledge. How long could I live without fresh air? How long could I live without food? If I fasted the length and breadth of the room—I measured it—I could walk it twenty times a minute; twenty times a minute I might live for thirteen hours; that would be till six o'clock on Sunday morning; I could walk it twice as much—and—and—I must be there through the walls, the lock was impregnable. The walls of brick would yield to tools. Tools! mockery! I had but a penknife—try—and I had thirteen hours to get through a wall at least two feet thick. It was impossible, my hours. Tools! A long pointed bar and a hammer. I remember once seeing a workman boring through a wall at my father's with such tools. My penknife was two inches long. The gas-burner! light—I—I—I will try it. I will try it. I will try it presently. It might work through beside the gas-pipe. The man surely used a larger hole than the pipe would fill. I felt the pipe where it went round the wall, and then pricked the wall with my knife; the cement with which the hole had been filled round the pipe was harder than the wall itself.

The tearing up round the room my hand touched the gate. I was saved! I never felt such a sensation as when my hand touched that gate. It was rapture! bliss! I had designated—I was now full of hope. I passed my hand carefully over the gate; I felt one of the bars, they were of round iron, about three-quarters of an inch in thickness, and after running through the frame-work of the gate were pointed at the end. But to get them out of that frame-work! I pulled one. It yielded a little, and then mocked at my efforts. I must have a hammer. I felt carefully round the walls again. The shelves were all let into the walls—there was nothing! I felt again, and close to the gate the shelf had been cut away to allow the gate to roll back, and the shelves were supported on brackets. If those brackets were wrought-iron I was helpless—cast-iron might save me yet. I felt them carefully and compared them; if they were wrought, they would be unlike in some points—if cast, alike in all. I knew now what the touch of the blind must be, so full of instruction to the mind.

They were cast-iron, not a trace of difference could be found. One more sign and I was certain; if cast, they would be cast in a mould, and there would be a slight roughness in the casting where the halves of the mould had been joined. I felt again. There was the roughness—the same in both. And now to break them off. A blow, a heavy blow, alone could do it. I remembered to have noticed, when putting away the books, a small chest of apparently solid iron on one of the shelves. I sought for it and found it; it was heavy, nearly the fourth of a hundredweight I thought. I poised it carefully, and felt I had strength enough to throw it with an aim. I cleared away the books from the slate shelf which rested on one of these brackets, and then measuring carefully the distance, threw the chest on to it. It fell short, and crashed on the floor.

Once more I tried, and this time successfully. The missile smashed the shelf into pieces. I kicked and beat away the smaller fragments till the bracket stood out from the wall by itself. And now came the test of my skill. If I threw once at the bracket in that black darkness I threw twenty times or more; at last, one fortunately-directed blow, and I had the joy of hearing it ring on the pavement of the room.

I had now a hammer—awkward it is true—still a tool that would give a blow with a certain force.

I struck again and again at the bars of the gate, they yielded as the other had done and then were fast. I sank down exhausted with my useless efforts. Why did they not yield? I could give no more force to the blow—to throw the chest at them would be useless; the size would spread the blow over two or three of the bars, and the force would be lost. I must cut through one of the bars in the middle and thus wrench out the half I needed. How had I seen men cut through iron? With files—I could not hope for these. I remembered to have heard of prisoners who cut through iron bars with a watch spring—by what horrible fatality was my watch at that moment in the case on my dressing-table. A watch spring—a thin piece of steel. Would iron do? It might. In almost less time than it takes to tell I had broken up one of the sheet-iron deed boxes, and by carefully bending a piece of it backward and forward on the sharp edge of the chest I had used as a missile, I obtained a strip about the length of my hand, and two fingers broad, and with this I commenced sawing one of the bars. Half an hour's hard work produced no impression on the bar, and had turned up the edge of the soft sheet-iron on both sides.

If it had been a question of saws, I could have turned ten deed boxes into a hundred saws to cut through that one bar. Alas! it was no such thing, the saw would not cut; and then sprung up before me the vision of a large yard with blocks of stone and the motion to and fro of the suspended saw of the stone sawyer, and his little trickling water barrel and heap of sand. Once more I went to work. I broke off a corner of one of the stone shelves (the lower ones were of stone the upper of slate), pounded it fine with my hammer, and then wetting the edge of the saw with saliva, I strewed the pounded stone upon it. I felt the saw become steadier and steadier, and at last I could feel with my nail a little nick in the bar. I worked for nearly three hours at this one bar, changing my saw when it was worn hollow for another and another till I had worn out six of them. I was nearly through—another half hour and I should be quite through; yet it might break off now with a blow—it might—and it might leave a ragged end to my chisel that would destroy half the force of my blows when I came to bore through the wall; I would not strike, but kept on patiently, and at last the saw went through. I seized the end, and in a few minutes I held in my hand the instrument of my deliverance.

The air of the room had by this time become close and stifling, and it was only by stooping that I could breathe freely.

I had still, as far as I could judge, some five hours left—in those I must accomplish my deliverance or die.

I now commenced sounding with my hammer for the least solid part of the wall.

In striking it on a part nearly opposite the shelves cut out for the gate, I thought I heard it sound hollow. I struck again and again without success; it all seemed alike. Once more I determined to strike over the whole space I had previously struck; this I did, and found the spot about the size of a penny piece from which the sound came. I then carefully felt the wall in the neighborhood, and found a rough indented line ran from this place round the angle of the wall, and on the wall in the same line were three small holes in a circle. I decided at once that this was the place of some burner fixed, and afterward removed; the rough line was the mark left by the pipe, and the hollow place must be the hole through which the old pipe entered the room. I drove the chisel into the place and found it hard—very hard, but still hollow. My life now hung upon the choice of a right place; if this hole was filled up with the hard cement, and the difference of sound arose merely from difference in density, then I had better try the wall over for a brick softer than the rest; but if it was not full—if those who should have filled it had put but a few inches of cement at each end of the hole; then in another hour I was as safe as if I were free. I would risk it. That hollow sound was so cheery, that I would believe that it must be a true guide.

Blow after blow, and the hole grew deep, and my progress less as my control over the point of the instrument lessened, when one sudden, sharp blow drove the chisel into the wall the length of my arm. The place was hollow. I had now but to drive it through the crust of cement on the outer wall, and I should live. I drove it cautiously and carefully, and at last heard the echo of the pieces falling on the other side, and drawing out the chisel, felt the air rush in. How can words convey the sensation I experienced as I drew in the God-given breath of life! I could now defy Death; there was a fountain at which I might drink and live.

For hours I sat close to the hole and breathed, and then fell asleep. I know not how long I slept, but I awoke sore and tired, and with a horrible hunger and thirst on me. I could not have many more hours to stay, so I hoped on, and tightened my belt to ease the gnawing pain at my stomach. And now began the horrors of solitude; while I had employment for the mind I felt no pain of any kind; now I was going mad with anxiety and fear. I must find some employment. And what? in this utter darkness. But if darkness, why not light? Yes, I would have light. For this I must enlarge the hole, and went to work again with blistered hands, and in two hours had enlarged it to twice its original diameter, and had consequently four times as much air flowing in.

My next step was to grate from the edges of a book a paper powder for tinder, and spreading this on the ground in a heap, I struck with the point of my hammer the stone shelf above it. The sparks flew about at the contact, but it was at least an hour before one lodged in the heap and set it smouldering. I watched anxiously as the little red ring grew larger and brighter in the heap, and then applying a piece of thin paper rolled to a fine point to the centre of the ring, I gently blew the redness into flame—yes, flame! Real flame, that blinded me by its brightness, that seemed to pierce my brain with a sword, so long and deep had been the darkness.

I took my paper stop from off the gas and heard the serpent hiss once more—this time without fear. I lit the issuing gas, and then sat looking at it as Bartimeus might have done in the joy of his new-found sight.

I had done—I had light and air; but still I must have employment or I should rave.

Employment. The thought came to me of that unfortunate sentence that had caused me to run this risk: "If I had access to his books I would prove that fraud was possible."

There they were—every one; not one missing. Could I prove it? Could—I must—my good name depended on proving it. If he were true, I was false. I set to work, and with my pencil, which I happily had with me, I went through account after account from beginning to end, and well was I rewarded; for I learned that my uncle, supposed to be rich, had been systematically robbed for years by this scoundrel, and was now almost ruined; and that his daughter's portion, invested in English securities, had been sold out, and the interest paid by M. Vernay himself, so that father and daughter were at the mercy of this man.

These facts I learned from a small locked book that was in a box marked with M. Vernay's name. So confident had the servant been of his master's trust in him that he had left in that master's safe the whole of the securities of his nefarious investments, and there they were, with a systematic account of them in this locked book; so that while the master, who was supposed to be worth his hundreds of thousands, was almost a bankrupt, his clerk was a man of immense wealth.

When I broke the lock of that book and read down its columns I felt a joy and a pleasure that would have enabled me again to endure what I had suffered if it would have led to the same result.

I made notes of the whole affair, and took the securities into my possession, and then calmly waited long, long hours; I could not tell how long, for I was waked up from a kind of stupor by the sound of a door opening, and then I heard the voice I knew so well—that of M. Vernay.

"You need not stay; I can bring up all I need. Give me a lucifer."

He was speaking to the porter. I heard the muffled-sounding footsteps; I heard the key turn in the lock; and then, as the door opened, I stood face to face with my foe, and where he expected to find darkness and death he found light and life. He saw me—saw in my hand his book that contained the secrets of a lifetime, with the lock forced—saw his schemes defeated, and himself an outcast. It was too much for his mind. He shrieked a cry of mingled horror and fear, and fell forward in the door-way as if he were dead.

I went up stairs to the office, said to the porter, "M. Vernay is below in the strong-room; go down and see to him," and went over to the house.

I suffered a long illness, during the whole of which Victorine was my nurse, and, thanks to that and a good constitution, I recovered, and got up such a clear case against M. Vernay that the whole of the property I had rescued was restored to my uncle.

To M. Vernay this was a matter of indifference, for his mind never recovered the shock, and he spent the short remainder of his life in a criminal lunatic asylum.

The mistake of the thousand francs was easily explained by the application of a magnifying glass to the figures. He had cleverly altered the one to a nought, and bribed Francois to put the missing note into my room.

Need I add that I am now in possession of my uncle's business, and blessed by my Victorine's constant presence; and further, that my present strong-room can be opened from the inside with perfect ease?

PARTING FOREVER.

SWEET, let me touch your hand;
Your little hand, with its fair rosy palm
And slender wrist, where the full pulse beats calm:
Sweet, let me touch your hand!

And let me kiss your lips;
Soft, ruby lips, that half conceal the pearl,
And half disclose it, in their dainty curl:
Sweet, let me kiss your lips!

Ah, well; we're parting now!
What has become of all the love you swore
Should be my own forever, evermore,
When we are parting now?

Not let me touch your hand?
Well, I remember when it lay at rest
In mine, a whole long summer's day caress'd—
And now not touch your hand?

Think of your broken vow.
You swore, with pretty oaths, as maidens do,
"By our last kiss, I will be true to you."
Think of that brok n vow.

What! not a word o say?
Ah, faithless sweet! you turn away your head,
And bite your lip until it glows more red;
But not one word to say!

Well then, clasp hands and part.
I see the angry blood flush in your cheek.
Ah, child! I thought you strong, and you are weak.
Let us clasp hands and part.

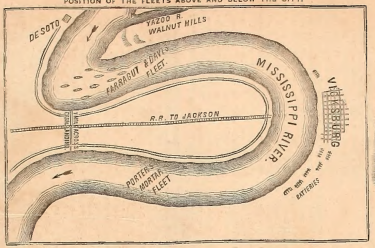
Some time the day may come,
Poor, fickle heart, when you will moan, and weep
True tears from faithless eyes that can not sleep—
Some time the day must come.

And so, weak heart, good-by!
When that day comes you will remember me;
Thinking it might have been, but may not be!
And so good-by—good-by!

CHAPERONS.

IT is a happy characteristic of our generation that philanthropic persons are not satisfied with relieving the suffering that thrusts itself upon their notice, but are constantly hunting for new kinds of misery to succor. So long as this benevolent spirit is abroad, we can not doubt that, sooner or later, the patient afflictions of the chaperon will attract its notice. Why should not her emancipation be attempted, now that we have emancipated every other enslaved or oppressed race? Is she not a woman and a sister, or, at least, a female relative? Why is she to be the only slave in the country?

Many curious kinds of villenage or serfdom grew up under the feudal system, and many curious rights prevailed under them. There was the right of feeding your cows upon a peasant's vineyard, and there was the right of opening a peasant and putting your feet inside him to keep them warm when you came home from hunting, and there were other rights more irritating still, the mention of which is only suitable for an antiquarian's pages. But the only one of these rights that appears to have survived to the present day is the villenage of the chaperon. The persons to whom it is incident are mothers of marriageable daughters until the possibility implied in that adjective is converted into a fact. The suit and service required under it is very severe. It is commonly performed at the hour when the human race in general are in bed. Under it the villein chaperon is bound to follow her liege young lady, at any hour of the evening at which she may be summoned, to dinner, party, or ball (generally the latter), there to sit or stand, as circumstances may require, for any number of hours, until such time of the night or morning as it shall please the aforesaid liege young lady to go home. The atmosphere in which this service is to be performed approaches as nearly to that of the Black Hole of Calcutta as the difference of climate will permit. No fatigue is admitted as an excuse either for not obeying the summons to go out, or for desiring to get back home to bed. Unless the liege young lady happens to be of an unusually merciful disposition, physical infirmity confers no exemption upon the villein. The only alleviation allowed to her is the relaxation of exchanging scandalous stories with other unhappy females in the same condition as herself, who may be standing by her side on the staircase, or ranged together with her along the wall, in the common performance of their long and toilsome duty. If her strength should fail her in the trial she must not look for mercy. One of the worst evils of slavery is the cruelty it begets in the master's heart. The young lady knows that her mother was created for no other purpose except to wait in corners or on staircases while she dances and flirts into the small hours of the night; and she has no notion of setting a divine institution at naught from any misplaced feelings of compassion.



Whether this is exactly the old people's view of the institution of chaperonage, we will not undertake to say; but it certainly is the young people's, and that, after all, is the important matter. The theory, which in former ages prevailed, that mothers underwent all the fatigue of the office as a favor to their daughters, is now quite obsolete. The subject has been more fully studied, and the object for which mothers exist is much better understood in the present day than it used to be in days of less enlightenment. They are not ornamental, nor, as a general rule, useful. It is obvious at first sight that they are not allowed to exist because they are pretty to look at. Nor do they exist for the sake of bringing up their daughters. Such a theory would be much too humiliating for the daughter to endure, and is certainly much too troublesome to be needlessly pressed on her by the mother. No doubt the use of mothers must be a profound mystery to young ladies while they are still in the hands of masters and governesses. But directly they come out of the schoolroom the mystery is solved. They recognize the wonderful adaptation by which a use is found for all created things, even the most useless; and they see at once that the final cause of mothers is to take young ladies out. For their part, they lose no opportunity of giving a full effect to this providential arrangement. The mothers submit meekly and do as they are told. They belonged to a generation when girls were admired for being languishing and helpless, and were trained accordingly; and they are, consequently, wholly incompetent to contend with the robust and athletic natures which the healthier taste of our age has developed in the existing race of young ladies. So they go unresistingly whenever the summons is issued; and if they are fortunate enough to get inside, are packed in tightly-fitted rows against the wall. There they contrive to exist in a semi-torpid condition, staring sleepily at the undulating mass before them, half-stifled by the atmosphere and each other's crinolines, until their daughters are satiated with the pleasures of that almost stationary embrace which in England is called a valse. Then, when their ordeal is over, they wearily rumble home by the morning's light, trying to remember where the next night's torture is to be passed. The wan complexion and pendulous cheeks which, about this time of the year, a well-employed chaperon begins to exhibit, would melt any but the stony heart of a fashionable daughter. The only consolation to them is the hope they constantly cherish that some day or other, in consequence of these exertions, they may transfer the duty of attending upon their pleasure-loving daughters to some deluded partner, and then their nocturnal servitude may be at an end. Of course this release sometimes does take place, but not so often as might be wished. There are few cases more pitiable than that of the veteran but unemancipated chaperon, whose daughters can not get married. Season after season they have to congratulate fellow-laborers who have escaped, while they remain in bondage; and night after night they have to follow the half-old-maid daughters, crosser and more desperate every year, to the scene of their fruitless labors. These are the cases we should recommend the most earnestly to the consideration of philanthropists. The emancipation of worn-out chaperons is surely an aim worthy of a section in the Social Science Association. There are many charities for the relief of far less deserving objects. Of course the machinery must differ slightly from the recognized machinery of such bodies. Instead of a Secretary and a Committee, and a Solicitor and a Banker, it would be necessary to have a corps of eligible and devoted young men. For it is obvious that the only mode in which the distressed chaperons in question could be emancipated would be by marrying off their unmarriageable daughters; and this would certainly entail some self-sacrifice upon the devoted young men. But surely it would not be more than the suffering to be relieved might fairly demand.

But if the chivalry of the young men is not equal to the scheme for liberating the chaperon, surely something might be done to alleviate her sufferings. We can quite sympathize with the reluctance of the ball-going world to abandon this time-honored institution. It is true that she is of no use. She can only, in reality, watch over her young charge's proceedings in the carriage on their way to and from the entertainment—at which time that amiable young person rarely misconducts herself in the way of flirting, for want of the male assistance necessary for that process. In the crowded ball-room itself the chaperon is, for all practical purposes of supervision, both blind and deaf. As she sits in the chaperons' row, an impenetrable veil of floating tarlatan prevents her from seeing tender glances, and a very industrious band of music equally precludes her from hearing any of those soft nothings that distill so sweetly through curled mustaches. But though she is useless as a fact, she is splendid as a fiction. She gives the shadow of respectability, and, where the reality is slipping away from us so very fast, it would be improvident to let the appearance go at the same time. But though we would never dream of abolishing the chaperon, surely there might be some economy of the labor employed, and therefore of the suffering inflicted. To sit against a wall staring at the backs of a crowd is an occupation which, no doubt, brings a great deal of moral heroism into play, but which does not require a great many hands, or rather eyes, to perform it. As a mere symbol or emblem of respectability, one old lady could fulfill the duty as well as a hundred. She might be told off for the service by an arrangement among the young ladies themselves, or a poor widow might be found to take the office for a consideration. An advantage of this plan would be that a little gallery might be provided for her, in which she should sit far above the heads of the crowd; and in that elevated position she would not only be a much more striking and conspicuous symbol of the respectability of the entertainment, but for the purpose of watching the proceedings she would be much more efficient than any number of wearied mothers along the wall below. She would not be engrossed by the occupation of struggling for breathing space, but would have full leisure for noting the manœuvres of the charming couples in the centre of the room. It would only be a revival of the plan by which abbesses of old used to chaperon their nuns. It does not differ very much from the mode in which constituencies keep watch over the frail beings whom they send to bear a part in the mazy dance of Parliament. The tendency toward unauthorized flirtations, and the danger of objectionable alliances, is greater there than in any ball-room; but, on the whole, the chaperons who sit in the reporters' gallery contrive to maintain to a very considerable extent the respectability of their charges. Fortified by such precedents, we can not but hope that we may live to see the adoption of a reform by which such a vast amount of anile misery will be saved.

FROM CAPTAIN WRAGGE TO MAGDALEN.

"BURNHAM, July 5, 1847.

"MY DEAR GIRL,—The box containing the articles of costume which you took away by mistake has come safely to hand. Consider it under my special protection until I hear from you again.

"I embrace this opportunity to assure you once more of my unalterable fidelity to your interests. Without attempting to intrude myself into your confidence, may I inquire whether Mr. Noel Vanstone has consented to do you justice? I greatly fear he has declined—in which case I can lay my hand on my heart, and solemnly declare that his meanness revolts me. Why do I feel a foreboding that you have appealed to him in vain? Why do I find myself viewing this fellow in the light of a noxious insect? We are total strangers to each other; I have no sort of knowledge of him, except the knowledge I picked up in making your inquiries. Has my intense sympathy with your interests made my perceptions prophetic? or, to put it fancifully, is there really such a thing as a former state of existence? and has Mr. Noel Vanstone mentally inscribed me —say, in some other planet?

"I write, my dear Magdalen, as you see, with my customary dash of humor. But I am serious in placing my services at your disposal. Don't let the question of terms cause you an instant's hesitation. I accept, beforehand, any terms you like to mention. If your present plan (and that way, I am ready to squeeze Mr. Noel Vanstone, in your interests, till the gold oozes out of him at every pore. Pardon the coarseness of this metaphor. My anxiety to be of service to you rushes into words, lays my meaning in the rough at your feet, and leaves your taste to polish it with the choicest ornaments of the English language.

"How is my unfortunate wife? I am afraid you find it quite impossible to keep her up at heel, or to mould her personal appearance into harmony with the eternal laws of symmetry and order. Does she attempt to be too familiar with you? I have always been accustomed to check her in this respect. She has never been permitted to call me any thing but Captain; and on the rare occasions, since our union, when circumstances may have obliged her to address me by letter, her opening form of salutation has been rigidly restricted to 'Dear Sir.' Accept these trifling domestic particulars as suggesting hints which may be useful to you in managing Mrs. Wragge; and believe me, in anxious expectation of hearing from you again,

"Devotedly yours,

"HORATIO WRAGGE."

III.

FROM SORAH TO MAGDALEN.

[Forwarded, with the Two Letters that follow it, from the Post-office, Birmingham.]

"WESTWOOD AND HOUSE, KENSINGTON, July 1.

"MY DEAREST MAGDALEN,—When you write next (and pray write soon!) address your letter to me at Miss Garth's. I have left my situation, and some little time may elapse before I find another.

"Now it is all over, I may acknowledge to you, my darling, that I was not happy. I tried hard to win the affection of the two little girls I had to teach; but they seemed, I am sure I can't tell why, to dislike me from the first. Their mother I have no reason to complain of. But their grandmother, who was really the ruling power in the house, made my life very hard to me. My inexperience in teaching was a constant subject of remark with her; and my difficulties with the children were always visited on me as if they had been entirely of my own making. I tell you this, so that you may not suppose I regret having left my situation. For from it my love—I am glad to be out of the house.

"I have saved a little money, Magdalen, and I should so like to spend it in staying a few days with you! My heart aches for a sight of my sister; my ears are weary for the sound of her voice. A word from you, telling me where we can meet, is all I want. Think of it—pray think of it!

"Don't suppose I am discouraged by this first check. There are many kind people in the world, and some of them may employ me next time. The way to happiness is often very hard to find—harder, I almost think, for women than for men. But if we only try patiently, and try long enough, we reach it at last—in Heaven, if not on earth. I thank my way now in the very which leads to seeing you again. Don't forget that, my love, the next time you think of "NORAH."

IV.

FROM MISS GARTH TO MAGDALEN.

"WESTMORELAND HOUSE, July 1.

"MY DEAR MAGDALEN,—You have no useless remonstrances to apprehend at the sight of my handwriting. My only object in this letter is to tell you something which I know your sister will not tell you of her own accord. She is entirely ignorant that I am writing to you. Keep her in ignorance, if you wish to spare her unnecessary anxiety, and me unnecessary distress.

"Norah's letter, no doubt, tells you that she has left her situation. I feel it my painful duty to add that she has left it on your account.

"The matter occurred in this manner: Messrs. Wyatt, Pendril, and Gwilt are the solicitors of the gentleman in whose family Norah was employed. The life which you have chosen for yourself was known, as long ago as December last, to all the partners. You were discovered performing in public at Derby by the person who had been employed to trace you at York; and that discovery was communicated by Mr. Wyatt to Norah's employer a few days since, in reply to direct inquiries about you on that gentleman's part. His wife and his mother (who lives with him) had expressly desired that he would make those inquiries, their doubts having been aroused by Norah's evasive answers when they questioned her about her sister. You know Norah too well to blame her for this. Evasion was the only escape your present life had left her from telling a downright falsehood.

"That same day the two ladies of the family, the elder and the younger, sent for your sister, and told her they had discovered that you were a public performer, roaming from place to place in the country, under an assumed name. They were just enough not to blame Norah for this; they were just enough to acknowledge that her conduct had been as irreproachable as I had guaranteed it should be when I got her the situation. But, at the same time, they made it a positive condition of her continuing in their employment that she should never permit you to visit her at their house, or to meet her and walk out with her when she was in attendance on the children. Your sister—who has patiently borne all hardships that fell on herself—instantly resented the slur cast on you. She gave her employers warning on the spot. High words followed, and she left the house that evening.

"I have no wish to distress you by representing the loss of this situation in the light of a disaster. Norah was not so happy in it as I had hoped and believed she would be. It was impossible for me to know beforehand that the children were sullen and intractable, or that the husband's mother was accustomed to make her domineering disposition felt by every one in the house. I will readily admit that Norah is well out of this situation. But the harm does not stop here. For all you and I know to the contrary, the harm may go on. What has happened in this situation may happen in another. Your way of life, however pure your conduct may be—and I will do you the justice to believe it pure—is a suspicious way of life to all respectable people. I have lived long enough in this world to know that the Sense of Propriety, in nine Englishwomen out of ten, makes no allowances and feels no pity. Norah's next employers may discover you, and Norah may throw up a situation next time which we may never be able to find for her again.

"I leave you to consider this. My child! don't think I am hard on you. I am jealous for your sister's tranquillity. If you will forget the past, Magdalen, and come back—trust to your old governess to forget it too, and to give you the home which your father and mother once gave her.

"Your friend, my dear, always,
"HARRIET GARTH."

V.

FROM FRANCIS CLARE, JUN., TO MAGDALEN.

"SHANGHAI, CHINA, April 23, 1847.

"MY DEAR MAGDALEN,—I have deferred answering your letter in consequence of the distracted state of my mind, which made me unfit to write to you. I am still unfit—but I feel I ought to delay no longer. My sense of honor fortifies me, and I undergo the pain of writing this letter.

"My prospects in China are all at an end. The Firm to which I was brutally consigned as if I was a bale of merchandise has worn out my patience by a series of petty insults, and I have felt compelled, from motives of self-respect, to withdraw my services, which were undervalued from the first. My returning to England, under these circumstances, is out of the question. I have been too cruelly used in my own country to wish to go back to it, even if I could. I propose embarking on board a private trading vessel in these seas, in a mercantile capacity, to make my way, if I can, for myself. How it will end, or what will happen to me next, is more than I can say. It matters little what becomes of me. I am a wanderer and an exile, entirely through the fault of others. The unfeeling desire at home to get rid of me has accomplished its object. I am got rid of for good.

"There is only one more sacrifice left for me to make—the sacrifice of my heart's dearest feelings. With no prospects before me, with no chance of coming home, what hope can I feel of performing my engagement to yourself? None! A more selfish man than I am might hold you to that engagement; a less considerate man than I am might keep you waiting for years, and to no purpose after all. Cruelly as they have been trampled on, my feelings are too sensitive to allow me to do this. I write it with the tears in my eyes—you shall not link your fate to an outcast. Accept these heart-broken lines as releasing you from your promise. Our engagement is at an end.

"The one consolation which supports me in bidding you farewell is, that neither of us is to blame. You may have acted weakly, under my father's influence, but I am sure you acted for the best. Nobody knew what the fatal consequences of driving me out of England would be but myself, and I was not listened to. I yielded to my father, I yielded to you, and this is the end of it!

"I am suffering too acutely to write more. May you never know what my withdrawal from our engagement has cost me! I beg you will not blame yourself. It is not your fault that I have had all my energies misdirected by others—it is not your fault that I have never had a fair chance of getting on in life. Forget the deserted wretch who breathes his heartfelt prayers for your happiness, and who will ever remain your friend and well-wisher,

"FRANCIS CLARE, JUN."

VI.

FROM FRANCIS CLARE, SEN., TO MAGDALEN.

(Inclosing the Preceding Letter.)

"I always told your poor father my son was a Fool; but I never knew he was a Scoundrel until the mail came in from China. I have every reason to believe that he has left his employers under the most disgraceful circumstances. Forget him from this time forth, as I do. When you and I last set eyes on each other you behaved well to me in this business. All I can now say in return I do say. My girl, I am sorry for you. F. C."

VII.

FROM MRS. WRAGGE TO HER HUSBAND.

"dear sir for mercy's sake come here and help us She had a dreadful letter I don't know what yesterday but she read it in bed and when I went in with her breakfast I found her dead and if the doctor had not been two doors off nobody else could have brought her to life again and she sits and looks dreadful and wont speak a word her eyes frighten me so I shake from head to foot oh please do come I keep things as tidy as I can and I do like her so and she used to be so kind to me and the landlord says he's afraid she'll destroy herself I wish I could write straight but I do shake so your dutiful wife matilda wragge excuse faults and beg you on my knees come and help us the Doctor good man will put some of his own writing into this for fear you can't make out mine and remain once more your dutiful wife matilda wragge."

[Added by the Doctor.]

"Sir,—I beg to inform you that I was yesterday called in to a neighbor's, in Vauxhall Walk, to attend a young lady who had been suddenly taken ill. I recovered her with great difficulty from one of the most obstinate fainting fits I ever remember to have met with. Since that time she has had no relapse, but there is apparently some heavy distress weighing on her mind, which it has hitherto been found impossible to remove. She sits, as I am informed, perfectly silent and perfectly unconscious of what goes on about her, for hours together, with a letter in her hand, which she will allow nobody to take from her. If this state of depression continues very distressing mental consequences may follow; and I only do my duty in suggesting that some relative or friend should interfere, who has influence enough to rouse her.

"Your obedient servant,
"RICHARD JARVIS, M.R.C.S."

VIII.

FROM NORAH TO MAGDALEN.

"July 5.

"For God's sake, write me one line to say if you are still at Birmingham, and where I can find you there! I have just heard from old Mr. Clare. Oh, Magdalen, if you have no pity on yourself, have some pity on me! The thought of you alone among strangers, the thought of you heart-broken under this dreadful blow, never leaves me for an instant. No words can tell how I feel for you! My own love, remember the better days at home before that cowardly villain stole his way into your heart; remember the happy time at Combe-Raven, when we were always together. Oh, don't, don't treat me like a stranger! We are alone in the world now—let me come and comfort you—let me be more than a sister to you, if I can. One line—only one line to tell me where I can find you!"

IX.

FROM MAGDALEN TO NORAH.

"July 7.

"MY DEAREST NORAH,—All that your love for me can wish your letter has done. You, and you alone, have found your way to my heart. I could think again, I could feel again, after reading what you have written to me. Let this assurance quiet your anxieties. My mind lives and breathes once more—it was dead until I got your letter.

"The shock I have suffered has left a strange quietness in me. I feel as if I had parted from my former self—as if the hopes, once so dear to me, had all gone back to some past time, from which I am now far removed. I can look at the wreck of my life more calmly, Norah, than you could look at it if we were both together again. I can trust myself already to write of Frank.

"My darling, I think no woman ever knows how utterly she has given herself up to the man she loves until that man has ill-treated her. Can you pity my weakness if I confess to having felt a pang at my heart, when I read that part of your letter which calls Frank a coward and a villain? Nobody can despise me for this, as I despise myself. I am like a dog who crawls back and licks the master's hand that has beaten him. But it is so—I would confess it to nobody but you—indeed, indeed it is so. He has deceived and deserted me; he has written me a cruel farewell—but don't call him a villain! If he repented and came back to me I would die rather than marry him now, but it grates on me to see that word coward written against him in your hand! If he is weak of purpose, who tried his weakness beyond what it could bear? Do you think this would have happened if Michael Vanstone had not robbed us of our own, and forced Frank away from me to China? In a week from to-day the year of waiting would have come to an end; and I should have been Frank's wife, if my marriage portion had not been taken from me.

"You will say, after what has happened, it is well that I have escaped. My love! there is something perverse in my heart which answers, No! Better have been Frank's wretched wife than the free woman I am now.

"I have not written to him. He sends me no address at which I could write even if I would. But I have not the wish. I will wait before I send him my farewell. If a day ever comes when I have the fortune which my father once promised I should bring to him—do you know what I would do with it? I would send it all to Frank, as my revenge on him for his letter; as the last farewell word, on my side, to the man who has deserted me. Let me live for that day! Let me live, Norah, in the hope of better times for you, which is all the hope I have left. When I think of your hard life, I can almost feel the tears once more in my weary eyes—I can almost think I have come back again to my former self.

"You will not think me hard-hearted and ungrateful if I say that we must wait a little yet before we meet? I want to be more fit to see you than I am now. I want to put Frank farther away from me, and to bring you nearer still. Are these good reasons? I don't know—don't ask me for reasons. Take the kiss I have put for you here, where the little circle is drawn on the paper, and let that bring us together for the present, till I write again. Good-by, my love. My heart is true to you, Norah, but I dare not see you yet. MAGDALEN."

X.

FROM MAGDALEN TO MISS GARTH.

"July 15.

"MY DEAR MISS GARTH,—I have been long in answering your letter; but you know what has happened, and you will forgive me.

"All that I have to say may be said in few words. You may depend on my never making the general Sense of Propriety my enemy again: I am getting knowledge enough of the world to make it my accomplice next time. Norah will never leave another situation on my account—my life, as a public performer, is at an end. It was harmless enough, God knows—I may live, and so may you, to mourn the day when I parted from it—but I shall never return to it again. It has left me, as Frank has left me, as all my better thoughts have left me—except my thoughts of Norah.

"Enough of myself! Shall I tell you some news to brighten this dull letter? Mr. Michael Vanstone is dead, and Mr. Noel Vanstone has succeeded to the possession of my fortune and Norah's. He is quite worthy of his inheritance. In his father's place he would have ruined us as his father did.

"I have no more to say that you would care to know. Don't be distressed about me. I am trying to recover my spirits—I am trying to forget the poor deluded girl who was foolish enough to be fond of Frank, in the old days at Combe-Raven. Sometimes a pang comes which tells me the girl won't be forgotten—but not often.

"It was very kind of you, when you wrote to such a lost creature as I am, to sign yourself—always my friend? 'Always' is a bold word, my dear old governess! I wonder whether you will ever want to recall it? It will make no difference if you do, in the gratitude I shall always feel for the trouble you took with me when I was a little girl. I have ill repaid that trouble—ill repaid your kindness to me in after-life. I ask your pardon and your pity. The best thing you can do for both of us is to forget me. Affectionately yours, MAGDALEN.

"P.S.—I open the envelope to add one line. For God's sake, don't show this letter to Norah!"

XI.

FROM MAGDALEN TO CAPTAIN WRAGGE.

"VAUXHALL WALK, July 17.

"If I am not mistaken, it was arranged that I should write to you at Birmingham, as soon as I felt myself composed enough to think of the future. My mind is settled at last, and I am now able to accept the services which you have unreservedly offered to me.

"I beg you will forgive the manner in which I received you, on your arrival in this house, after hearing the news of my sudden illness. I was quite incapable of controlling myself—I was suffering an agony of mind which for the time deprived me of my senses. It is only your due that I should now thank you for treating me with great forbearance, at a time when forbearance was mercy.

"I will mention what I wish you to do, as plainly and briefly as I can.

"In the first place, I request you to dispose (as privately as possible) of every article of costume used in the dramatic Entertainment. I have done with our performances forever, and I wish to be set free from every thing which might accidentally connect me with them in the future. The key of my box is inclosed in this letter.

"The other box, which contains my own dress-

"PRAY ALLOW ME TO TAKE YOUR ORDER FOR THE TEA, AND TO BRING IT WITH MY OWN PARCELS."

es, you will be kind enough to forward to this house. I do not ask you to bring it yourself, because I have a far more important commission to intrust to you.

"Referring to the note which you left for me at your departure, I conclude that you have by this time traced Mr. Noel Vanstone from Vauxhall Walk to the residence which he is now occupying. If you have made the discovery—and if you are quite sure of not having drawn the attention either of Mrs. Lecount or her master to yourself—I wish you to arrange immediately for my residing (with you and Mrs. Wragge) in the same town or village in which Mr. Noel Vanstone has taken up his abode. I write this, it is hardly necessary to say, under the impression that wherever he may now be living he is settled in the place for some little time.

"If you can find a small furnished house for me on these conditions, which is to be let by the month, take it for a month certain to begin with. Say that it is for your wife, your niece, and yourself, and use any assumed name you please, as long as it is a name which can be trusted to defeat the most suspicious inquiries. I leave this to your experience in such matters. The secret of who we really are must be kept as strictly as if it was a secret on which our lives depend.

"Any expenses to which you may be put in carrying out my wishes I will immediately repay. If you easily find the sort of house I want, there is no need for your returning to London to fetch us. We can join you as soon as we know where to go. The house must be perfectly respectable, and must be reasonably near to Mr. Noel Vanstone's present residence, wherever that is.

"You must allow me to be silent in this letter as to the object which I have now in view. I am unwilling to risk an explanation in writing. When all our preparations are made you shall hear what I propose to do from my own lips; and I shall expect you to tell me plainly in return whether you will, or will not, give me the help I want, on the best terms which I am able to offer you.

"One word more before I seal up this letter.

"If any opportunity falls in your way, after you have taken the house and before we join you, of exchanging a few civil words either with Mr. Noel Vanstone or Mrs. Lecount, take advantage of it. It is very important to my present object that we should become acquainted with each other—as the purely accidental result of our being near neighbors. I want you to smooth the way toward this end, if you can, before Mrs. Wragge and I come to you. Pray throw away no chance of observing Mrs. Lecount in particular very carefully. Whatever help you can give me at the outset in blindfolding that woman's sharp eyes will be the most precious help I have ever received at your hands.

"There is no need to answer this letter immediately—unless I have written it under a mistaken impression of what you have accomplished since leaving London. I have taken our lodgings on for another week, and I can wait to hear from you until you are able to send me such news as I wish to receive. You may be quite sure of my patience for the future, under all possible circumstances. My caprices are at an end, and my violent temper has tried your forbearance for the last time. MAGDALEN."

XII.

FROM CAPTAIN WRAGGE TO MAGDALEN.

"NORTH SHINGLES VILLA,
ALDBOROUGH, SUFFOLK, July 22.

"MY DEAR GIRL,—Your letter has charmed and touched me. Your excuses have gone straight to my heart, and your confidence in my humble abilities has followed in the same direction. The pulse of the old militiaman throbs with pride as he thinks of the trust you have placed in him, and vows to deserve it. Don't be surprised at this genial outburst. All enthusiastic natures must explode occasionally, and my form of explosion is—Words.

"Every thing you wanted me to do is done. The house is taken; the name is found; and I am personally acquainted with Mrs. Lecount. After reading this general statement you will naturally be interested in possessing your mind next of the accompanying details. Here they are, at your service.

"The day after leaving you in London I traced Mr. Noel Vanstone to this curious little sea-side snuggery. One of his father's innumerable bargains was a house at Aldborough—a rising watering-place, or Mr. Michael Vanstone would not have invested a farthing in it. In this house the despicable little miser, who lived rent-free in London, now lives rent-free again, on the coast of Suffolk. He is settled in his present abode for the summer and autumn; and you and Mrs. Wragge have only to join me here to be established five doors away from him in this elegant villa. I have got the whole house for three guineas a week, with the option of remaining through the autumn at the same price. In a fashionable watering-place such a residence would have been cheap at double the money.

"Our new name has been chosen with a wary eye to your suggestions. My Books—I hope you have not forgotten my Books?—contain, under the heading of Skins to Jump Into, a list of individuals retired from this mortal scene, with whose names, families, and circumstances I am well acquainted. Into some of those Skins I have been compelled to Jump, in the exercise of my profession, at former periods of my career. Others are still in the condition of new dresses, and remain to be tried on. The Skin which will exactly fit us originally clothed the bodies of a family named Bygrave. I am in Mr. Bygrave's skin at this moment—and it fits without a wrinkle. If you will oblige me by slipping into Miss Bygrave (Christian name, Susan); and if you will afterward push Mrs. Wragge—any how; head-foremost if you like—into Mrs. Bygrave (Christian name, Julia), the transformation will be complete. Permit me to inform you that I am your paternal uncle. My worthy brother was established, twenty years ago, in the mahogany and logwood trade at Belize, Honduras. He died in that place, and is buried in the south-west side of the local cemetery, with a neat monument of native wood carved by a self-taught negro artist. Nineteen months afterward his wife died of apoplexy at a boarding-house in Cheltenham. She was supposed to be the most corpulent woman in England, and was accommodated on the ground-floor of the house in consequence of the difficulty of getting her up and down stairs. You are her only child; you have been under my care since the sad event in Cheltenham; you are twenty years old on the second of August next; and, corpulence excepted, you are the living image of your mother. I trouble you with these specimens of my intimate knowledge of our new family Skin, to quiet your mind on the subject of future inquiries. Trust to me and my Books to satisfy any amount of inquiry. In the mean time write down our new name and address, and see how they strike you—'Mr. Bygrave, Mrs. Bygrave, Miss Bygrave, North Shingles Villa, Aldborough.' Upon my life, it reads remarkably well!

"The last detail I have to communicate refers to my acquaintance with Mrs. Lecount.

"We met yesterday, in the grocer's shop here. Keeping my ears open, I found that Mrs. Lecount wanted a particular kind of tea, which the man had not got, and which he believed could not be procured any nearer than Ipswich. I instantly saw my way to beginning an acquaintance, at the trifling expense of a journey to that flourishing city. 'I have business to-day in Ipswich,' I said, 'and I propose returning to Aldborough (if I can get back in time) this evening. Pray allow me to take your order for the tea, and to bring it back with my own parcels.' Mrs. Lecount politely declined giving me the trouble—I politely insisted on taking it. We fell into conversation. There is no need to trouble you with our talk. The result of it on my mind is—that Mrs. Lecount's one weak point, if she has such a thing at all, is a taste for science, implanted by her deceased husband, the Professor. I think I see a chance here of working my way into her good graces, and casting a little needful dust into those handsome black eyes of hers. Acting on this idea, when I purchased the lady's tea at Ipswich I also bought on my own account that far-famed pocket manual of knowledge, 'Joyce's Scientific Dialogues.' Possessing, as I do, a quick memory and boundless confidence in myself, I propose privately inflating my new skin with as much ready-made science as it will hold, and presenting Mr. Bygrave to Mrs. Lecount's notice in the character of the most highly informed man she has met with since the Professor's death. The necessity of blindfolding that woman (to use your own admirable expression) is as clear to me as to you. If it is to be done in the way I propose, make your mind easy—Wragge, inflated by Joyce, is the man to do it.

"You now have my whole budget of news. Am I, or am I not, worthy of your confidence in me? I say nothing of my devouring anxiety to know what your objects really are—that anxiety will be satisfied when we meet. Never yet, my dear girl, did I long to administer a productive pecuniary Squeeze to any human creature as I long to administer it to Mr. Noel Vanstone. I say no more. Verbum sap. Pardon the pedantry of a Latin quotation, and believe me,

"Entirely yours,
"HORATIO WRAGGE.

"P.S.—I await my instructions, as you requested. You have only to say whether I shall return to London for the purpose of escorting you to this place, or whether I shall wait here to receive you. The house is in perfect order—the weather is charming—and the sea is as smooth as Mrs. Lecount's apron. She has just passed the window, and we have exchanged bows. A sharp woman, my dear Magdalen, but Joyce and I together may prove a trifle too much for her."

XIII.

[Extract from the East Suffolk Argus.]

"ALDBOROUGH.—We notice with pleasure the arrival of visitors to this healthful and far-famed watering-place earlier in the season than usual during the present year. Esto perpetua is all we have to say.

"VISITORS' LIST.—Arrivals since our last: North Shingles Villa—Mrs. Bygrave; Miss Bygrave."

The August number of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE contains the opening Chapters of "Romola," by Miss EVANS, the Author of "Adam Bede," "Scenes of Clerical Life," "The Mill on the Floss," and "Silas Marner." It is printed with the Original Illustrations, from early sheets, furnished in advance of its publication in England. The opening scenes are laid at Florence, in the year of the discovery of America by Columbus. A perusal of these chapters must assure our readers that they will have no reason to regret that so much space has been given to this Tale. The immediate termination of Mr. THACKERAY'S "Philip" will leave us space for our usual variety of Articles, in addition to the three Serial Tales "Romola," "Orley Farm," and "Mistress and Maid."

We commend the paper on "South Carolina Nullifiers" and the biographical sketch of JOHN P. KENNEDY, to the careful perusal of those who wish to study the inception and progress of the present struggle in which we are engaged.

As an Illustrated Magazine, HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY has no rival. Whenever it is possible for the Artist to aid the Writer his services have been called into requisition. The expense for illustrations alone exceeds the entire cost of the literary and artistic matter of any other similar periodical.

The various Editorial Departments comprise Essays and Notes upon the current topics of the day, at home and abroad, with Anecdotes and Facetiæ furnished by hundreds of voluntary contributors in every section of the country. The "Monthly Record of Current Events" presents a connected history of the leading events of the month. In the last Volume, every important incident of the war, from the sailing of the Port Royal Expedition to the victory at Pittsburg Landing, is recorded; with a copious Index, which will enable the reader to refer at once to each.

CUTTING THE CANAL OPPOSITE VICKSBURG.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

VICKSBURG.

We reproduce on page 484 a drawing of the CITY OF VICKSBURG, Mississippi, which has been here-tofore held by Confederate Porter's mortar-fleet and Commodore Farragut's gun-boats and ships of war. This is the ship described:

Vicksburg is the first point at which the rebels commenced the erection of works for blockading the Mississippi, and it is quite fitting that she should be the last strongheld to fall. The Vicksburgers were foremost in the inception of the rebellion, and the vote cast here for the secession of Mississippi was almost unanimous.

The city made prompt and liberal appropriations for putting the city in a condition of defence, and it was generally resolved that no boat should be allowed to pass in either direction that should not first obtain permission from the proper power of the Davis confederacy.

The city of Vicksburg is situated on the Walnut Hills, a range of wooded eminences about one hundred feet high, which command the river for miles above and below them. Their abrupt, precipitous elevation from the river, and the ground rising in rear for a long distance in every direction, and with its series of ravines and ridges, covered with trees, with extensive plantations, forms a picture of great picturesque beauty. The main portion of the city is back from the water, and above it the hills are crowned with elegant private residences, and on the conspicuous points the high walls of the public buildings. The Court-house, a huge structure of light colored brick, with a cupola and dome, rises on the hills, and is visible for a long distance up and down the river. The streets from the river front rise by a steep and difficult ascent, and are cut with a regular grade, which renders the city easy of access. The streets are broad, but narrow, when viewed from the water, which appears as if the houses were built upon terraces one above another, and the lower range of one-story houses are shadowless, visible over the roof of the building in its immediate front.

Above and below Vicksburg the hills are crowned with the batteries that the rebels have erected for the defence of the entrance, the most of them being placed at the lower end of the bend, as this is the most danger-ous, and consequently the most quarrel. One tier of batteries is placed near the top of the hill and another about half-way down the declivity to the water. A ziggak row of water-batteries, mounting 30 or 40 heavy guns, is located near the water's edge, at the bend, and is probably designed to repel all attacks from the river, and to command short range. The remainder of the hill on the upper end is mounted with guns, one below the other, as none of our guns can be elevated sufficiently to reach them, while their shot, with a long range and great power, can be made to plunge through our decks, and thereby enhance their destructive effect when they reach them. The batteries above the town are mainly placed on the upper hills, though one mounting four heavy guns is placed almost at the very water's edge, in position to sweep the river both above and below.

On page 481 we give an illustration of CUTTING THE CANAL, from a sketch by our artist, Mr. Theodore R. DAVIS. The correspondence of the Memphis Tribune thus describes the work and its progress:

It is not a canal, but simply a ditch. When waterired it will be about 60 feet wide at the top, and 30 feet at the bed, the soil which is that of the bottom, is sufficient to prevent the river overflow. It was then about 15 feet wide, and 10 deep. Above and a half below the point that was surveyed, was of sufficient depth to allow the water of the river to flow through, but what was the use of the work if it was cut through, it was found to be above the level of the river. The river had fallen a foot since the process of digging, but not enough to account for so great a shortcoming.

The negroes would not come to Mohammed, and some decisive step must be made to make it. Digging an old stern-wheel boat at the lower side of the entrance to the canal, to work her wheel, and to paddle the water up into it, which succeeded in washing the bottom of the canal just below the entrance, but no more. The experiment of making water run up hill was considered very successful, it was determined to deepen the ditch. The boat was worked for half a day, when, finding that few were the men left at the bottom, laughingly, was day five feet deeper, the entire length of the canal, and the earth being thrown up on each half of the original bottom, and so that a traverse section of the canal would show this:

In this means a small thread of water, about a foot wide, was deepened as it were it remains as a channel, and is now much healthier as though it did not know where to run to. The entire south side of the canal is now one broad of loose earth, thrown up from the deepening, and should the river rise sufficient to make a current through the canal, I think this loose earth would be undermined by the current, and carried down with the water, and the south-side to stay the current. The labor of widening the ditch would also be equal to that of deepening it.

Independent of this, another fact is to be taken into consideration. The water in the river is not clear, but muddy, the current is very rapid, and, upon which Vicksburg is built. In front of Vicksburg it is said to be 200 feet deep, and consequently deeper than it could cut down to, and that it is 200 feet deep for more than a mile above and below the steamboat landing at Vicksburg. Boats have also been informed that soundings were made by the flag-ship Hartford, during her passage up the river, and that 200 feet of line, without finding bottom, and when the Hartford is now anchored, which is above the upper portion of the bend, and where the river is much wider, and consequently more shallow, I saw that the water was still in thirteen fathoms of water. Now, even with a free current, running through the canal, it would require a much larger body of banks for the river to cut itself a new channel 200 or 300 feet deep, and it is not supposed in the least time for it to do the deep channel in front of Vicksburg, and so leave it out in the rear, as the present bend now is, of which there is some danger of the river leaving canal on still shorter cuts. They say that all the wonderful cut-offs that have been made in the course of the river have begun at a point where the main current of the river has impinged, and that the shore of some bend in the rear or end of the canal is unfortunately located in an eddy, the current striking the shore near the half a mile below. As for the number of contrabands at work on the canal, they are not numerous, averaging, as I am informed, 300 per day, though the number has been increased lately, and are soldiers, and are not to be relied upon for much labor, and are not accustomed to any work. This is as it should be, only that the number should be increased to 3,000 or 4,000, and made to do something when they are at work. Their present number does not exceed 600, but can easily be doubled or trebled.

THE HOPELESSNESS OF THE REBELLION.

NOW that the progress of recruiting and the natural elasticity of the American mind have dispelled the gloom which settled on the spirits of the public after the check before Richmond, it may be timely to draw attention to the fact that wherever may occur in Virginia, whatever checks our arms may encounter in the progression of the campaign, the rebellion can not, whether we take Richmond or no, the fate of the rebellion has been already finally determined, and its collapse is a mere question of time. General Scott's plan for the overthrow of the great insurrection was to shut up the rebels; to close their ports, hold fast the Potomac and the Ohio, and to leave them to repent at leisure. That eminent soldier and statesman knew that an indigenous people must depend for their nourishment within prescribed limits, and that, after a few months' trial of Japanese fare, the Southerners must be thankful for readmission to the world at any cost.

General M'Clellan improved upon this plan by adding to it the blockade of the Mississippi on the line of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, from Memphis on the Mississippi to Charleston on the Atlantic.

These plans have been measurably carried out. The cost blockade is so perfect that even the British are beginning to discover that it is effective. We hold beyond dispute the line of the Potomac, and further west, we are in force on a line from Harper's Ferry to Memphis—considerably south of the line traced by General Scott. The Mississippi River is so far controlled as to cut our own and keep out all, and no bodies of troops or cargoes of supplies can cross it without permission from our gun-boats. Finally we have established this by occupation from Memphis to Decatur, and almost within sight of Chattanooga, which, we trust, will soon be the case also.

To expect that we conclude to stop fighting here, and merely to hold what we have got, is the Southern fantasy with which the people is fly under an inverted glass, with the addition of small openings for the admission of air, and the edge of the glass and covered from the sun. How long can we fly thrive in this agreeable condition?

It is proper that we should thoroughly beat the rebel army in Virginia and take Richmond, and both of these things will be done in due time. But if we did neither, the rebel Confederacy would none the less collapse within a given period. Disorganized, they, and the dread of negro equality may for a time restrain the rebels in their present absorbing devotion to the cause; but it is most certain that every observer will realize that there is something better to be done in the world than hopelessly fighting and starving. It might take longer than a year or two; but at last the absolute necessity of intercourse with the foreign world, and the impossibility of living entirely upon fresh air, civilization, letters, and the comforts and luxuries of life, would overpower the wicked impulses of treason and awaken the South to common sense.

Southern sympathizers lay stress upon the guerrilla war in Tennessee, Kentucky, and Virginia. These are annoying; but practically they do more harm than good to the rebels. The great cause was ever largely a guerrilla warfare. It injures the non-combatant more than the soldier; women and children more than men. It exasperates the people to the resistance in which it is carried on. It partakes of the nature of private robbery and murder, and its authors are generally known as thieves and murderers. The raids of John Morgan and his compeers are converting the sometime neutrals of Kentucky into violent secessionists, and the more attacks on peaceful villages, a few more attempts to impede the navigation of the Tennessee and Ohio, and Jefferson Davis is that region will be, in spirit, a Patron Brownlow.

THE WORK OF CONGRESS.

CONGRESS adjourned on 17th, after a session of rather more than seven months, and thus the Cromwell-like dictatorship of Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, was to clear the Halls at the earliest day he proposed, has missed his opportunity.

There were many foolish speeches made during the session, and some foolish acts or pretended acts passed. Several members were so nearly idiotic in sympathy for the rebels that they would have been more at home at Richmond than at Washington. And, on the other hand, the majority composed of sensible men, whose unpracticable theories and unyielding prejudices have undoubtedly done harm to the national cause.

But, on the whole, the work of Congress has been thorough and wholesome. No Congress since the Revolution has done so nearly a responsibility; it must be admitted that, in the main, it has been faithfully discharged.

The most important acts of Congress—its financial measures—were referred to in our last number. Experience alone can decide upon their merits, but we think they will stand the test. They certainly provide the Government with money to carry on the war, and, if efficiently administered, will secure a revenue which will protect the national credit from disgrace.

Next to these in immediate importance, and superior to them in their ultimate influence upon the destiny of the nation, are the various measures referring to slavery. That institution has been assailed at every point. In the first place, it has been entirely abolished in the District of Columbia. Next, it has been prohibited in the Territories, and in the United States, and in Florida. Finally, a resolution of Congress tenders to any State which proposes to abolish slavery an indemnity sufficient to recompense slaveowners for the loss of their slaves. Besides these sweeping enactments, the Senate has ratified a new treaty with Great Britain concerning the slave-trade, by which that iniquitous traffic will at last be thoroughly suppressed. Last of all, a series of laws directed to every one of the points lines all fugitive slaves, and not to surrender them to their owners; the President has been authorized to employ, in any capacity whatever, either in the military or naval service, all such fugitive slaves; and the slaves of all open rebels have been declared forfeit, and the President has been directed to set them free. The opponents of slavery—the cause and mainspring of the rebellion—can not complain that Congress has been overindulgent to the institution.

An important complement to the anti-slavery legislation of the session has been the reorganization of the Supreme Court. The new Judiciary Administration the Supreme Court was the most reliable instrument of the slaveholders. Their influence at Washington always prevented the North from obtaining a fair representation there, and when a pro-slavery administration the Supreme Court was always ready to render it—as in the famous Dred Scott case. Congress has abolished this by re-organizing the United States Judicial Districts according to population; giving to the free North six of the nine Justices, and the new circuit assigned to the Supreme Bench. If any of the anti-slavery measures of Congress are charged with unconstitutionality, they will be sure to be sustained by a tribunal not hopelessly biased against their spirit and their purpose.

Most important have been placed in the hands of the President for the prosecution of the war. There is, practically, no limit to the number of volunteers which he may call into the field, and to the number of vessels of war which he may equip and send to sea; and, besides this, a discretionary power of conscription, in case of need, to call out the entire militia of the North—amounting, in round numbers, to four millions of men. If, therefore, in the contests with the rebels we should be outnumbered the responsibility will rest upon the President. The new Militia act will probably have the effect of convincing the few remaining partisans of intervention in Europe that they had better give up the idea.

The Confiscation Act defines the crime of treason against the United States, and pronounces various penalties for those adjudged guilty—from death to a fine. It likewise declares that forfeiture for property and life, the interest in their real estate shall be forfeit to the United States. As the President, however, is empowered to pardon convicts, or to release the penalties of the Act, it will not probably be very rigorously executed. As soon as the rebel armies are thoroughly beaten a general amnesty—excepting the ringleaders—will be a matter of course.

Other important measures passed at the late session are the Homestead Law and the Pacific Railroad Act. The first will exercise a powerful influence on the future course of population, and will have a tendency still further to shift the seat of empire toward the North-West. The last will bring us much closer to our Pacific States, and will obviate the risk we now run of being at some time or other obliged to seize the Isthmus of Panama in that region will be, in spirit, a Patron Brownlow.

The last will bring us much closer to our Pacific States, and will obviate the risk we now run of being at some time or other obliged to seize the Isthmus of Panama in that region to preserve our communication with California. Many years will elapse before the railroad is built. But when it will be built no doubt can be entertained the stupendous railway enterprises of the West can doubt.

Congress did not pass a Bankrupt Bill, which was much desired by merchants; and Mr. Chase's new Banking Law was likewise left over, we think unwisely. A new banking system can not well be introduced in time of war. When peace has been restored it will be time enough to consider the matter. And next session, either, that we regret the failure of the bill to admit the new State of Western Virginia. To say nothing of the constitutional difficulties, it is quite possible that, by the time Congress again meets, the whole of Virginia may be in the Union, and the people may be ready to adopt the Constitution now offered by the western portion of the State.

THE LOUNGER.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

THERE are many who think these are the darkest days of the war. Very well; you may so call them if you see any darker! We are as strong as ever, and the rebellion is no stronger. The change is in our perception of its magnitude. It is not a fact, as we half thought—it is a revolution.

There have indeed been plenty of people who said that it was much more formidable than was supposed. When the 75,000 men were called for in April a year ago General Banks, for instance, said that there should have been a summons for 400,000. He thought so, because he had lived with the rebel leaders in Washington, and he knew what manner of men they were. He knew that their plans were profound, and that their programme at that time, when the actual temper of the North was unknown, had a certain grandeur. Fernando Wood thought so, too, when he suggested that the city of New York should secede from the State, and when he insisted that arms should be sent to the South. The 16th of April, 1861, was the darkest day this country has yet seen, for all that Sunday it groped in doubt whether it was a country. The consciousness of its own unity and purpose which the next week revealed was the grandest of discoveries—it was the rehearsal of ultimate victory.

Well, neither that consciousness nor that purpose have changed; but the conception of the means necessary to attain the purpose has been enlarged. That is all. We thought at first that the darkest day this country might do a great deal. Then that the recapture of Fort Sumter by rebels would answer. Then that more ships would settle the matter. Then that more soldiers would do it. Then, after Bull Run, that we must have more men. Then that we must have foreign interference. Then that there must be a policy which struck at the very root and secret of the difficulty. Then that conciliatory approaches to that last message of the President; the debates upon confiscation and emancipation; the modification of Lincoln's order. Then a general conviction that the rebellion was waning, and that a vigorous blow at Corinth and Richmond would virtually end it. Then came the alarm in the Shenandoah, and a fear for Washington and Richmond. And then—what? Weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth? Not a bit of it. But a grimmer vow that we would conquer and a sterner will that we would save our country and its Government we happened to be a great set of justice, we would not cry very bitterly. But if we should, we may rather be thankful that, by yield, except among those who have never had any opinion at all, and who, from either of these or the character of the war, we might truly call the dark and if delay, or disaster even, could fatally dispirit us, we ought to submit at once to the degradation and national annihilation which utter conquest would entail. But it is the very fact of our confidence we could show the great results of our arms which the last year shows against the rebellion. Is there any reason why we should be anxious or despaired?

Nothing has revealed a character in the nation of which it is idle to anticipate any thing but a steadier purpose and a stronger blow until the great work is accomplished.

THE GENTLEMEN OF THE BORDER.

THERE are a great many friends of the President, and they are very loyal, and very patriotic, and are and have been exceedingly troubled by what is called the Border State question. That gentlemen are loyal, these persons have said, let them support the Union at any cost: if they are not, the sooner we are rid of them the better.

The argument is apparently conclusive; but how if they are not loyal? How if they are not loyal but by the will of their own citizens, have we done nothing toward the final subjugation of the rebellion?

Did they not you would sacrifice the country and liberty to the loyal sentiment of the Border States? No; perhaps not. To beg a question is not to argue it. Now, however much we may be willing to say thank you for an article, does it follow that he is ready to pay a million of dollars for it. The question is not what we would pay, but what is given over to the Border States, but, simply, on what loyal sentiment among them is left of citizens in all the States and, which will secure the adhesion of those States to the Union. If there is no such sentiment—and, in fact, there is not—what seems wisest. If there is, what is wisest for us?

The President says, "Be loyal, or I must conquer." He thinks that a system of compensated emancipation is the security of the loyalty of the Border States; and if those States will accept, there is no question that the President is right. If Kentucky is strongly Unionist—as lightly it has to be now, for what concern can the reason should they have to the rebels when their slave system is gone? It is the security, the tranquillity, and prosperity, and petition, and partial identity of civilization and interest which make them dear to the North. Come away, and why should they be doubtful any longer?

If they decline, they throw the ground that the President and the country will take. The President is reported to have said, "You must be, civil or you must quake." He will say to them all that can fairly be done. If they want more they must take their chances. And if they call this coercion, the reply is short and clear: "It is coercion, to prevent your coercing the country into ruin?" It is the instinct of nature to resist mortal opposition to its unity and existence, just as it is the duty to subjugate the Davis rebels; and if the Border States say there are some measures for the misfortune of the Union to which, although strictly military, they will never consent, the war—will be greatly prolonged.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

CONGRESS has adjourned, and every loyal man ought to be gratified with the work it has done.

It has been a patriotic, faithful, earnest body. The large exceptions of men and measures we can all readily make; but the session is to be judged by its results, and by the general spirit of its deliberations. It has provided for the prosecution of the war with a wise conviction of the real causes and objects of the insurrection. It has worked diligently with the President, in whom the country confides; and with the exception of Mr. Richardson's performance toward the close of the session, and Mr. Mallory's reckless talk, its behavior has been more dignified than that of any Congress we remember.

Its memorable acts of legislation have been the Homestead bill, the Pacific Railroad bill, the Tax bill, the Currency bill, the Prohibition of Slavery in the Territories, Emancipation in the District of Columbia, and the Confiscation bill. In all these measures Congress doubtless had the substantial approval of the great bulk of citizens in the loyal States, for they were all essentially patriotic and not party measures. Many a citizen who, eighteen months ago, would have shaken his head doubtfully at them, now frankly and fully concedes their necessity and importance. Our late history has so plainly exposed the tendency and character of the domination of the Slavery interest in our politics, that men who have had no sympathy with the Republican cause, and still repudiate the Republican party, recognize that the time has come, in the interest of the country and of peace, to limit legally the expansion of the Slave power.

The complaints of this Congress come from gentlemen like Mayor Wightman, of Boston, who think that the business of a physician is not to attack the disease but to cure the patient. How the cure is to be effected without combating the disease the learned magistrate does not inform us. Mr. Vallandigham, also, and Mr. Benjamin Wood take a similar view. In their estimation Congress has winked at the invasion of Constitutional rights, and has deliberately coerced the liberty of American citizens. They are exceedingly troubled that the President of the United States had the temerity to undertake, first the defense, and then the recovery of the national property. They are of opinion that if liberty of discussion had long ago been destroyed in the free States, and a few persons of liberal sentiments had been hung as malefactors, we should have enjoyed the most profound and delightful peace. They are also inclined to believe that their worthy friends and co-laborers, Jefferson Davis and Co., have unhappily made a miscalculation.

These gentlemen think that Congress has woefully degenerated since the days of the late lamented Preston Brooks, and the chivalric Pryor, and the worthy Barksdale, and the manly Wigfall: the days when the Cabinet could boast of a Floyd, a Cobb, a Thompson, a Toucey, and a presiding genius of corresponding virtues in James Buchanan. They think that this Congress has been a nuisance. So does Davis. So do Spratt, Rhett, Keitt, Cobb, Floyd, etc. But the country has differed before with the opinions and conduct of these latter gentry, as well as with those of their friends, Mr. Vallandigham and Mr. Ben Wood. The Congress which dissatisfies them will not displease a loyal and united country.

THE GREAT MEETING.

It is late to speak of the meeting of citizens who believe in an unflinching prosecution of the war. But the country ought to know that it was as imposing and influential as the sentiment which summoned it. Of course it had not the wild excitement of the meeting after the fall of Sumter. No other assemblage of the people could have. But it represented the real force of New York. It showed that the feeling which underlies the war is not only unexhausted, but that it is deepening and strengthening. The speeches were all in one key. The Union must and shall be preserved, cost what it may. And if some of the orators ventured to specify that probable cost more distinctly than others, it was not because there was any doubt in any mind of what that cost might be.

To say that it was a meeting at which General Frémont and Mr. Spinola both spoke, is to say of how various elements it was composed. When Dr. Vinton and Mr. Wallbridge, Mr. William Allen Butler and Mr. Coddington, Mr. Delafield Smith and Judge Daly meet and speak upon the same platform, it is clear enough that there is a central thought and purpose so absorbing and universal that all details of difference of method are swallowed up. There was much practical good sense in Judge Daly's remarks. He said that it was too late to consider the cause of the war, or to distribute the responsibility of refusing compromise when compromise was possible, for we were now engaged in a hand-to-hand struggle for our life. Either the rebellion must conquer or the Government must, and no right-minded man could hesitate which to choose. He showed that any thing short of the absolute victory of the Government would be an abortive result.

But then the orator suddenly said something that must have made a thoughtful listener wonder. Why, he asked, shall we not require of the Government to leave questions upon which we differ among ourselves and attend exclusively to saving the country? He meant why not leave off thinking of the question. Simply because when you are considering how to save the nation you can no more avoid the relation of slavery to the war than when you are trying to save a burning house you can help thinking how to throw most water upon it. The paramount question at this moment is the national safety. Consequently every method of securing that safety must be considered. To say that we will shirk the question of the help or harm that the system of slavery may do the rebels or the Government, is as idle as to say that we will shirk the question of the relative value of different guns. Every means of weakening the rebels and of subduing the rebellion is the very question of the hour.

The moral of the meeting was that of every thing that is now seen or heard—namely, that the comprehension of the extent of the insurrection is more accurate than ever before, and the resolution to conquer it is universal and unflagging.

THE QUESTION.

There are some who yet say with Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, that if twenty millions of loyal citizens can not conquer six millions of rebels with their four millions of slaves, they had better relinquish at once the effort to save the country.

Many who think so are loyal Union men, but they have not fully and fairly considered the subject. For if this question were asked of them, whether, instead of sacrificing the lives of the choicest of our youth and spending lavishly in every way, it would not be better to suppress this insurrection entirely by black soldiers, leaving us in the loyal States quite unaffected except by the expense, they would probably allow that it might be desirable.

But the argument of numbers is only specious. If the six millions are united with a desperate subordination of every consideration to the success of the insurrection; if they draft and coerce every man into some kind of use; if every thing is planted, and tilled, and manufactured with a sole regard to the triumph of the rebellion; and every inhabitant of the region lives to fight, and feels that he fights to live; then, unless the twenty millions are animated by the same absorbing resolution, and work and fight with the same desperate unanimity, there is no reason why the smaller number should not prevail.

But what is a sure sign of that resolution upon the part of the stronger in numbers? The use of every lawful means of warfare. And when the larger number is conscious that the struggle is a death-grapple, they will not hesitate to use every means. No man is earnest in a fight so long as he does not use every lawful advantage.

And what is or can be our object in this war but the speediest restoration of the supreme authority of the nation? Do we wish to prolong it? Is there any reason why it would not have been better that it had ended ten months or a year ago? It did not, simply because we had misconceived the extent and intensity of the conspiracy. But is there any reason why it should drag on for a year or two years more? It will not if we truly comprehend the exigency. Then will any one say why every means should not at once be employed that it may be crushed? For the employment of all means will prove our earnestness, while the failure to use them will indicate languor of purpose.

If a man is fastidious as to the color, or height, or weight of the soldiers who fight and conquer the rebels, he is a ludicrous and hopeless patriot. Was not the exploit of Robert Smalls as heroic as any incident in the war? Would you have sent him and the steamer back again? Was it humiliating to be helped by a man who did not belong to the twenty millions? If there were ten thousand Robert Smalls, ought we to reject their aid because they are neither of the pure Saxon nor the pure Celtic races? These are questions that we must soberly answer; and our reply will show how true is our conception of the great contest we are waging.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

An Irish soldier once waited on his commanding officer with what he termed a very serious complaint: "Another man," he said, "had upbraided him that he was not married to his own wife, whom he accused of being no better than she should be, and called her many bad names besides, which he should be ashamed to mention to his Honor." "Well, my good fellow," said the Colonel, "have you any proof that you are legally married?" "Faith, your Honor, I have the best proof in the world," he replied. Here he took off his hat, or rather cap, and exhibited a broken head, saying, "Does your Honor think I'd be after taking that same abuse from any body but a wife?"

Good Logic.—"I don't believe it's any use to vaccinate for small-pox," said a backwoods Kentuckian, "for I had a child vaccinated, and in less than a week after he fell out of a window and was killed."

The Oldest Husbandry.—Somebody says that the oldest husbandry he knows of is the marrying of a widower in clover with a widow in weeds.

There is often but a slight separation between a woman's love and her hate. Her keen teeth are very near to her sweet lips.

An old Jew, who sold exclusively for cash, said that he did it for the benefit of his neighbors. He did not wish to see them "deep in debt mit him, ven dey ish got no monish to pay mit."

Great "Salve" Certificate.—Dear Doctor,—I will be one hundred and seventy-five years old next October. For ninety-four years I have been an invalid, unable to move except when stirred with a lever. But a year ago last Thursday I heard of the granicular sirup. I bought a bottle, smelled the cork, and found myself a new man. I can now run twelve and a half miles an hour, and throw nineteen double somersaults without stopping.

"What are wages here?" asked a laborer of a boy. "I don't know, Sir." "What does your father get on Saturday night?" "Get!" said the boy; "why he gets as tight as a brick!"

A temperance editor, in drawing attention to an article against ardent spirits in one of the inner pages of his paper, says, "For the effects of intemperance see our inside!"

Rough Music.—The Hull girls all sing. A friend lately from there says they sang themselves to sleep at night, and he never heard any thing like it since he was benighted in a swamp in the Fens.

A newspaper, in noticing the presentation of a silver cup to a contemporary, says: "He needs no cup. He can drink from any vessel that contains liquor—whether the neck of a bottle, the mouth of a demijohn, the spile of a keg, or the bung-hole of a barrel."

A person who has no address shouldn't undertake to address audiences.

Turnips.—"What a nice lot of turnips you have got!" said Mrs. Brown to Mrs. Jones—the latter's children's noses being all turn-ups!

An Irish gentleman, on reading the late accounts of stealing children, observed, with great concern, that if this practice became general it would put an end to the rising generation.

A witty dentist having labored in vain to extract a decayed tooth from a lady's mouth, gave up the task with the felicitous apology—"The fact is, madam, it seems impossible for any thing bad to come out of your mouth."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, July 15, in the Senate, the Naval Committee reported a resolution, which was adopted, relinquishing all right and title of the United States in Stevens's floating battery to the heirs of Robert L. Stevens. A bill was introduced amending the Articles of War, by providing that army officers shall furnish protection to slaves entering the Union lines, and also that if loyal citizens lose property by this order they shall be compensated. The bill relative to calling out the militia was then taken up, and Senator Sherman's amendment, limiting emancipation to those who enter the military service of the United States and to the slaves of rebels, was adopted by a vote of 18 against 17. Senator Browning offered an amendment, which was adopted, declaring that the mother, wife, and children of negroes entering the military service shall be freed only when they belong to rebels. After some debate the bill was passed by a vote of 28 against 9. The Senate concurred in the House resolution postponing the final adjournment of Congress till Thursday, in accordance with a wish of the President. Bills making appropriations for civil expenses, imposing a tax of one cent per pound on domestic sugar, and granting pensions to masters of gun-boats, were passed.——In the House, Mr. Benjamin Wood, of New York, offered a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to report forthwith on the matter of said Wood's alleged misconduct. Objection was made, and the resolution laid over. At the request of the President the House agreed to extend the session till Thursday. The bill requiring shipmasters trading to foreign ports and persons prosecuting claims at the departments to take the oath of allegiance was passed. A bill explanatory of the fifth section of the Confiscation act, so that its operation may not be retroactive, was passed, and the House adjourned.

On Wednesday, July 16, in the Senate, the Military Committee reported back the bill for raising a volunteer force for the better defense of the State of Kentucky, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration. Some discussion ensued, and the bill was laid aside informally. The House resolution, explanatory of the fifth section of the Confiscation act, so that its operation may not be retroactive, was then taken up. Senator Clark, of New Hampshire, moved an amendment, that no punishment under the bill shall work the forfeiture of real estate beyond the natural life of the person accused. He also offered another amendment, authorizing the President to restore any property confiscated under the bill if he thinks it necessary. After debate both amendments were adopted by a vote of 25 to 15, and the resolution was also adopted.——In the House, the Select Committee on Gradual Emancipation reported a bill, in accordance with the President's recommendation, providing compensation to the Border Slave States whenever either or all of those States shall emancipate their slaves. The whole amount to be paid shall not exceed one hundred and eighty millions of dollars. Twenty millions are also appropriated for colonizing the negroes. The bill was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Kellogg, of Illinois, offered a resolution empowering the President to call out a million additional troops, to serve for one year, but the House refused to suspend the rules, and the proposition lies over. The bill providing for the admission of West Virginia into the Union was postponed till December next. The bill authorizing the colonization of captured Africans in the West Indies was passed. The bill authorizing the President to call out the militia for a period not exceeding nine months, and the employment of negroes in the military service, was also passed. The House resolution explanatory of the fifth section of the Confiscation act, with the Senate's amendments thereto, was then taken up, the amendments agreed to, and the resolution adopted. The Senate propositions relative to the Tax bill were agreed to, and the House adjourned.

On Thursday, July 17, the first session of the Thirty-seventh Congress closed at two o'clock, P.M. The only subject of general importance acted on in either House was the passage of a bill, which was immediately signed by the President, making postage and other government stamps receivable for all dues of less than five dollars, and forbidding the issue of shinplasters, under a heavy penalty. The President sent in a special message, announcing his approval of the Confiscation bill and the explanatory resolution supplemental thereto, together with a message giving his objections to the bill as it stood before the adoption of the resolution referred to.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

The latest news from General M'Clellan's army announces that every thing is quiet, and the health of the troops gradually improving. Our soldiers who were taken prisoners in the late battles are being released on parole.

THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA.

General Pope has taken possession of the town of Gordonsville, Virginia, without opposition, and has destroyed all the railroad works at that point. As the greater portion of the supplies for the rebel army at Richmond passed through this place, which is the junction of the Orange, Alexandria, and Virginia Central Railroad, this feat of General Pope's is of considerable importance. He is also said to have occupied Charlottesville. The General has issued an order to the effect that the army is hereafter to subsist upon the country in which their operations are carried on, and that for the provisions so appropriated vouchers will be given to the owners thereof, payable at the conclusion of the war, provided that the parties can prove themselves loyal citizens of the United States. Another order of General Pope holds the people residing within a certain distance of the railroads responsible for the damage done by guerrillas or other parties of marauders, and compelling such residents to repair the damages so done, and furthermore declaring that all persons detected in destroying railroads or telegraph lines shall be shot. No such acts, he says, can influence the result of the war, and they can only lead to heavy affliction for the people who practice them.

BRILLIANT CAVALRY RAID.

General Pope dispatches to the War Department that a brilliant cavalry attack, under command of General King, from his command, was made from Fredericksburg, on the 9th inst., upon the Virginia Central Railroad, at Beaver Dam Creek, with the greatest success. They destroyed the railroad and the telegraph line for several miles, burned up the dépôt, which contained forty thousand rounds of ammunition, one hundred barrels of flour, and much other valuable property, and brought in a captain in charge as a prisoner. It appears that the whole country was thrown into a great state of alarm by this movement. General Pope passes the highest encomiums upon the officers and men engaged.

GENERAL HALLECK IN WASHINGTON.

General Halleck has been recalled from his military post in the West, and rumor states that he has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States.

THE ARMIES OF THE WEST.

Our forces south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi are distributed substantially as follows: Buell's army—the army of the Ohio—is east of Corinth, guarding the Memphis and Charleston Road as far as the neighborhood of Chattanooga. The army of the Mississippi—Pope's command—is on the Mobile and Ohio Road, stretching south as far as Brownville. The army of the Tennessee (Grant's) is on the Memphis and Charleston Road east of Corinth, and that part of the Mobile and Ohio which is in Tennessee. It will be thus seen that the great force lately under command of Halleck is broken up into squads and scattered over a line more than 200 miles in extent. It is probable that events now transpiring will cause its constituent parts to be again aggregated for offensive operations.

GENERAL CURTIS'S COMMAND.

The advance of General Curtis's command reached Helena, on the Mississippi, on 12th inst., the main army being only a few hours behind it. The rebels are trying to keep up their spirits by circulating a report that General Hindman has captured General Curtis with all his army.

ANOTHER REBEL IRON-CLAD AFLOAT.

Cairo, July 21, 1862.

The dispatch boat, which arrived at Memphis on Saturday, brings the following:

The reported escape of the rebel plated battery Arkansas is correct. The affair took place on the morning of the 15th. That morning, in consequence of reports brought by refugees that the Arkansas was about to attempt to run the Union fleet, the gun-boats Carondelet and Tyler and ram Lancaster started up the Yazoo to reconnoitre. When eight miles from the mouth they came suddenly upon the Arkansas, lying under the bank.

As our boats rounded the bend she opened upon them with 68-pounders. Our gun-boats returned the fire, and for a short time a fierce engagement ensued. Finding that the channel of the river prevented successful manœuvring, they gradually dropped downward toward the mouth. The Arkansas followed closely. Just as the latter was passing over the bar, the Carondelet closed with her, intending to board. She succeeded in throwing a grapple aboard and getting out a plank, when the Arkansas opened her steam pipe, throwing hot water across the plank. The Carondelet replied in the same manner.

While thus engaged both vessels grounded, and the shock separated them. The Arkansas succeeded in getting off, and the Carondelet remained fast for nearly an hour. The Arkansas immediately passed down the river, the Tyler preceding her, and maintaining a running fight with her greatly superior adversary.

None of our gun-boats with the fleet had steam up, and the entire fleet was so scattered that few could fire at the Arkansas as she passed without danger of hitting our own boats. As she approached, such boats as could safely do so opened upon her, but her plating resisted most of the shots. A solid shot from Farragut's gun-boat, No. 6, struck her larboard bow, passing through and under her plating, ripping it off for a considerable distance. What further damage was done is not ascertained.

The injuries to our fleet are light. The Benton received a shot near the edge of the after-part of the larboard side, killing one man. The Tyler, which engaged the Arkansas nearly an hour and a half, had seven killed and nine wounded. Among the latter were the pilots, Messrs. Sebastian and Hiner, and Engineer Davis. The ram Lancaster received a shot under her boilers, causing an escape of hot water, scalding six men, three of them fatally.

The entire Union loss is twelve killed and fifteen wounded, five or six of whom will die. The rebel loss is not known, but believed to be considerable, as the hot water streams of the Carondelet, at the time they attempted to board, were thrown directly into her.

GUERRILLAS IN KENTUCKY AND TENNESSEE.

The guerrillas have evacuated Murfreesboro, Tennessee, carrying with them the officers of the regiments which surrendered. Prompt measures have been taken to prevent further outrages. General Nelson arrived at Nashville on Thursday, with heavy reinforcements, and assumed command there. He will make short work of the marauders in that vicinity. At Lexington, Kentucky, General Green Clay Smith is in command of the National forces, and there is every prospect that he will soon put a stop to Morgan's operations both in marauding and recruiting. The last act of the guerrillas was the occupation of the town of Henderson, Kentucky, on the Mississippi River, below Louisville. They do not appear to have done much damage there, however. Quarter-master-General Wright, by order of the Governor of Ohio, has issued a call for thirty days' volunteers, to operate against Morgan in Kentucky. The National forces raised in and around Cincinnati have, by order of the Government, been placed under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Burbank, of the Thirteenth Infantry, who has taken measures to give efficiency to the military organizations. We learn from Nashville that Colonel Owen, of the Sixty-ninth Indiana, surprised and cut to pieces five hundred guerrillas above Burksville, Kentucky, about eleven o'clock on Saturday night.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Negotiations were commenced on the 17th, between General Dix and the rebel General Hill, with a view to a general exchange of prisoners. The negotiations were not concluded on that day, but were renewed on the 18th, when the rebel General Lee was present. The interviews between General Dix and General Hill are understood to have been highly satisfactory. Some of our wounded men, who were taken prisoners in the recent battles, have already been released on parole and are on their way North.

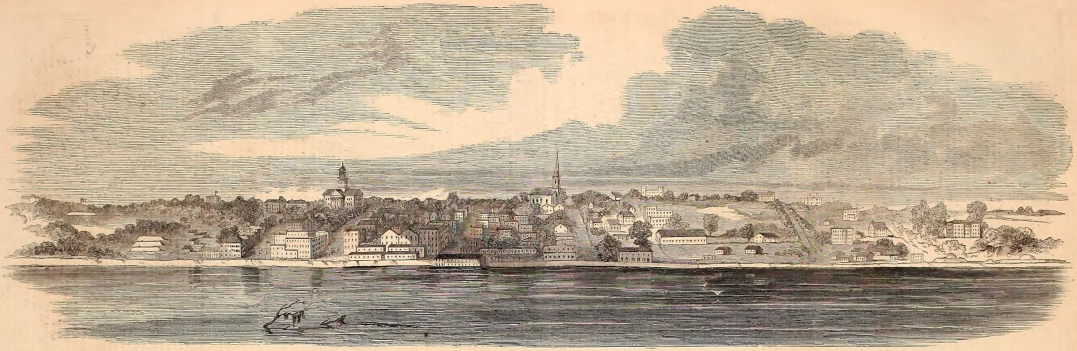
UNION MEETING IN NEW YORK.

A mass meeting was held on 15th, in Union Square, in behalf of the Union, and in support of the Government in its efforts to suppress rebellion. It was one of the largest, and, in many respects, the most impressive popular assemblage ever gathered together in this metropolis—not alone in point of numbers, but in enthusiasm, singleness of purpose, and earnestness in the cause for which it was called.

Similar war meetings have been held in almost every city of the North.

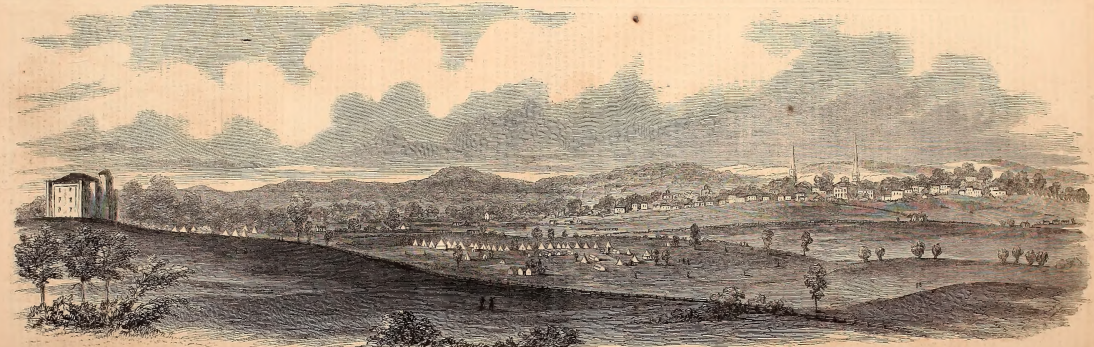
NEW BOUNTY FOR VOLUNTEERS.

A private enlisting in this State, under the new call for volunteers, if the war should close within twelve months, would receive, besides his regular rations and clothing, the following amount of money:



State bounty	$50
Government advance bounty	27
One month advance pay	13
Pay per year	156
Government bounty at close of war	75
Total	$321
Rations $9 per month—one year	108
Clothing about	20
Total one year's pay	$449

FOREIGN NEWS.



ENGLAND.

BRITISH OPINION ON THE RICHMOND BATTLES.

The English press is engaged in commenting on the war news from this country. The papers speak of three days' fighting before Richmond, and are unanimous in the opinion that the Union army under General M'Clellan sustained a "severe reverse," and that his position was "precarious." The London Herald, organ of the aristocrats, says that the campaign is not ended, but will be prolonged until "Europe stays the uplifted swords." Some of the journals hope that a reconciliation may be effected, but the general opinion was that the siege of Richmond would be recommenced. The London Times thinks that the result of the fighting proves that the rebel army may maintain itself in Virginia for a period which may be indefinitely prolonged.

THE CITY OF VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 482.]

THE CITY OF HUNTSVILLE, ALABAMA.—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF GENERAL MITCHELL'S ARMY.—[SEE PAGE 485.]

[From sketch sent to us by a Private Soldier in the 79th Regiment, N. Y. S. V.—SCENE ON BOARD THE STEAMER ATLANTIC, OFF HILTON HEAD, SOUTH CAROLINA, ON THE MORNING OF THE 7TH OF JUNE, AT 4 O'CLOCK A. M.—DISEMBARKING OF THE 79TH REGIMENT, N. Y. S. V.]

MAJOR-GENERAL DIX, U.S.A.—[See Page 486.]

HUNTSVILLE, ALABAMA.

ON page 484 we give a view of HUNTSVILLE, Alabama, from a sketch sent us by an officer serving in General Mitchell's army. Huntsville was taken by General Mitchell some three months ago. It is a pretty town, the capital of Madison County; has a court-house, bank, quite a number of churches, and nearly 3000 inhabitants. It stands ten miles north of the Tennessee. General Mitchell swooped down upon it one fine morning at daybreak, when the rebels hadn't an idea of his approach, frightening the people of the neighborhood so terribly that they haven't recovered since.

The following extract from a letter from Huntsville shows that there are good men there among the natives:

I this morning conversed with Judge George W. Lane, a resident of Huntsville, who is a Union man of the most enduring stripe. From the time of the secession of the State he has kept the "old flag" flying from his house-top, in defiance of the threats of the secessionists to tear it down. He warned them that the person who undertook the task must be a bold man, and that in the accomplishment of his task he must look well to his safety. He is a man of influence, yet passing through the fiery ordeal of Secession he has quite tried him as though he passed through a burning fiery furnace. He come through safely at last, and when General Mitchell entered the place, the town, to the great wonder of the inhabitants, he found that old flag still waving, as if in welcome to its men. He requested that it be presented to him as a memento, and he still has it in his possession.

The Judge is a valuable man to our forces in this vicinity, from his extensive acquaintance and consequent knowledge as to the quinine contraband by the citizens here who wish to obtain favors from the officers having charge of the pest.

GENERAL COUCH.

GENERAL DARIUS N. COUCH, whose portrait we publish on this page, is now in command of a division in FITZ-JOHN PORTER'S corps of the Army of the Potomac, and one of the best and bravest officers we have. He was born in New York about the year 1820, entered West Point in 1842, graduated in the artillery in 1846, and went with his regiment (the Second Artillery) to Mexico. At the battle of Buena Vista he was brevetted First Lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct. At the close of the war Lieutenant Couch resigned his rank in the army and settled in Massachusetts. At the outbreak of the rebellion he joined the Volunteers, and left Boston at the head of a well-appointed regiment. In May, 1861, he was appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers. In all the battles on the Peninsula General Couch has proved himself a gallant and able soldier.

CAPTURE OF THE REBEL GUN-BOAT "TEASER" IN THE JAMES RIVER.—[SKETCHED BY A CORRESPONDENT.]

ON THE JAMES RIVER.

We publish on this page an illustration of the CAPTURE OF THE REBEL GUN-BOAT "TEASER," in the James River, from a sketch by an occasional correspondent. We give below an illustration of the REBELS FIRING ON THE TRANSPORT "DANIEL WEBSTER," off Fort Powhatan, from a sketch by Acting-Master James F. Anderson, U.S.N. The Herald correspondent thus recounts the capture of the Teaser:

The rebel gun-boat Teaser came down from Richmond to reconnoitre, and had a balloon on board, made of old silk frocks. This she intended to inflate and send up to view our camps at Harrison's Landing. The Maratanza being at the time on picket duty, came upon the Teaser suddenly as both vessels were turning a sharp curve in the river. Of course the Maratanza opened fire on the little rebel, and by a few well-directed shots forced the Teaser ashore. Captain Rhind, of the Maratanza, immediately ordered the boarders of the Teaser, and came within an ace of blowing her up. Fortunately it did not.

Acting-Master Anderson thus describes his sketch:

"Fort Powhatan is about 75 miles up the James River, situated upon an eminence of 60 feet above the level of the river, the channel at this place being only 300 yards wide. Owing to the vigilance of our gun-boats the rebels have been unable to mount any guns on it.

"The drawing will show the golden rules they frequently make, and the desperation with which they fight.

"The Daniel Webster, under a full head of steam, succeeded in running the gauntlet, with much damage done to the boat; but fortunately only one person was hurt—the pilot being slightly wounded in the hand.

"The attack was so sudden that before the gun-boat could bring her guns to bear the enemy had swept our decks fore and aft. Having a raking position, they for a while had it all their own way. Fortunately they had too much elevation to their guns, or our loss of life would have been very large; as it was, no one was hurt, although our rigging was cut to pieces, and two or three shots struck us on the quarter. After we got into position we shelled them to their hearts' content, and in a very short time drove them at the double-quick. All vessels now go up and down under convoy. We (the Sebago) remain to take care of the fort, and I hardly think we will again be troubled in this quarter."

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We continue in this number our series of pictures of the Army of the Potomac. On pages 488 and 489 we give two illustrations, one representing THE ARRIVAL OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN UPON THE BANK OF THE JAMES RIVER ON SUNDAY, JUNE 29; and the other, A GENERAL VIEW OF HARRISON'S LANDING, showing the transports landing supplies. The former is from a sketch by our artist, Mr. Mead; the latter from a sketch by an officer in the James River flotilla, who has frequently obliged us by similar favors. A newspaper correspondent, describing the arrival of the Army after five days' fighting upon the border of the James, said:

When an aid of General M'Clellan rode back and reported that the way was all open to James River a thrill of relief ran through the whole line, and the sight of the green fields skirting its banks was indeed an oasis in the terrible desert of suspense and apprehension through which they had passed. The teams were now put upon a lively trot in order to relieve the pressure upon that portion still in the rear.

General M'Clellan and Staff rode ahead and took possession of the old estate known as Malvern Hill, owned by R. F. Dew, one mile back from "Turkey Island Bend." It is a large, old-fashioned estate, originally built by the French, and has near it, in front, an old earth work constructed by General Washington during the Revolutionary war. It has a spacious yard, flanked by venerable elm and other trees. A fine view of the river can be had from this elevated position. General M'Clellan approved the opinion that with a brief time to prepare the position could be held against any force the enemy can bring against us.

Exhausted by long watching and fatigue, and covered thickly with the dust of the road over which we had passed, many of the officers threw themselves upon the shady sod, grassy lawn to rest. The soldiers also, attracted by the shady trees, surrounded the house or hid-cocked in the fields near by.

General M'Clellan immediately address[illegible] himself to the task of preparing dispatches for the Government.

The transports were already there, unloading tons of supplies and fixed ammunition. There are now not less than 600 transports and gunboats in the river, a large portion of which are at or near Harrison's Landing.

On page 485 we reproduce a sketch by Mr. WAUD, representing the ARTILLERY OF SMITH'S DIVISION, UNDER THE COMMAND OF CAPTAIN AYRES, HOLDING THE ENEMY IN CHECK AT THE WHITE OAK SWAMP. This was one of the severest struggles in the contest before Richmond, and AYRES lost a gun. A detailed account of the fight has already appeared in our columns.

On page 492 we illustrate a camp scene from a sketch by Mr. Mead. It represents the soldiers of the Army of the Potomac singing their favorite song, "McClellan is our Man!" Our artist gives us one verse as a sample brick. It runs:

REBEL BATTERIES AT FORT POWHATAN, ON THE JAMES RIVER, FIRING ON THE UNION TRANSPORT "DANIEL WEBSTER."—[SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF THE NAVY.]

"McClellan is our man,
McClellan is our man,
We'll show our darky friends
Wherein he leads—
McClellan is our man!"

The sentiment is sound, whatever may be said of the poetry.

FLAG-PRESENTATION AT NEW ORLEANS.

On page 493 we give an illustration of the PRESENTATION OF A FLAG TO THE TWENTY-FIRST CONNECTICUT REGIMENT BY LOYAL LADIES OF NEW ORLEANS. This interesting event—whose political significance will be readily appreciated—took place on 4th July. The Herald correspondent says:

The feature of the day, however, was the presentation of one of the most beautiful flags I have ever seen to the Nineteenth Connecticut Regiment, Colonel H. W. Birge, by two very pretty and loyal young ladies, Mademoiselles Angela Sayler and Emelina Labatut. To show the opposition of such gratuitously conduct on the part of two of the fair sex of this city, the former was insulted on her way out of the depot and the day consequently forever consented to be present with his staff and escort at the regiment. As all others refused to participate in it, in full dress uniform, and accompanied by his staff, at his request, followed by the fleet of carriages before-named, under Lieutenant S. A. Perkins, commanding, rode down to the Customhouse, and back to the levee, the Fifteenth Connecticut, with the young ladies and their flag following in a carriage, marched from their quarters through several streets to the levee, where they were drawn up in line near Algiers depot. The Third Connecticut, Captain Thompson, was stationed a little below, and fired a national salute. The General and staff then rode to the centre and saluted the American flag, while the Connecticut regiment presented arms, and cheer after cheer rent the air along the line, while the band played "Hail to the Chief!"

The regiment then marched in review before the General, and, after they were again formed in line, the ladies stepped from the carriage, and Mademoiselle Sayler, taking the beautiful color in her hand, presented it to Colonel Birge, remarking that she considered the flag to be the gallant men of his command, assured that they would never allow it to be dishonored, adding that her sympathies and those of her cousin—Mademoiselle Courcelle—should ever be with the brave men and victors of the Connecticut Constitutional Regiment. Colonel Birge answered eloquently and with deep feeling, thanking the ladies for their beautiful gift and complimenting them for their loyalty, which, though not the usual expectations he was accustomed to, seem only to be the more admirable in that it proceeded from the right and warm, virtuous heart of woman. He added that their handsome present should be placed beside the regimental flags, and promised for his command that a shroud never let its form their banner or appear so long as their stout arms could defend it. Handing it to a color-sergeant, it was planted beside the rest of the flags and saluted by the regiment. General Butler then rode up to the regiment, and in a few words expressed his complacement them for their courage and generosity. The whole affair passed off very quietly, though there is a rising to mar the satisfaction, and a large crowd was collected to witness the ceremony.

The regiment looked splendid, and in their marching and the manner of their movements illustrated the discipline and capacity of men's entire regiments under have been organized and equipped, and from this circumstance they do, drive a commendable pride into everything relative to their fine appearance, but in their correct deportment and correct attention to improve and perfect themselves in the duties of soldiers. They are indeed a fine regiment, and will prove a credit to their country and to their regiment.

The flag presented is of heavy, plain blue silk, doubled, and on each side is a rich, deep-fringed wreath of gold, bordered by a heavy silver fringe, with silver cord and tassels. On this centre are the words, "Presented to the Seventh Connecticut Regiment," New Orleans, 1862." The staff is surmounted by a splendid spear of solid silver.

Secession ladies were not present on this occasion, and the fact that the number of ladies present was so thoroughly of the true their devotion to the cause of their country, and their courage is peculiarly manifest from their conduct yesterday on the occasion of the raising of the Union flag. It will be remembered that these same young ladies dared to cause forcan by flag, when thousands of men were afraid to speak to a Union officer, and presented a color-staff to the Thirteenth Connecticut Regiment (Union men). They are of the material that infuse new vigor of fidelity into the hearts of men, and elevate the moral and manly tone of society.

OUR SECOND LIEUTENANT.

"AFTER all, Burnet, this bachelor life is not to be despised, though some weeks and months it is not the dearth of woman's kindness, the lack of woman's love."

An expressively contemptuous "Humph!" was the Indian reply.

I felt very communicative or I should not have continued.

"Burnet, my boy, I came very near being entangled in the noose matrimonial once upon a time."

"Ah!"

"Yet, the bait was tempting, nearly as successful as our trout flies this morning. Methinks I see the glistening river, and the cool, green banks on each the maze of maize half will that do, think you? But to-day, Burnet, is a fine, soft, sweet voice—fishing musically and fatally as the water of a cascade in which some nymph of deadly beauty dwells."

"Those dusky promise notes, I shall have to have a fresher it the weather does not change soon."

"I was not to be checked in my vein of sentiment by his quiet coolness.

"Her face was fair with easy, wreathing smiles, but oh, her head! Blanche had a flowing mane of hair."

"Blanche, what Blanche?" was asked so suddenly by my old friend in a voice that startled me. Dark, stern face showed feeling as well as curiosity, but I had now the chance to be serenely indifferent.

"No matter; I was by any other name, 'etc.'"

He succumbed at once, and puffed again at his cigar.

"Burnet," I asked again, willing to be conversational in spite of his moodiness—"he candid, do you believe those Scara de Charide down at N——Hospital would have dressed our wounds with half the tenderness had they not known we were unmarried?"

"They know no such thing, Winslow. I was married ten years ago."

It was my turn to ask how, when, and where, for my surprise was genuine.

We two were in the same regiment—though I outranked Burnet, a man of character and refinement worth half our officers, though only a second lieutenant—both of us were wounded in the same engagement, and having struck up a cordial friendship during our camp life, had, by common consent, our furloughs together in recruiting health and strength among the mountains of Pennsylvania. I had never known Burnet before, and knew more of his antecedents; but the man's face and bearing never bore, and I was willing to share his confidence, the ring of the true metal in his tastes and opinions. His physiognomy was strikingly noble, open and strong, expressive of much energy and resolution; only once had I seen him act apparently from impulse, and that was during the Pope-Jackson encounters. It was at the close of a hard day's fighting. I had been wounded in the arm and was returned to the field, and was close beside Burnet just as a rebel officer fell near us. We both rushed over him, and he was the almost strongest man, and faintly murmured something, "Water," or "Quarter," I don't remember which. For a moment Burnet looked at him—oh, what a look! His face was blackened and grimed with powder and smoke; his eyes, bloodshot and glazed with the heat and flashing, angry eyes as he looked at the rebel, who seemed fascinated by the fearful glare, and gazed back again with undaunted defiance. Suddenly the defiance changed to veritable fear—craven, mortal fear—unmistakable; he was not the hero, but the old in a moment. I glanced at Burnet, he raised his rifle and aimed, a certain, steady charge at the rebel's breast. Horror-struck at the sight of such inhumanity, I dashed his weapon down with a quick blow, saying:

"Would you kill a fallen man, Burnet?"

"Thank God!" he said, in a deep, hoarse voice, drawing cool breath between his words and his pale face. At that moment leaden hail dropped desperately near us, and the rebel was bayoneted by the next bullet which finished his rebel foe. The man died instantly, and still Burnet, with the blood dripping from his wounded arm, stood in silence looking on the dead man. I had to urge him away. We had never since spoken of the occurrence, and I had often imagined Burnet about to explain; but his mood would change, and other matters drove it from my mind. Now, I felt the force of his every word, my quickness in preventing its action and Burnet's sincere expression of relief were most natural evidences.

Excitement and illness had followed, and we were both weak enough to be in the mood to speak of invalid life—such fearful bore to strong, healthy men, until the pleasure of being out trusting revivigorated our muscles of endurance.

"So I have been holding up the chorus of bachelor hood for years, and now a man listens to old a wife?" I resumed.

"No, Winslow, not a man blessed but second with a wife."

His tone was too keenly bitter for mere of my nonsense. Something was then assailing me—a painful, wirth would have been like that in Scripture, spoken of a man of sorrows and acquainted.

"Thou woman you described just now would have answered the common idea of my wife; her name, sir, was Blanche."

"Blanche Mayo?" I asked.

"Blanche Mayo! You have you seen her?" he asked, still with that pained repression of excitement in his voice, though it was nearly tremulous.

"Yes, Burnet, I have, in the most sweet young, exquisitely beautiful, the belle of her clique—a very worldly and fashionable one, I am sure, but wonderful. Blanche's mother—Mrs Mayo's mother, I correct—I cried myself.

"Then, she was indeed beautiful. What did you think of her?"

"Shall I be honest?"

"Yes, I can bear it now," and he half shaded his eyes from the light.

"She seemed to me one who needed every influence that strength of character could give to shield her from the effects of flattery and folly."

"Folly! Blanche Mayo! Oh, my God!"

Her beauty was of the winning, weak kind; irresistible to some men, even when tempting to sin."

"Hush!" said Burnet, suddenly. "I can not bear to hear her name calmly discussed. You will tell you all in a moment. Let us walk."

We strolled on through the pine wood, shaded for its picturesque beauty and attracting tourists yearly to its banks. Its wildness lent a lively beauty to the neighboring scenery; but in the spring it often became a source of alarm to the village adjacent, and freshets, therefore, had been common, were known to have caused much loss of life and property. Rain had fallen all day since our arrival at the village, and now it blew and poured in a while, as was apparent from the driving, ragged clouds, the wind-tossed trees, and rising which I reluctantly avoided Burnet's face, he began again speaking.

"I have wanted to explain matters to you for some time, Winslow, but I have found it such hard work that I have put it off. I see that your wounds go deeper than these," he said, tapping his lame shoulder—"deeper and deadlier, and they have healed, but feeler out till such time as the pain seems to be exhausted by them."

He put my arm in his with silent sympathy and he continued:

"You remember how you saved me from a murderer? I considered myself in the act of saving a man from a murderer in God's sight for it; but it was so wonderful a chance for the avenging spirit I had cherished, down that it was. Shall I tell you the thoughts which sprang into my heart just then? It seemed to me that at last was prepitious—the very man of all others most deserving his death-blow was lying there awaiting it from Jus the hand that I had given up to all the world's decree. I forgot that he was wounded and at my mercy; I forgot every thing except his damnable sin and my revenge; I forgot even the beautiful face which he had robbed me of, the being whose purity he had made impure. I should have killed him, Winslow, as you would have killed a cur whom rabid bite has poisoned the well-springs of a life more sacred to you than your own.

"I do not hesitate to call this murder. Once I might have walked the track to another world but misery and despair led me to the only refuge wretched were ever find—the religion of Christ; which indeed I thought I professed until that moment on the battle-field, when the old longing for revenge broke out, and, trusting to chance and Providence, I was about to take the law into my own hands, which they had sought to shield my unhappy soul.

"Blanche Mayo was the woman I loved, and that wounded man should have stepped me. Measure his sin by mine, and you can then understand my provocation. Understand No, that you can not.

"The last night I saw my wife was one very different from this sombre, sullen evening. There had been rain, but the sun almost smeared with crimson, the crimson of ripe fruit, and the gold of molten ore, under the long purple curtain of the vanishing orb of day. The night seemed unequaled in beauty, clear starlight, and I sauntered out on the grounds to smoke and to watch the fairies filling the rooms. It was very warm, and I heard Blanche called often away to little Ned, our child, who was feverish and ailed ill. Her little Ned was often ailing, and in the way of his mother's attendance; he was not the last, for his wife lives made spiritually one. Blanche feared me. I married her for her beauty—loving her as I could not help loving such exquisite traits of her false education; annoyed by her girlish frivolity and pitiful vanity, and yet, I think, Winslow only made a toy of her little baby, just as she would have done of any other pretty gift. But that night she knew well that I was jealous of little Ned by white feet were treading—she seemed tenderer both to me and child.

"We had differed once that day, but had let the slight cause pass without more than an impatient word or two, and I was glad on my account, and I thought if I could steal a smile or loving tone from her I would be happy. I was passing her room, but I did not care to meet the people in my house, so I clambered up to the piazza outside my bedroom. Love is blind, Winslow, I think the baby cried again, and Blanche came in tossing a rose impatiently, and with a coolness, a jealousy kindling that I was not aware of. At this little Ned cried louder, till, with a child's fitful caprice, he threw his disturbed glittering by her's ear; then he paused, and I think I never saw a lovelier picture.

"Blanche, in her airy dress of white lace so beautifully blending with the delicate fairness of her skin and the mists of baby, seemed to me an absolut light, which subdued material things to a spiritual beauty, in the sanctity of her child's innocence, looked an angel. I did not care to disturb her dreams, and little did I imagine the delicious torture those dreams were causing her. Her self-attitude as she bent a little toward the child in its simple night-gown gave her a listening look, as if some one were approaching, and I saw that her ear. The devil himself must have been then urging her to listen, and I was not aware that I myself the baby slipped from her lap. 'Love him? oh, indeed I do!' she murmured; then clasping her hands over her eyes, she shuddered violently. Despite on the verge of drowning miseries every action of their lives, and I as sure it must have been so with Blanche that night; hovering, as she was, near the whirlpool of ruin; for when she raised her hands her cheek was that flat-doll look, as if she had been gazing over the past. I, stupidly ignorant of her danger, was about to speak at that moment, for she had thought herself alone.

"The next day she was gone.

"I could have more easily forgiven her had she taken poor little Ned; but leaving him seemed more worse than leaving me."

Burnet's voice broke once or twice in the course of his conversation, but here it gave out completely. I felt that he must hear me; and I could not comprehend, from the agitation of his strong nature, how great must have been the provocation. I said not a word, leaving silence to do for us in sympathy what was impossible to convey in language.

Already it was raising again—dashing coldly in our faces and dripping from the fresh leaves foliage. I could not justly blame myself for reviving Burnet's misfortune, yet I was provoked that my idle words had been provocative of so much that was painful.

We turned from the night soon after; and I knew, from the return pressure of his hand, that he felt and appreciated the sincerity of my feeling for him. The storm was over when I bade good-night to him, and great blasts of wind swept down the valley with immense force.

At midnight a thundering crash awoke me; the roller roar of water and wind chiming in nearly unheard the words, "Burnet is drowned." "Drowned! the bridge is gone!"

I dressed hastily and went to Burnet's door; he had not been in bed, and willingly joined me in the desire to see how great was the injury or danger. Several houses had been swept from their foundations, their household gods. Several houses were swept away by the overflowing river, and the bridge promised to realize the worst fears. At one cottage the inmates were fairly turned out with only their night-clothes on, and a group of rough and ready rogue remarks we gathered there was still a person in it who could not escape. Burnet no sooner heard this than he determined to find out the truth for himself. It was with difficulty that we obtained a boat; still more dangerous was it to pilot it through logs, trees, and the mass of débris accumulated by the swollen torrent. We reached the house, however, and forced our way through the upper windows. It was a little cottage, and though I held a lantern before Burnet he could scarcely find out whether or not there was a living person in it; certainly, had they taken refuge in the lower portion of the cottage, they must have been drowned before we arrived there.

"Hark!" said Burnet, listening.

"It is only the hoarse noise of the water," I replied.

"No, it was lower than that."

"The wind through the keyholes."

"No, it was a voice; surely I heard it."

We paused now, standing over fearful ruins, listening ourselves, heroically indifferent to our own fate. We came to a little room where the door stood ajar. I held the lantern and as I did so the light gleamed on the dress of a woman kneeling at the bedside. She was praying, and buried her head down further out of sight; but that streaming silver hair and Cleopatra head were not to be mistaken. Burnet bolted one moment; the next he seized her in his arms and sprang for the window.

"Hold the lantern to faster or lose!"

The waves dashed in angry violence against the sill of the window; a furious gust blew out my lantern. Burnet, yourself! Burnet, Burnet, is that some sweet, soft voice of old, steady as it was when we dined, Burnet answered me, and the quiet tone of his wife's voice changed to a stilled exclamation—half a scream. She now knew in whose arms she was held.

"Oh, Heroes!" she cried, "do not save me. I want to die! I have longed for death! Let me go, and save yourself!"

"Not while God gives me strength to do otherwise," he answered.

"It is cruel to me—to yourself! I have prayed for it. I have tried to pray for it!"

"Come, Winslow, we can wait no longer; we must swim," said Burnet, preparing, as I supposed, to plunge. I could not swim, but I was in a restless thing to do, for the darkness was impenetrable, and the river must have risen seven with the remnants of the broken bridge. We left attack out, I striving to guide myself near him, for I feared his strength should fail him if he had heavily taxed. But in the noise and danger we became separated, and I was left to struggle with the furious current, finding my own strength momentarily diminishing, and I can hardly now recount even how I reached the shore. Bruised and drowning, and a little crowd of anxious, frightened people stood near the bank—some with lights, with immense strength, brought his wife. But no longer his wife; for pale and prostrate as a stone-covered dimness, Blanche lay dead at his feet. She would have been too exhausted to have been able to keep her head above water, even, perhaps, was struck by some floating fragment.

I never heard how she happened to be in that cottage, or even in the village, and I was in no condition to ask. I was unconscious.

How beautiful she was! The marble purity of her brow shaded by the long silken tresses of golden color, the blue eyes hidden, their false light closed in death, sweet voice, lips, and all Rubenslike! to destruction, lushed forever.

Burnet sobbed as he looked on her. Tender he carried her in his arms, as if she had been only a sleeping child. Almost a Divine forgiveness certainly a human pity seemed to have overwhelmed his actions, and the love which life had blighted shone accepted.

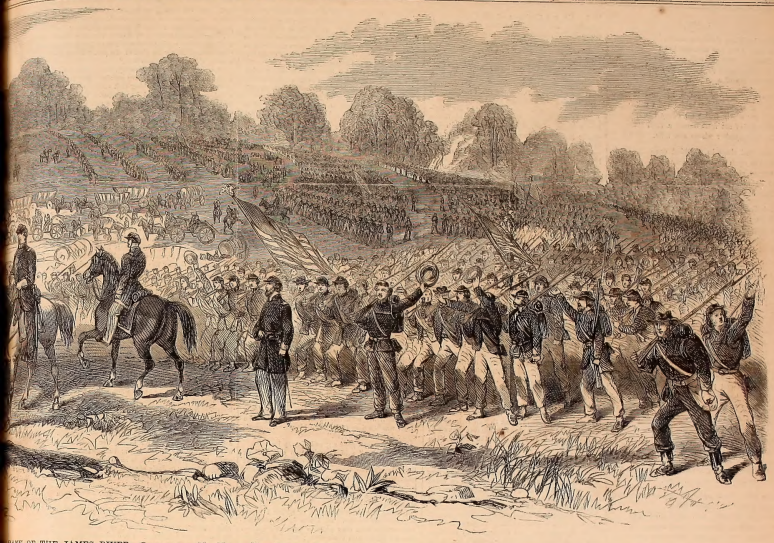
"I shall take her home, Winslow," was all he said as we parted; for my furlough was out, and I had to rejoin the regiment.

Four weeks after we were again side by side exhausting a mere battle, and found us shoulder freshet—the stream of human blood running crimson from warm hearts. Burnet's thin face glowed with brave heroism, and sorrow, pain and its bitterness, became a dream; with all the order that battle deprives he encouraged the men to more determined assaults, more victorious efforts, than any other man in the field. But I missed him suddenly, and as the roar of artillery ceased and the retreating enemy gave us time to attend to our wounded, I found Burnet surrounded with men and more painful eagerness. Near a fallen tree I found him, ghastly pale, but smiling as if no wound were powerful enough to subdue for long the physical pain could have done so. I held him in my arms till the surgeon came; but he could do nothing. Life was going.

"Poor Blanche!" he whispered. "I had forgiven her; I had tried to forgive her. Oh, God was may we avenge, it is my friend now. No; He is taking me out of the fight. I am not to see more bloodshed. Winslow, under God you saved my life from the crime of murder. It was a fearful temptation. I have prayed for forgiveness, and by the old day, Winslow! It all goes against us, still stand fast! Goodby!"

The setting sun was tinging the spikes of willow-leaves with gold; the meadows all along the road were white with daisies and buttercups, daisies, like the "pores which passeth all understanding," seemed to permeate the atmosphere with their fragrance in the face of death. On the stone was simply cut—"LITTLE NED."

"For us, whatever's undergone
Thou knowest, wither what is done.
Grief may be joy unutterdstood,
Only the Good deserve the good—"



I said over to myself as I left the sacred away. But I could not help wondering why Burnet's fate had not been mine; for I came very near losing my heart with the fair, false Blanche Mayo.

LINT.

FIBRE by fibre, shred by shred,
It falls from her delicate hand
In feathery films, as soft and slow
As fall the flakes of a vanishing snow
In the lap of a summer land.

There are jewels of price in her roseate ears,
And gold round her white wrist coils·
There are costly trifles on every hand,
And gems of art from many a land
In the chamber where she toils.

A rare bird sings in a gilded cage
At the open casement near;
A sunray glints through a swaying bough,
And lights with a diamond radiance now
The dew of a falling tear!

A sob floats out to the summer air
With the song-bird's latest trill;
The gossamer folds of the drapery
Are waved by the swell of a long, low sigh,
And the delicate hands are still.

"Ah! beauty of earth is naught, is naught!
And a gilded youth is vain!
I have seen a sister's scarred face shine
With a youth and beauty all divine
By the soldier's couch of pain!"

"I have read of another whose passing shade
On their pillows the mangled kissed
In the far Crimea!"—There are no more tears,
But she plucks the gems from her delicate ears,
And the gold from her slender wrist.

The bird still sings in his gilded cage;
But the Angel in her heart
Hath stung her soul with a noble pain;
And beauty is naught, and youth is vain,
While the Patriot's wounds still smart!

Fibre by fibre, shred by shred,
Still fall from her delicate hand
The feathery films, as soft and slow
As fall the flakes of a vanishing snow
In the lap of a summer land.

There are crimson stains on breasts and brows,
And fillets in ghastly coils;
The walls are lofty, and white, and bare,
And moaning echoes roll ever there
Through the chamber where she toils.

No glitter of gold on her slender wrist,
Nor gem in her roseate ears;
But a youth and a beauty all divine
In the face of the Christian maiden shine,
And her gems are the soldier's tears!

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN A. DIX.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN A. DIX, whose portrait we give on page 485, was born in Boscawen, New Hampshire, July 24, 1798. His father was the late Colonel Timothy Dix, whose services and death in the last war with Great Britain are matters of history.

In December, 1812, young Dix was appointed to a cadetship at the West Point Military Academy; but he never went as pupil to that institution. His father was then in the army, and being stationed in Baltimore, sent for his son, who joined him there, and very soon (March, 1813) received the commission of Ensign, and marched with his father's command to Sackett's Harbor, the youngest officer in the American army.

In June, 1813, he was appointed Acting-Adjutant of Major Timothy Upham's independent battalion of nine companies at Sackett's Harbor. He accompanied his father in the expedition down the St. Lawrence, and was with him when he died on board one of the transports near French Mills, in November, 1813, after the battle of Chrystler's Fields. He was then transferred from the infantry to the artillery, and attached to the staff of Colonel Walbach. At the close of the war he remained in the army, part of the time on garrison duty at various stations, from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, to Fort Washington and Old Point Comfort, Virginia, and six years as aid-de-camp to Major-General Brown while he was Commander-in-Chief of the army. He finally left the service in 1828.

He read law with William Wirt, then United States Attorney-General, was admitted to the New York bar in 1828, and afterward to the United States bar in Washington.

In 1826 he married the adopted daughter of the Hon. John J. Morgan, of New York, by whom he has had four sons and two daughters.

From 1828 to 1831 he practiced law in Cooperstown, New York. In 1831, on being appointed Adjutant-General of the State, he removed to Albany. In 1833 he was chosen Secretary of State and Regent of the University.

In 1841 and 1842 General Dix was a member of the New York Assembly from Albany County, and took an active and influential part in the most important legislative measures of that period—such as the liquidation of the State debt by taxation, and the establishment of single Congressional Districts.

On the election of Silas Wright as Governor of New York General Dix was chosen to complete his unexpired term of five years in the United States Senate, and took his seat in that body January 27, 1845, where he remained until March 4, 1849. He was Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and an active member of the Committee on Military affairs. He was the author of the warehousing system as it was adopted by Congress.

General Dix acted with that portion of the New York Democracy known as "the Free-Soil Democracy" in 1848–'49, and was their candidate for Governor in 1848. But when the delegation of New York became legitimately connected with the nomination of General Pierce for the Presidency in 1852, General Dix sustained that nomination.

On the election of General Pierce to the Presidency he first selected General Dix for his Secretary of State. But, as is well known, the leaders of the Southern democracy, of the Mason and Slidell school, protested so violently against his appointment that it was never made. The same influence prevented his appointment as Minister to France, which had been offered to him as an inducement for him to accept for a while the local office of Assistant-Treasurer of the United States in the city of New York. On the appointment of Mr. John Y. Mason, of Virginia, to the French embassy Mr. Dix resigned the office of Assistant-Treasurer, and withdrew almost wholly from politics.

Early in 1859 enormous defalcations having been discovered in the New York City Post-office, and the defaulting Postmaster having absconded, President Buchanan appointed General Dix to that office, and urged its acceptance on the ground that the public interests required the appointment of some man of the highest character and reputation for integrity and administrative ability. Mr. Dix yielded to these representations, and accepted the office. In January, 1861, the treachery and dishonesty of Floyd, Cobb, & Co., of the first Buchanan Cabinet, having reached their climax, and ended in the withdrawal or flight of those traitors from Washington, and the financial embarrassments of the Government requiring the appointment of a Secretary of the Treasury in whose probity, patriotism, skill, and efficiency the whole country could and would confide, General Dix was called to that high office, and entered on its duties January 15, 1861.

On the 18th January, 1861, three days after General Dix took charge of the Treasury Department, he sent a special agent to New Orleans and Mobile for the purpose of saving the revenue vessels at those ports from seizure by the rebels. The most valuable of these vessels, the Robert M'Clelland, at New Orleans, was commanded by Captain John G. Breshwood, with S. B. Caldwell as his lieutenant. Breshwood refused to obey the orders of General Dix's agent, Mr. Jones; and on being informed of this refusal, the Secretary telegraphed as follows: "If any man pulls down the American flag, shoot him on the spot!"

This dispatch, evidently thrown off fervido animo, and with a pen too hasty to pause for blot or literal correction, was intercepted by the Governor of Alabama, and did not reach Mr. Jones until the joint villainy of Captain Breshwood and the authorities of Louisiana had been consummated by stealing the cutter. It found its way very soon into the newspapers, and it flew over the land like the Highland cross of fire, setting the hearts of the people every where ablaze.

General Dix has since taken the field. He commanded at Baltimore for some months, and is now in command at Fortress Monroe, doing his duty manfully and well.

THE OHIO OIL WELL.

A LOVE STORY.

THE mare swerved, dashing the high, lightly built gig against a stump by the side of the narrow road; off flew the spidery wheel; down came the fast-trotting chestnut; and out like a brace of rockets were flung the driver and myself. There was a moment of scuffling, floundering, and general entanglement, while a thousand sparks of fire danced before my eyes, and then I was creeping away from the broken wreck, when I heard Ben, the driver, cry suddenly, "J'hoshaphat, mister, mind her heels, or you're a gone coon!" And I have an indistinct remembrance of receiving two or three stunning blows from what seemed to be a blacksmith's sledge-hammer, and of hearing a loud shout of human voices as I fainted.

When I again opened my eyes I found myself lying on a bank, a few yards from the spot where the accident had occurred. The smashed gig lay in the roadway, but the mare had long since kicked herself free, and was gone. Ben, my careless or unlucky charioteer, stood dolefully whistling, with the whip in his hand. His face was scratched, and his garments were muddy, but he seemed uninjured, though dismayed. Six or seven men in working clothes were lounging about, and apparently conversing on the subject of the recent upset, but only one seemed to concern himself about my personal condition. He was a tall, muscular young fellow, with a fine, handsome face, and a rich, bronzed complexion. He was better dressed, as well as better looking, than the others, though he wore homespun cloth, while the rest of the party were in patched and discolored suits of black. Kneeling beside me on the bank, this young farmer—for it was easy to guess his rank in life—was supporting my head with a gentleness that seemed wonderful for one of his thews and sinews.

"Labor lost, Joe," observed one shabby smoker from his seat; which, by-the-way, was on the very stump that had occasioned the accident. "The Britisher, or Dutchman, or whatever he be, air as dead as Julep Cæsar."

Weak and ill as I was, there was something in this conversion of the Dictator's name into a Yankee idiom which tickled my risible nerves, and I gave a feeble chuckle.

"He's alive, I tell you," answered Joe; "though it does sicken a chap, a few, to git such a pounding as that. I'd like to see you, Zack Brown, after such a dose of cold iron. You'd sing a trifle less positive, or I ain't Joe Mallory."

There was a laugh, which Joe cut short by asking which of the by-standers had some "whisky medicine" about him? A bottle of this potent cordial having been produced, the farmer put it to my lips, and with arbitrary kindness forced me to swallow as much of the fiery liquor as I could imbibe without actual suffocation.

"I know'd," said Joe, in a dogmatic way, "what puts new life into a man in such a case as this, though I ain't overfond of the Monongahela in gin'ral. Do ye feel to be stronger, Sir, now?"

This was addressed to me, and I contrived to answer by some feeble acknowledgment of his Samaritan kindness.

"No bones bruk?" inquired Joe, adding, as I shook my head, "then mebbe you could make a shift to walk, leanin' on me? Sparta ain't above a big mile off."

I tried to rise, and with the help of the young farmer I did contrive to reach my feet, but I could not keep them. One ankle was smartly sprained, the foot having been awkwardly twisted under me as I fell; and I sank down with a groan, as helpless as a rag effigy of a man. It became incumbent to carry me; and the by-standers, now they were quite satisfied that I was alive, volunteered with a pretty good grace to assist in my removal. A light iron gate that gave admission into a field hard by, and which contrasted oddly with the rough worm fence of unbarked wood, was taken off its hinges to form a litter, and I was borne away on this impromptu palanquin.

Ben the driver had by this time set off in plodding pursuit of the truant mare; but before starting he halloed out a stentorian request to know "wheer they were takin' his stranger tew, because Major Staines might like to action him in county court for the gig."

I could hardly help laughing again, though my bones ached cruelly, at the suggestion of suing a man for the damage done in half killing him; but I felt a thrill of languid pleasure when my protector rejoined,

"Darn the Major and his actions! He won't cl'ar many dollars that way, for 'tain't fust time that tearin' chestnut brute have made a smash of wood and iron, let alone humans. That mare's unpopular in the county, and no jury would give a red cent if her neck was bruk. Any how, if the Major wants a dose of law, tell him the stranger's under Joe Mallory's roof."

The other men gave a growl of surprise.

"Why, Joe," said he who was called Zach Brown, "I reckoned we'd jest drop the chap at Dan Hunt's, the taverner's. You oughter hev more wrinkles by this than to lumber up your house with a critter that wants a deal of waitin' on, and mebbe hasn't shinplasters enough to pay for his board."

I made some answer to this, or rather I began to assure my hearers that I was better provided with money than they perhaps guessed from my scanty luggage and plain dress; but Joe Mallory pressed his broad hand on my mouth to silence me, and angrily told Zach that "when he sent in a bill for food and shelter to a hurt traveler he hoped niggers would trample on him."

Zach said no more, and before long I was carried into the young farmer's house, and laid on a bed. The men were going at once after taking a dram of whisky, but I insisted on remunerating each of them with a dollar, which, after some hesitation, they consented to receive for "loss of time." Very odd fellows they were—honest, I am sure; proud in their way, as Hoosiers almost always are; and not willfully unkind, but blunt of feelings themselves, and coarsely indifferent to the feelings of others. Before they departed I heard one of them ask Joe in no smothered tone, "What whim made him have the stranger up there?" To which Joe made answer, in a more subdued tone, that "Dan's tavern was no place for a delicate town-raised critter to be ill in, and that it was plain I felt the banging more than I said."

When the men were gone the master of the house called aloud the respective names of "Aunty!" "Phillis!" and "Terence!" but no answer was returned. Muttering that he would soon return, my new friend strode out into the yard, whence issued the familiar sounds produced by gobbling turkeys, lowing calves, and grumbling pigs. The house was a long, low structure, mainly composed of timber, with chimneys of brick; but it was very substantial and roomy. The chamber in which I had been placed was one of a nest of similar rooms opening into a passage, at the end of which was the great kitchen, decorated with dangling hams, smoked venison, corn cobs, barrels of pickled pork, huge yellow pumpkins, and sundry shelves of pewter and New England crockery. At the other end was a door, seldom opened, leading into the best parlor, where stood the smart furniture, the china, fine linen, and so forth, never used but at wedding, funeral, or christening. The quilt on which I lay was of a coarse quality, but scrupulously clean; the brown, rough sheets of the bed were very clean too; the pine planks of the floor, thanks to soap and water, were as white as the glaring walls on which hung a few cheap colored prints of Bonaparte's battles and the Queen of Sheba's visit to Solomon. The house was that of a tolerably well-to-do Western farmer: rather neater than the majority, but with no luxury or ostentation. While I was musing on the strange quarters in which I found myself, my host returned, accompanied by a negro girl and an old white woman, dressed pretty much alike in common cotton prints of Lowell make. There was a great difference in their behavior, however; for while the negress, whom I shrewdly guessed to be the Phillis so often called in vain, merely grinned a salutation, the old woman bustled up to my bedside in a moment.

"You're welcome, stranger," said she, "but we can talk 'nother time, I guess. A nasty tumble! What a bruise that is on your temple—I'll jest fix that—Phillis, the bottle off the shelf in my room, third from the end—jump and get it, and be spry, do. That gal moves as if she'd lead in her shoes. All them darkeys do. Sprained your foot, eh, mister? Let me turn it about—so, does that hurt you? Then run, Joe, and git the black box. I've got somethin' there, woundy good for sprains."

Joe good-humoredly hurried off to fetch the rude medicine chest, saying with a pleasant laugh that "he knowed Aunty be glad of the job. She was a nurse if ever any woman was."

Certainly Miss Esther Mallory, Joe's aunt, was a born nurse as well as a born gossip. She could do any thing and every thing that was required in a sick-room, except hold her tongue. Talk she must, and while with real kindness and untiring skill she applied bandages and lotions to my bruised head and arm, and my sprained ankle; while she brewed me tea and barley-water; while she adjusted the pillows under my head, and superintended Phillis in the boiling of a chicken for my supper, she never seemed to intermit the rapid flow of her discourse.

From this notable female, in the course of the evening, I heard all the family history. How the Mallorys had migrated west from their original abode in New Jersey, where they had been, my hostess rather boastfully said, since William and Mary. How she, Esther Mallory, had been induced, sorely against her will, to accompany her two brothers, Joe's uncle and father, to the then half known wilds of Ohio. How she had been there a long time, and didn't half like it, and had seen great changes, and didn't half like them, and thought New Jersey the true Eden upon earth.

Further, the good old maid related how Joe's uncle had died of fever, and how Joe had succeeded his father in the property two years before, while she had staid to keep house for him till he got a wife, being fully determined to go back as soon as her nephew's marriage should take place, and live on her savings, or, as she called them, "money-scrapes," in her native village.

Miss Esther was about sixty: angular, raw-boned, with a hard-featured face puckered into as many wrinkles as a withered apple, with keen blue eyes and brisk, active movements. I had seen many women in New England who might have been her twin-sisters, and I knew the race well—thrifty, clean, bustling busybodies, with a supreme contempt for the dawdlers and slatterns down South. A good cook was Miss Esther, a good manager, a skilled seamstress, but a better nurse. If she could do any one thing better than another it was tending the sick, and I believe she felt personally grateful to me for giving her an occasion of exhibiting her knowledge and adroitness. At any rate she was very affable and chatty, and took the opportunity of Joe's absence to sing her nephew's praises; adding,

"Poor lad! poor lad! He's a heavy heart, for all he tries to keep up a smilin' face. Drat love and sentiment, sez I!"

I started. Sure enough, my kind young host had a melancholy look, unaccountable in one in robust health, tolerably well off, and evidently respected by his neighbors. I had noticed it before, but my bruised limbs and throbbing temples had put the matter out of court, until Miss Esther's remark aroused my curiosity and sympathy. Little pressing was needed to elicit from the garrulous aunt what, after all, was no secret. Joe Mallory had been for some time the accepted lover of Susan Boone, only daughter of Deacon Gabriel Boone, one of the most comfortable farmers in the district, and who, as Miss Esther said, was "rather uppish" about family, being own cousin to the renowned General Daniel Boone, the explorer of Kentucky. The marriage had been unluckily postponed—a circumstance due, I fancy, to Miss Esther's own obstructiveness, since it was her desire that "a good chist full of linen web" should be spun at home previous to the establishment of the young bride as mistress of the house. In the interval a new discovery had subverted the old order of things. This was no other than the discovery of the petroleum, or, as Miss Esther called it, the "ile." It had been found; its value had been greedily appreciated by a population not very apt to let any source of profit slip through their fingers; and the favored tract of country, Ohio, New York, and Pennsylvania, as well as Canada West, had ever since been in a fever of speculation. Here were diggings, not indeed auriferous, but of a substance capable of transmutation into five-dollar notes, brought home to the very doors of the people. Of course property maintained its rights; there was no scramble; but some grew rich by finding wealth bubbling up at their very thresholds, and among this number was Deacon Boone, Susan's father.

One of the two "flowing wells" of rock-oil which had come to light in the parish of Sparta was on Deacon Boone's land. Luckier than most of his neighbors, almost all of whom had oil beneath their fields, but oil only to be raised by expensive pumping, after the spade and mattock had done their work the old deacon was proprietor of an absolute spring of the odoriferous fluid, which seemed inexhaustible. Thousands of gallons, every drop of which had its market value, daily spouted and splashed into the air, and an immense per-centage of the produce was lost for lack of barrels and labor. Under these circumstances it is not wonderful that Deacon Boone, always a weak, vain man, lost his head, and grew, as Miss Esther quaintly said, "most too proud to dirty his shoes walkin'." This elation was accompanied by coldness of demeanor toward his old friends, whom he was loth any longer to regard in the light of equals, and by an ominous coldness of bearing toward his intended son-in-law. Besides this, he had dropped hints of the brilliant prospects in store for his family—hints that struck poor Joe with dismay, since his position was altered now. A little while before, Joe, with a tidy farm and a little sum in bank, had been a reasonably good match for the daughter of a corn and cattle factor; but he was become relatively poor when compared with the fortunate owner of a flowing well of wealth.

"And the young lady herself?" asked I, with some interest; "is she as mercenary as her father? As ready to give up a poor suitor in hopes of a better match afterward, I mean?"

Miss Esther answered rather slowly, as she plied her knitting-needles over the fast-growing stocking of unbleached wool.

"Wa'al, I hairdly know, Sir. Young gals are that flighty and flim they don't know the differ atween yes and no sometimes. Susan likes our Joe well enough, but her father and mother are nouther of 'em overstocked with sense, and they go clack! clack! about how she's to be a fine lady and that, and visit Europe, and keep cump'ny with grand folks, and wear sat'n and lace, and mebbe the gal's little head's getting turned. But I bel've, I do believe, her heart air a good and tender one, as it had oughter, seein' Joe desarves a good wife."

Joe, I must observe, was out just then, looking after a "loping deer," which Terence, the old Irish hired man, who helped on the farm, had caught a glimpse of in the corn; and therefore I had time to hear a great deal about the Boone family. Among other things was a story the moral of which was that Deacon Boone owed Joe a debt of gratitude, which rendered his present conduct in giving him the cold shoulder peculiarly mean and contemptible. Years before, when the State of Ohio was more thinly settled, the deacon had joined a party of hunters who had brought a bear to bay. Old Boone was no experienced woodsman, but was vain and fond of applause, and perhaps had a notion that sylvan prowess ran in his blood as a kinsman of the great Nimrod, Daniel Boone; and he rashly approached the desperate animal, and was caught in its dangerous embrace.

"I've heerd tell," said Miss Esther, "that the sight wur horrid. There wur the b'ar, with red eyes glitrin' with rage, and a mouth full of blood and foam, and the Deacon faintin' with fright and the hug he got, and never a man durst fire, for fear they'd miss the beast and hit the man. But our Joe—a mere boy then—what does he do but run in with his hunting-knife, and soon med the b'ar drop the Deacon and tackle to him. That war a tussle, mister, for a b'ar takes a deal of killin', and when they brought back our Joe here he war tore to bits and all blood. You may see the great scar on his forehead yet, whar the b'ar's claws scratched him jest as he drove the knife to its heart. 'Tain't every big man in the settlements, let alone a lad, cares to face a b'ar with on'y the knife; and no wonder the Deacon allays petted Joe arterward, and used to take a pleasure in seein' him and Susan together, and sayin' they'd make a handsome couple, and so they might if 'twarn't for this weary ile."

At that moment in came Joe, moody and careworn. In answer to the question whether he had shot the deer he rejoined bitterly that he had not, and did not care whether he never shot another.

"I know what's amiss," said his aunt, glancing up in her keen way. "You've seen Susan Boone, and she's vexed you."

"Hush, aunty!" said the young farmer, looking askance at me; but Miss Esther assured him that my presence need be no restraint, for she had told me all about it.

"You hev?" the young man exclaimed, with an angry stamp of his massive foot on the floor. But almost instantly his frank face relaxed into its usual good-humored look, and he said, with a sad sort of laugh,

"I oughter remember she folks were born to chatter, special them that hail from down eastway. And, arter all, I'm noways ashamed o' my share in the bizniss."

"You have no cause to be, I am sure," said I, half-apologetically; "and I hope I am not intrusive when I say that, quite apart from the kind service you have rendered me, my best wishes would go with you."

The young woodsman stretched out his mighty hand, grasped mine, and gave it a friendly squeeze that seemed to make every joint and sinew crack. It hurt me rather, but there was no mistaking the kindly intention.

"Thank'ee, mister," said Joe; "but I reckon I'm an onlucky coon. I some fear I air. This ile, that's a fortin to thousands, air jest perdition to me. Bad enough the Deacon should be huffy and queer—but Susan! she hadn't oughter—she hadn't oughter sot more store on a pocketful of dollars than an honest man's heart. I met her jest now at the door of the school-house, where the children hev been larnin' hymn-singing, and she most scorned to give me a look—she that I've known sin' we were both little trots of six year old!"

"War she alone?" asked Aunt Esther, in a quick, snappish voice.

"Wa'al, no," said Joe, reluctantly; "her parents war followin', and she war walkin' along of a smart town chap, one I know by head-mark, Mr. Peter Clovis Tapper, the lawyer to Lanesville. Such a dandy fellow, with rings and yaller gloves, and scent on his white cambric hankercher; no wonder she couldn't see me."

The manly young fellow cast a glance, half-proud, half-depreciating, on his plain working garb and brown muscular hands. Miss Esther thereupon expressed her fears that Mr. Tapper was a new suitor favored by Susan's parents, who were bent on throwing off the former engagement.

"If I re'ely thought so," said Joe, "that pretty dressed lawyer and me might hev words—we might."

As I saw the dark flush of wrath that crimsoned the backwoodsman's sun-browned face, making the scar of the bear's claw ominously white and clear on his broad, honest brow; and as I noticed how the long rifle vibrated in the grasp of his strong fingers, I thought Peter Clovis Tapper, attorney-at-law, might wince a little at the prospect of "words" with the man he had supplanted.

Mallory, however, like most men of genuine bravery, was remarkably modest and quiet in his general demeanor, and his threatening mood passed away very quickly. He said that Susan was very young, that girls were apt to be fanciful, and that he should go on believing her to be true to him and her plight until he received his dismissal from her own lips. Then he broke away from the subject, talked of my health, and congratulated me on being in Miss Esther's care: declaring, what I am sure was true, that the old lady had not her equal in the county for bone-setting and bandaging. Happily I did not find it necessary to test her skill in the former branch of art; my bruises were gradually reduced, and, but for my sprained ankle, I could soon have proceeded on my journey well enough. As it was, my hurt progressed but slowly toward recovery: sprains are tedious things, and I found a slight imprudence undid the good work of days. However, thanks to Miss Esther's washes and drops, thanks to wet bandages and the healing force of nature, I was soon able to walk in a weak, slow way, with assistance. Sometimes I had the aid of Joe's strong arm, sometimes of old Terence's, and now and then black Phillis was commissioned to help my progress through the village or across the yard where the turkeys and fowls, her especial charge, gobbled and clucked in vast squadrons. There had lately been, Phillis said, three more men employed on the farm at wages; one Irishman, a nephew of Terence, and two "colored gentlemen;" but these had all been tempted away to work at a cooperage where the people were busy, day and night, in making vats, kegs, and casks, to catch the oil which would otherwise be wasted. Much labor had been withdrawn from tillage, I learned, for the same purpose, and in many places the crops were neglected that the mineral treasures of the earth might be garnered up. Of the crude oil I saw enough and smelled enough to satiate an amateur for life, during the weeks I spent at Sparta. Although there were only two flowing wells in the parish, there were plenty of pump-wells, where machinery more or less rude, from the chain of hand-buckets to the small steam gin or Ericsson engine, were in almost constant employment. The streams had a film of oil on their surface, the carts dripped oil, the talk of the whole neighborhood was saturated with oil.

But the two who profited most by this sudden outpouring of an oleaginous cornucopia were Deacon Boone and another farmer, with whom the Deacon was on bad terms. This was Elder Hiram Rutherford, a middle-aged man, whose land at Wyandot Creek adjoined the Mallory property. He possessed the other flowing well; a still finer one than Mr. Boone's; and it was a sore alloy to Mr. Boone's triumph to know that the person he hated was getting rich at least as rapidly as he himself was. It matters little why these two men were foes. They had thwarted each other, I believe, about some affairs of bargain and sale; and since then, in church assemblies, sheriffs' courts, market, or merry-making, they never met but to bicker and oppose each other. Elder Hiram was a gaunt, lean old sinner, with white hair, a leering, bloodshot eye, and a wrinkled face, replete with cunning; whereas old Boone had a vacuous face, that expressed little beyond conceit and love of pelf. Mrs. Boone, whose acquaintance I also made, was a flighty, silly woman, much overdressed, and already looking forward to the time when her husband's wealth should buy her a place among the Upper Ten Thousand.

But in Susan, whom I had fancied a cold coquette, I found to my surprise a very charming girl, extremely pretty, gentle, and sweet-tempered; rather too much so, indeed, since she had been half-persuaded it was her duty to give up Joe. But she loved him still, and she detested Mr. Tapper, whose visits and attentions received every sanction and encouragement from her parents. It appeared that the wily young lawyer had found out the weakness of the old folks, and was dazzling them with pictures of New York grandeurs, and of the lofty position which his New York connections would insure to the Boone family. And at last old Boone actually found courage to tell Joe Mallory that he must give Susan up, unless, in a month's time, he could show that he had the means to "keep her as a lady."

Poor Joe was willing and able to keep her as became a farmer's wife and a farmer's daughter, and he did not ask for a cent of dowry; but the old man was inexorable, and gave Joe plainly to understand that he intended looking elsewhere for a son-in-law. It needed no conjuror to discover where the Deacon intended to look. Mr. P. C. Tapper came over at least twice a week from Lanesville, driving his own tandem, and attended by a black groom in a sky-blue coat. My young host was in despair, and but that Miss Esther and I seriously took the alarm, and used all our efforts to keep him and the legal dandy apart, I have no doubt that mischief would have ensued. In this time of trouble Susan's conduct puzzled us all. She was sincerely attached to Joe, for her eyes brightened and her cheek flushed when they met, and she was evidently unfascinated by the Lanesville lawyer; but she seemed a mere puppet in her parents' hands. The probable explanation is, that she was too young, plastic, and docile to offer any decided opposition to the ambitious projects of the old folks.

Joe did not resign himself to useless and idle murmuring at his fate. At my suggestion he availed himself of the services of Barney Leech, the old well-sinker, whose income had been greatly increased by the petroleum discoveries, and he made a bold push to find oil upon his land, which, as I have mentioned, was next to that of Elder Hiram. And very tantalizing it was to see the thick jet of rock oil spirting from the soil at Wyandot Creek hard by; to see men ladling it up with tubs and crocks, coopering it up in casks, stowing it in jars, old bottles, empty "breakers" of spirits, any thing, and yet allowing hundreds of gallons to run to waste over the creek waters; while not a drop could Joe Mallory find.

"Sorry for it, for your sake, Mr. Mallory," said the old well-digger, when the excavation had been made, and deepened, and deepened, all in vain. "Sorry for it, but it would be robbing your pocket, I guess, to go on. A'ready you've spent dollars enough on the grope, and it's plain you'll get no ile: not if you dig through the world, mister."

This was sad news for poor Joe, who had been informed that morning by Deacon Boone that the day of grace was nearly spent, that Susan and he had best forget one another, and that from Monday next his visits at the Boones's house must cease.

I could give the poor fellow no comfort. Indeed, I had been compelled to indorse the verdict of the experienced old well-digger, that the search was hopeless; and my opinion, as that of a professional engineer, had great weight with Joe. I have not previously mentioned my errand in Ohio, which was connected with this very oil. My business was to conclude a contract between several well proprietors and the commercial firm in whose behalf I was engaged, and who had purchased my patent of a new process for refining the crude petroleum. When able to walk tolerably, I had not neglected this duty, and had concluded a bargain with Elder Rutherford for the delivery of a certain quantity of coarse oil at specified periods. With Deacon Boone I was unable to come to terms, and I should have left Sparta but for my interest in Joe, and my wish to serve him if I could, were it only by keeping him from drubbing Mr. Tapper, and incurring the risk of crushing damages at law. Joe's position with respect to Deacon Boone and his daughter was, of course, well known throughout that small community, and much sympathy was expressed for the young woodsman.

On the evening of the day when the well-digger had ceased operations, I had taken a short stroll among the wooded spurs of the hills which belt in the rich alluvial meadows, with no other companion than a stout hickory walking-stick. Rather tired, I was glad to sit down under a giant black walnut, whose spreading boughs hummed pleasantly overhead as the wind waved them, and I lazily watched the wild pigeons winging their way home toward the forests.

Presently a dead branch crackled under a heavy listless tread, and Joe came striding down the path, with his rifle cast into the hollow of his left arm, his hat pulled over his eyes, and a sullen desperate look that it was painful to mark.

I was on the point of rising to accost him, when something rustled briskly through the scrubby ravine to my left, and a low voice called out,

"Joe! hist! Joe Mallory!"

"Who calls?" answered the young man, stopping short.

"A friend, I guess!" answered the same low voice, sibilant as a snake's hiss. And out from among the shrubs glided a lean figure, with a broad straw-hat and a suit of yellowish jean—Elder Hiram Rutherford.

"I've no humor to talk much to-night, mister; I'm best by myself, jest now," said Joe, roughly. The elder laughed a little hoarse laugh, with malice and craft in the ring of it, but his voice was not unkindly toned as he said,

"Silly boy, don't you go blockin' your own light. You jest listen to me, on'y five minutes, and then cut up rough and shirk my cump'ny, if ye like."

Without awaiting a reply the shrewd old man caught Joe by the arm and walked by his side, talking fast but low, with upraised forefinger, but evidently with earnest emphasis quite foreign to his usual sneering manner. Even had I been disposed to turn eaves-dropper not a word could I have caught. I got quietly up from my resting-place and limped home.

Miss Esther was vexed that evening, for Joe was late, and the tea grew black and bitter, the cakes cold, and the spruce beer flat with long waiting. But when her nephew did return he wore a strangely flushed and excited aspect, and there was a glow on his cheek and an elasticity in his step. And yet, though evidently in high spirits, there was something odd about Joe. He avoided meeting my gaze or his aunt's gaze whenever he could. He shuffled about turning his shoulder on the company. He ate and drank and laughed in a boisterous way, but as if his thoughts were busy elsewhere.

That night, Joe's chamber being next to mine, I could have sworn I heard his window stealthily opened an hour after midnight, and a dull sound as of a big man squeezing himself through a casement almost too narrow to give him egress. Then followed the cautious tread of a heavy foot on the garden paths. Though why Joe, as master of the house and of himself, should choose to slip out like a truant school-boy was beyond my comprehension. Next night the same sound was audible at the same hour. Nay more, I looked from my little window, and caught the gleam of a dark lantern in the garden passing rapidly on.

But next morning a surprise occurred which put these nocturnal sights and sounds out of my head.

A new flowing well of oil had been discovered, and, wonder of wonders, it was not only on Joe's land, but it had burst forth from the very excavation he had caused to be made! A cow-boy, passing with his herd along the lane, had first seen the jet and heard the splash of the spouting petroleum, and the news had spread like wild-fire over the village.

Before breakfast nine-tenths of the people of Sparta, men, women, and children, had gathered in a ring to gaze, open-mouthed and open-eyed, at the portent. There was no mistake about the matter. The tawny liquid, like thick dirty water, leaping up in a thick pillar of fluid, and arching over as it poured its spray into a little pool of oil, was genuine petroleum, and the quantity was considerable. Fortune had knocked at my host's door while he slept, or at any rate while he was supposed to sleep.

Bating a little not unnatural envy, the impulse of the neighbors was to be sincerely glad. Next to having such an outcrop of luck within his own bounds every man present would have selected Joe as the best recipient for such a boon. In elder times and elder countries the windfall might have been assigned to the bounty of the fairies, but as it was, more than one man, and many women, loudly declared the appearance of the oil a "dispensatory" in Joe's favor.

"What will Deacon Boone say to't?" was the general cry.

Meanwhile I was standing among the rest, sorely puzzled. My professional knowledge made me suspect that some subterranean flow of the petroleum had taken place, and that in all probability Elder Rutherford's well would be a loser by as much as Joe's gained. But beyond the fence of partition I could see the elder's well, flowing, to all appearance, as lustily as ever; and beside me stood the elder himself, with no sign of apprehension on his thin face, or visible in the twinkle of his piercing eyes. Indeed, Mr. Rutherford wore an odd look of stealthy satisfaction, and he was not the least loud in his congratulations of Joe.

"Very strange," thought I. "That old man must have a better heart than I gave him credit for. But the outbreak of this oil is one of those apparent caprices of nature which perplex men of science."

The last sentence had been uttered aloud, and the aged well-digger at my elbow answered it with:

"Solemn true, mister. We dug and bored, and no signs of ile, and here it comes up, plenty as peaches in the latter end o' July. But here comes Deacon Boone, struck all of a heap like at sight of the ile on the ground of the chap he choked off from coortin' his darter. May I never, but he's gwine to eat humble pie!"

Eat humble pie the Deacon certainly did; for, after hovering about the oil like a moth round a candle, after listening to the by-standers' vague calculations as to how many hundred or thousand gallons a day the well would yield, Mr. Boone went up to Joe and held out his hand:

"Give you joy, my boy!" he said, in a tremulous way, and, taking courage from Joe's hearty hand-grasp, actually made a stammering apology for his late conduct, and more than hinted that his desire was that Susan and Joe should "come together."

It was curious to see the vain, mean man wriggling out of the dilemma, to hear his clumsy phrases, and to observe his coarse greed and time-serving nature. Such things have been done before in the politest circles, but here the mercenary character stood out transparent and stripped of artificial adornments. Joe seemed to feel the truth as he made answer in a voice that was audible to many of those present:

"Deacon, we'll let by-gones be by-gones. I'm willin' to stick to our old 'greement, and I'll be proud of Susan for my wife, but I want nuthin' more. Keep your money and your settlements and stuff, or light your pipe with 'em if you like. I take your darter in the clothes she stands in, and no property—not a cent."

All the villagers were talking for the next three days of Joe's amazing luck and Joe's no less amazing disinterestedness. It was known that the Deacon, who had but one son and no other daughter, would have given Susan a large sum on her wedding-day, and would have prospectively settled a much larger sum upon her. And however productive Joe's well might be, a good balance at the bank was never a hindrance in business.

Some oil was collected at the new petroleum spring in the course of the next four days, but not as much as if the proprietor had not been absorbed in preparations for his wedding. That wedding was duly solemnized, with the full sanction of parents, minister, and magistrate; and a very pretty dark-eyed bride Susan was, and very lovingly she nestled by Joe's side. Hers was a soft nature, but she had found a strong prop to cling to. I was present at the wedding, and found much amusement in the spectacle of the feast and frolic, which wound up with an uproarious dance.

Deacon Boone publicly offered Joe a roll of notes, Susan's portion, which Joe as publicly declined.

Two days afterward I was to leave Sparta. My sturdy host would, I knew, have been pained by the proffer of pecuniary compensation for my maintenance, but he did not refuse to accept a good German rifle, neatly mounted in silver, which formed part of my worldly goods, and which I had sent for from Philadelphia. This Joe promised to keep for my sake, and in memory of the eventful time we had passed together.

On the day of my departure a new excitement pervaded the village. Joe's flowing well had ceased to flow. The oil-spring had vanished as abruptly as it had appeared. Before long a great crowd gathered, cries of wonder and condolence were heard, and Deacon Boone and his wife arrived in a state bordering on distraction. Joe alone seemed cool, though a little sheepish. In answer to the Deacon's voluble inquiries he referred him to Elder Rutherford. The Deacon faced his enemy.

"What do you know about it, mister?"

"Know?" said Elder Hiram; "you've come to the right shop for knowledge. The well's dry; and why? Why, because the lease was for a week, and it's out to-day."

And so it turned out. Elder Hiram's malicious wish to play the Deacon a trick had suggested an expedient at which Joe, in his despair, had caught. A few yards of two-inch piping, laid down under cover of night between the Wyandot Creek well and Joe's excavation, had sufficed to extemporize a flowing well on the latter's property, while it merely relieved the elder's petroleum spring of its superfluity. The pipe had now been removed.

Of course Susan's parents were very full of wrath and reproaches, but they were at last overborne by public opinion. The majority favored Joe, probably considering all stratagems fair in love and war, while Susan took her husband's part; and the young farmer's remark was unanswerable:

"Deacon, I ain't ashamed. It's fust time I ever deceived any body, but 'twar for Susan's sake, and I never took a dollar of your money, nor never will. Remember that!"

So the young folks moved West, and were thriving in Kansas when last I heard of them. Miss Esther was still with them.

CALIFORNIA JOE, OF THE BERDAN SHARP-SHOOTERS.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

CALIFORNIA JOE.

ON this page we give a characteristic portrait of CALIFORNIA JOE, the famous sharp-shooter, one of the best shots and most efficient men in that most efficient and admirable corps, Berdan's Sharp-shooters.

California Joe was first heard of by the public when the army was before Yorktown. The Herald correspondent then spoke of him:

"There is one personage who is making himself a history in the preliminary siege of the rebel strong-hold in front of us—'California Joe,' of the Berdan Sharp-shooters. I spent a delightful hour yesterday in his tent. He is a character, for sure enough. He is a rough customer, but looks a score of years younger. He stands as straight as an arrow, has an eye as keen as a hawk, never so steady as can be, and an endowment of hair and whiskers Beelzebub would have liked for a patriarchal portrait. He has spent years of his life shooting grizzly bears in the forests and fastnesses of California, and carries a telescopic rifle that in his hand will carry a long ways and with terrific accuracy. For several days past he has occupied as a shooting-place a hole dug in the ground just big enough for himself. His unerring rifle has made many a rebel bite the dust. He says he likes the sport, and he means to keep it up. A ball knocked off a portion of the upper bend of his ribs.

"In a subsequent letter from before Richmond the same correspondent said:

"A rebel sharp-shooter had been annoying himself and annoying the General and other officers by firing several times in that direction, and sending the bullets whistling in unwelcome proximity to their heads.

"'My men, can't you get your piece on that fellow who is firing on us, and stop his impertinence?' asked the General.

"M'CLELLAN IS OUR MAN"—FAVORITE SONG OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—[SEE PAGE 486.]

PRESENTATION OF A FLAG TO THE THIRTEENTH CONNECTICUT REGIMENT BY LOYAL LADIES OF NEW ORLEANS.—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF THE 12TH.—[SEE PAGE 487.]

"I think so," replied Joe; and he brought his telescope rifle to a horizontal position.

"Do you see him?" inquired the General.

"I do."

"How far is he away?"

"Fifteen hundred yards."

"Can you fetch him?"

"I'll try."

And Joe did try. He brought his piece to a steady aim, raised the trigger, and sent the bullet whizzing on its errand. Next hour, the officers meantime looking through their field glasses, Joe hit the fellow in the leg or foot. He went limping, for he had but one leg and two hands, in a style of locomotion that was something. Our General was so tickled—there is no better judge of rifle skill on the shores of the fellow's retreat than it was some time before he could get command of his rimmers sufficiently to thank Joe for what he had done.

THE FOURTH SCENE.

ALDBOROUGH, SUFFOLK.

CHAPTER I.

THE most striking spectacle presented to a stranger by the shores of Suffolk is the extraordinary defenselessness of the land against the encroachments of the sea.

At Aldborough, as elsewhere on this coast, local traditions are, for the most part, traditions which have been literally drowned. The site of the old town, once a populous and thriving port, has almost entirely disappeared in the sea. The German Ocean has swallowed up streets, market-places, jetties, and public walks; and the merciless waters, consummating their work of devastation, closed, no longer than eighty years since, over the sole monster's cottage at Aldborough, now famous in memory only as the birthplace of the poet CRABBE.

Thrust back year after year by the advancing waves, the inhabitants have receded, in the present century, to the last morsel of land which a firm enough to be built on—a strip of ground beamed in between a marsh on one side and the sea on the other. Here, trusting for their future security to certain sandhills which the capricious waves have thrown up to encourage them, the people of Aldborough have boldly established their quaint little watering-place. The first fragment of their earthly possessions is a low, natural dyke of shingle, surmounted by a public path which runs parallel with the sea. Bordering this path in a broken, uneven line are the villa residences of modern Aldborough—tasteful little houses, standing mostly in their own gardens, and possessing here and there, as horticultural ornaments, staring figure-heads of ships, doing duty for statues among the flowers. Viewed from the low level on which those villas stand, the sea, in certain conditions of the atmosphere, appears to be higher than the land; coasting-vessels gliding by assume gigantic proportions, and look alarmingly near the windows. Intermixed with the houses of the better sort are buildings of other forms and periods. In one direction the tiny Gothic town-hall of old Aldborough—once the centre of the vanished port and borough—now stands fronting the modern villas close on the margin of the sea. At another point a wooden tower of observation, crowned by the figure-head of a wrecked Russian vessel, rises high above the neighboring houses, and discloses through its scuttle-window grave men in dark clothing seated on the topmost story perpetually on the watch—the pilots of Aldborough looking out from their tower for ships in want of help. Behind the row of buildings thus curiously intermingled runs the one straggling street of the town, with its sturdy pilots' cottages, its mouldering marine store-houses, and its composite shops. Toward the northern end this street is bounded by the only eminence visible over all the marshy flat—a low, wooded hill on which the church is built. At its opposite extremity the street leads to a deserted martello tower, and to the forlorn outlying suburb of Slaughden, between the river Alde and the sea. Such are the main characteristics of this curious little outpost on the shores of England as it appears at the present time.

On a hot and cloudy July afternoon, and on the second day which had elapsed since he had written to Magdalen, Captain Wragge sauntered through the gate of North Shingles Villa, to meet the arrival of the coach, which then connected Aldborough with the Eastern Counties Railway. He reached the principal inn as the coach drove up, and was ready at the door to receive Magdalen and Mrs. Wragge on their leaving the vehicle.

The captain's reception of his wife was not characterized by an instant's unnecessary waste of time. He looked distrustfully at her shoes—roused himself on lip-toe—set her bonnet straight for her with a sharp tug—said, in a loud whisper, "hold your tongue"—and left her, for the time being, without further notice. His welcome to Magdalen, beginning with the usual flow of words, stopped suddenly in the middle of the first sentence. Captain Wragge's eye was a sharp one, and it instantly showed him something in the look and manner of his old pupil which denoted a serious change.

There was a settled composure on her face, which, except when she spoke, made it look as still and cold as marble. Her voice was softer and more equable, her eyes were steadier, her step was slower than of old. When she smiled the smile came and went suddenly, and showed a little nervous contraction on one side of her mouth never visible there before. She was perfectly patient with Mrs. Wragge: she treated the captain with a courtesy and consideration entirely new in his experience of her—but she was interested in nothing. The curious little shops in the back streets; the high impending sea; the old town-hall on the beach; the pilots, the fishermen, the passing ships—she noticed all these objects as indifferently as if Aldborough had been familiar to her from her infancy. Even when the captain drew up at the garden-gate of North Shingles, and introduced her triumphantly to the new house, she hardly looked at it. The first question she asked related, not to her own residence, but to Noel Vanstone's.

"How near to us does he live?" she inquired, with the only betrayal of emotion which had escaped her yet.

Captain Wragge answered by pointing to the fifth villa from North Shingles, on the Slaughden side of Aldborough. Magdalen suddenly drew back from the garden-gate as he indicated the situation, and walked away by herself to obtain a nearer view of the house.

Captain Wragge looked after her, and shook his head discontentedly. "The devil take that gentleman in the back-ground," he thought. "She has not got over the loss of him yet."

"May I speak now?" inquired a meek voice behind him, articulating respectfully ten inches above the top of his straw-hat.

The captain turned round and confronted his wife. The more than ordinary bewilderment visible in her face at once suggested to him that Magdalen had failed to carry out the directions in his letter, and that Mrs. Wragge had arrived at Aldborough without being properly aware of the total transformation to be accomplished in her identity and her name. The necessity of setting that doubt at rest was too serious to be trifled with, and Captain Wragge instituted the necessary inquiries without a moment's delay.

"CAPTAIN WRAGGE STARTED UP ON HIS KNEES, AND STOPPED ON THEM, PETRIFIED BY ASTONISHMENT."

"Stand straight, and listen to me," he began. "I have a question to ask you. Do you know whose Skin you are in at this moment? Do you know that you are dead and buried in London, and that you have risen like a phœnix from the ashes of Mrs. Wragge? No! you evidently don't know it. This is perfectly disgraceful. What is your name?"

"Matilda," answered Mrs. Wragge, in a state of the densest bewilderment.

"Nothing of the sort!" cried the captain, fiercely. "How dare you tell me your name's Matilda? Your name is Julia. Who am I? Hold that basket of sandwiches straight, or I'll pitch it into the sea?—Who am I?"

"I don't know," said Mrs. Wragge, meekly taking refuge in the negative side of the question this time.

"Sit down!" said her husband, pointing to the low garden wall of North Shingles Villa. "More to the right! More still! That will do. You don't know?" repeated the captain, sternly confronting his wife, as soon as he had contrived, by seating her, to place her face on a level with his own. "Don't let me hear you say that a second time. Don't let me have a woman who doesn't know who I am to operate on my beard to-morrow morning. Look at me! More to the left—more still—that will do. Who am I? I'm Mr. Bygrave—Christian name, Thomas. Who are you? You're Mrs. Bygrave—Christian name, Julia. Who is that young lady who traveled with you from London? That young lady is Miss Bygrave—Christian name, Susan. I'm her clever uncle Tom, and you're her addle-headed aunt Julia. Say it all over to me instantly, like the Catechism! What is your name?"

"Spare my poor head!" pleaded Mrs. Wragge. "Oh, please spare my poor head till I've got the stage-coach out of it!"

"Don't distress her," said Magdalen, joining them at that moment. "She will learn it in time. Come into the house."

Captain Wragge shook his wary head once more. "We are beginning badly," he said, with less politeness than usual. "My wife's stupidity stands in our way already."

They went into the house. Magdalen was perfectly satisfied with all the captain's arrangements; she accepted the room which he had set apart for her; approved of the woman-servant whom he had engaged; presented herself at tea-time the moment she was summoned—but still showed no interest whatever in the new scene around her. Soon after the table was cleared, although the daylight had not yet faded out, Mrs. Wragge's customary drowsiness after fatigue of any kind overcame her; and she received her husband's orders to leave the room (taking care that she left it "up at heel"), and to betake herself (strictly in the character of Mrs. Bygrave) to bed. As soon as they were left alone the captain looked hard at Magdalen, and waited to be spoken to. She said nothing. He ventured next on opening the conversation by a polite inquiry after the state of her health. "You look fatigued," he remarked, in his most insinuating manner. "I am afraid the journey has been too much for you."

"No," she replied, looking out listlessly through the window; "I am not more tired than usual. I am always weary now—weary at going to bed; weary at getting up. If you would like to hear what I have to say to you to-night, I am willing and ready to say it. Can't we go out? It is very hot here; and the droning of those men's voices is beyond all endurance." She pointed through the window to a group of boatmen idling, as only nautical men can idle, against the garden wall. "Is there no quiet walk in this wretched place?" she asked, impatiently. "Can't we breathe a little fresh air, and escape being annoyed by strangers?"

"There is perfect solitude within half an hour's walk of the house," replied the ready captain.

"Very well. Come out, then."

With a weary sigh she took up her straw bonnet and her light muslin scarf from the side-table upon which she had thrown them on coming in, and carelessly led the way to the door. Captain Wragge followed her to the garden-gate—then stopped, struck by a new idea.

"Excuse me," he whispered, confidentially. "In my wife's existing state of ignorance as to who she is, we had better not trust her alone in the house with a new servant. I'll privately turn the key on her, in case she wakes before we come back. Safe bind, safe find—you know the proverb!—I will be with you again in a moment."

He hastened back to the house, and Magdalen seated herself on the garden-wall to await his return.

She had hardly settled herself in that position when two gentlemen walking together, whose approach along the public path she had not previously noticed, passed close by her.

The dress of one of the two strangers showed him to be a clergyman. His companion's station in life was less easily discernible to ordinary observation. Practiced eyes would probably have seen enough in his look, his manner, and his walk to show that he was a sailor. He was a man in the prime of life; tall, spare, and muscular; his face sun-burned to a deep brown; his black hair just turning gray; his eyes dark, deep, and firm—the eyes of a man with an iron resolution and a habit of command. He was the nearest of the two to Magdalen, as he and his friend passed the place where she was sitting; and he looked at her with a sudden surprise at her beauty, with an open, hearty, undisguised admiration, which was too evidently sincere, too evidently beyond his own control to be justly resented as insolent—and yet, in her humor at that moment, Magdalen did resent it. She felt the man's resolute black eyes strike through her with an electric suddenness; and frowning at him impatiently, she turned away her head and looked back at the house.

The next moment she glanced round again to see if he had gone on. He had advanced a few yards—had then evidently stopped—and was now in the very act of turning to look at her once more. His companion, the clergyman, noticing that Magdalen appeared to be annoyed, took him familiarly by the arm; and, half in jest, half in earnest, forced him to walk on. The two disappeared round the corner of the next house. As they turned it the sun-burned sailor twice stopped his companion again, and twice looked back.

"A friend of yours?" inquired Captain Wragge, rejoining Magdalen at that moment.

"Certainly not," she replied; "a perfect stranger. He stared at me in the most impertinent manner. Does he belong to this place?"

"I'll find out in a moment," said the compliant captain, joining the group of boatmen, and putting his questions right and left, with the easy familiarity which distinguished him. He returned in a few minutes with a complete budget of information. The clergyman was well known as the rector of a place situated some few miles inland. The dark man with him was his wife's brother, commander of a ship in the merchant service. He was supposed to be staying with his relatives, as their guest for a short time only, preparatory to sailing on another voyage. The clergyman's name was Strickland, and the merchant-captain's name was Kirke—and that was all the boatmen knew about either of them.

"It is of no consequence who they are," said Magdalen, carelessly. "The man's rudeness merely annoyed me for the moment. Let us have done with him. I have something else to think of—and so have you. Where is the solitary walk you mentioned just now? Which way do we go?"

The captain pointed southward, toward Slaughden, and offered his arm.

Magdalen hesitated before she took it. Her eyes wandered away inquiringly to Noel Vanstone's house. He was out in the garden, pacing backward and forward over the little lawn, with his head high in the air, and with Mrs. Lecount demurely in attendance on him, carrying her master's green fan. Seeing this, Magdalen at once took Captain Wragge's right arm, so as to place herself nearest to the garden when they passed it on their walk.

"The eyes of our neighbors are on us; and the least your niece can do is to take your arm," she said, with a bitter laugh. "Come! let us go on!"

"They are looking this way," whispered the captain. "Shall I introduce you to Mrs. Lecount?"

"Not to-night," she answered. "Wait, and hear what I have to say to you first."

They passed the garden-wall. Captain Wragge took off his hat with a smart flourish, and received a gracious bow from Mrs. Lecount in return. Magdalen saw the housekeeper survey her face, her figure, and her dress, with that reluctant interest, that distrustful curiosity, which women feel in observing each other. As she walked on beyond the house the sharp voice of Mr. Noel Vanstone reached her through the evening stillness. "A fine girl, Lecount!" she heard him say. "You know I am a judge of that sort of thing—a fine girl!"

As those words were spoken Captain Wragge looked round at his companion in sudden surprise. Her hand was trembling violently on his arm, and her lips were fast closed with an expression of speechless pain.

Slowly and in silence the two walked on until they reached the southern limit of the houses, and entered on a little wilderness of shingle and withered grass—the desolate end of Aldborough, the lonely beginning of Slaughden.

It was a dull, airless evening. Eastward was the gray majesty of the sea, hushed in breathless calm—the horizon line invisibly melting into the monotonous misty sky; the idle ships shadowy and still on the idle water. Southward, the high ridge of the sea-dyke, and the grim massive circle of a martello tower, reared high on its mound of grass, closed the view darkly on all that lay beyond. Westward, a lurid streak of sunset glowed red in the dreary heaven—blackened the fringing trees on the far borders of the great inland marsh—and turned its little gleaming water-pools to pools of blood. Nearer to the eye, the sullen flow of the tidal river Alde ebbed noiselessly from the muddy banks; and nearer still, lonely and unprosperous by the bleak water-side, lay the lost little port of Slaughden, with its forlorn wharfs and warehouses of decaying wood, and its few scattered coasting-vessels deserted on the oozy river-shore. No fall of waves was heard on the beach; no trickling of waters bubbled audibly from the idle stream. Now and then the cry of a sea-bird rose from the region of the marsh; and at intervals, from farm-houses far in the inland waste, the faint winding of horns to call the cattle home, traveled mournfully through the evening calm.

Magdalen drew her hand from the captain's arm, and led the way to the mound of the martello tower. "I am weary of walking," she said. "Let us stop and rest here."

She seated herself on the slope, and, resting on her elbow, mechanically pulled up and scattered from her into the air the tufts of grass growing under her hand. After silently occupying herself in this way for some minutes, she turned suddenly on Captain Wragge. "Do I surprise you?" she asked, with a startling abruptness. "Do you find me changed?"

The captain's ready tact warned him that the time had come to be plain with her, and to reserve his flowers of speech for a more appropriate occasion.

"If you ask the question I must answer it," he replied. "Yes; I do find you changed."

She pulled up another tuft of grass. "I suppose you can guess the reason?" she said.

The captain was wisely silent. He only answered by a bow.

"I have lost all care for myself," she went on, tearing faster and faster at the tufts of grass. "Saying that is not saying much, perhaps; but it may help you to understand me. There are things I would have died sooner than do, at one time—things it would have turned me cold to think of. I don't care now whether I do them or not. I am nothing to myself; I am no more interested in myself than I am in these handfuls of grass. I suppose I have lost something. What is it? Heart? Conscience? I don't know. Do you? What nonsense I am talking! Who cares what I have lost? It has gone; and there's an end of it. I suppose my outside is the best side of me, and that's left at any rate. I have not lost my good looks, have I? There! there! never mind answering; don't trouble yourself to pay me compliments. I have been admired enough to-day. First the sailor, and then Mr. Noel Vanstone—enough for any woman's vanity surely! Have I any right to call myself a woman? Perhaps not; I am only a girl in my teens. Oh me, I feel as if I was forty!" She scattered the last fragments of grass to the winds; and, turning her back on the captain, let her head drop till her cheek touched the turf bank. "It feels soft and friendly," she said, nestling to it with a hopeless tenderness horrible to see. "It doesn't cast me off. Mother Earth! The only mother I have left!"

Captain Wragge looked at her in silent surprise. Such experience of humanity as he possessed was powerless to sound to its depths the terrible self-abandonment which had burst its way to the surface in her reckless words—which was now fast hurrying her to actions more reckless still. "Devilish odd!" he thought to himself, uneasily. "Has the loss of her lover turned her brain?" He considered for a minute longer, and then spoke to her. "Leave it till to-morrow," suggested the captain, confidentially. "You are a little tired to-night. No hurry, my dear girl, no hurry."

She raised her head instantly, and looked round at him with the same angry resolution, with the same desperate defiance of herself, which he had seen in her face on the memorable day at York when she had acted before him for the first time. "I came here to tell you what is in my mind," she said, "and I will tell it!" She seated herself upright on the slope, and clasping her hands round her knees, looked out steadily, straight before her, at the slowly darkening view. In that strange position she waited until she had composed herself; and then addressed the captain, without turning her head to look round at him, in these words:

"When you and I first met," she began, abruptly, "I tried hard to keep my thoughts to myself. I know enough by this time to know that I failed. When I first told you at York that Michael Vanstone had ruined us, I believe you guessed for yourself that I, for one, was determined not to submit to it. Whether you guessed or not, it is so. I left my friends with that determination in my mind; and I feel it in me now stronger, ten times stronger, than ever."

"Ten times stronger than ever," echoed the captain. "Exactly so—the natural result of firmness of character."

"No. The natural result of having nothing else to think of. I had something else to think of before you found me ill in Vauxhall Walk. I have nothing else to think of now. Remember that, if you find me for the future always harping on the same string. One question first. Did you guess what I meant to do, on that morning when you showed me the newspaper, and when I read the account of Michael Vanstone's death?"

"Generally," replied Captain Wragge—"I guessed, generally, that you proposed dipping your hand into his purse, and taking from it (most properly) what was your own. I felt deeply hurt at the time by your not permitting me to assist you. Why is she so reserved with me? (I remarked to myself)—why is she so unreasonably reserved?"

"You shall have no reserve to complain of now," pursued Magdalen. "I tell you plainly—if events had not happened as they did, you would have assisted me. If Michael Vanstone had not died I should have gone to Brighton, and have found my way safely to his acquaintance under an assumed name. I had money enough with me to live on respectably for many months together. I would have employed that time, I would have waited a whole year if necessary, to destroy Mrs. Lecount's influence over him, and I would have ended by getting that influence, on my own terms, into my own hands. I had the advantage of years, the advantage of novelty, the advantage of downright desperation, all on my side, and I should have succeeded. Before the year was out—before half the year was out—you should have seen Mrs. Lecount dismissed by her master, and you should have seen me taken into the house, in her place, as Michael Vanstone's adopted daughter—as the faithful friend who had saved him from an adventuress in his old age. Girls no older than I am have tried deceptions as hopeless in appearance as mine, and have carried them through to the end. I had my story ready; I had my plans all considered; I had the weak point in that old man to attack in my way, which Mrs. Lecount had found out before me to attack in hers—and I tell you again I should have succeeded."

"I think you would," said the captain. "And what next?"

"Mr. Michael Vanstone would have changed his man of business next. You would have succeeded to the place; and those clever speculations on which he was so fond of venturing would have cost him the fortunes of which he had robbed my sister and myself. To the last farthing, Captain Wragge—as certainly as you sit there, to the last farthing! A bold conspiracy, a shocking deception—wasn't it? I don't care! Any conspiracy, any deception is justified to my conscience by the vile law which has left us helpless. You talked of my reserve just now. Have I dropped it at last? Have I spoken out at the eleventh hour?"

The captain laid his hand solemnly on his heart, and launched himself once more on his broadest flow of language.

"You fill me with unavailing regret," he said. "If that old man had lived, what a crop I might have reaped from him! What enormous transactions in moral agriculture it might have been my privilege to carry on! Ars longa," said Captain Wragge, pathetically drifting into Latin—"vita brevis! Let us drop a tear on the lost opportunities of the past, and try what the present can do to console us. One conclusion is clear to my mind. The experiment you proposed to try with Mr. Michael Vanstone is totally hopeless, my dear girl, in the case of his son. His son is impervious to all ordinary forms of pecuniary temptation. You may trust my solemn assurance," continued the captain, speaking with an indignant recollection of the answer to his advertisement in the Times, "when I inform you that Mr. Noel Vanstone is, emphatically, the meanest of mankind."

"I can trust my own experience as well," said Magdalen. "I have seen him and spoken to him—I know him better than you do. Another disclosure, Captain Wragge, for your private ear! I sent you back certain articles of costume—when they had served the purpose for which I took them to London. That purpose was to find my way to Noel Vanstone, in disguise, and to judge for myself of Mrs. Lecount and her master. I gained my object; and I tell you again, I know the two people in that house yonder, whom we have now to deal with, better than you do."

Captain Wragge expressed the profound astonishment and asked the innocent questions appropriate to the mental condition of a person taken completely by surprise.

"Well," he resumed, when Magdalen had briefly answered him; "and what is the result on your own mind? There must be a result, or we should not be here. You see your way? Of course, my dear girl, you see your way?"

"Yes," she said, quickly; "I see my way."

The captain drew a little nearer to her, with eager curiosity expressed in every line of his vagabond face.

"Go on," he said, in an anxious whisper; "pray go on."

She looked out thoughtfully into the gathering darkness without answering, without appearing to have heard him. Her lips closed, and her clasped hands tightened mechanically round her knees.

"There is no disguising the fact," said Captain Wragge, warily rousing her into speaking to him. "The son is harder to deal with than the father—"

"Not in my way," she interposed, suddenly.

"Indeed!" said the captain. "Well! they say there is a short cut to every thing, if we only look long enough to find it. You have looked long enough, I suppose; and the natural result has followed—you have found it."

"I have not troubled myself to look; I have found it without looking."

"The deuce you have!" cried Captain Wragge, in great perplexity. "My dear girl, is my view of your present position leading me altogether astray? As I understand it, here is Mr. Noel Vanstone in possession of your fortune and your sister's, as his father was—and determined to keep it, as his father was?"

"Yes."

"And here are you—quite helpless to get it by persuasion; quite helpless to get it by law—just as resolute in his case as you were in his father's to take it by stratagem in spite of him?"

"Just as resolute? Not for the sake of the fortune—mind that! For the sake of the right."

"Just so. And the means of coming at that right, which were hard with the father—who was not a miser—are easy with the son, who is?"

"Perfectly easy."

"Write me down an Ass for the first time in my life!" cried the captain, at the end of his patience. "Hang me if I know what you mean!"

She looked round at him for the first time—looked him straight and steadily in the face.

"I will tell you what I mean," she said; "I mean to marry him."

Captain Wragge started up on his knees, and stopped on them, petrified by astonishment.

"Remember what I told you," said Magdalen, looking away from him again. "I have lost all care for myself. I have only one end in life now, and the sooner I reach it—and die—the better. If—" She stopped, altered her position a little, and pointed with one hand to the fast-ebbing stream beneath her, gleaming dim in the darkening twilight—"if I had been what I once was, I would have thrown myself into that river sooner than do what I am going to do now. As it is, I trouble myself no longer; I weary my mind with no more schemes. The short way, and the vile way, lies before me. I take it, Captain Wragge—and marry him."

"Keeping him in total ignorance of who you are?" said the captain, slowly rising to his feet, and slowly moving round so as to see her face. "Marrying him as my niece—Miss Bygrave?"

"As your niece, Miss Bygrave."

"And after the marriage—?" His voice faltered as he began the question, and he left it unfinished.

"After the marriage," she said, "I shall stand in no further need of your assistance."

The captain stooped as she gave him that answer, looked close at her, and suddenly drew back without uttering a word. He walked down one more pace, and sat down again doggedly on the grass. If Magdalen could have seen his face in the dying light, his face would have startled her. For the first time, probably, since his boyhood Captain Wragge had changed color. He was deadly pale.

"Have you nothing to say to me?" she asked.

"Perhaps you are waiting to hear what terms I have to offer?" he answered. "I have to pay all our expenses here; and as the end of the day of the marriage, you take a farewell gift away with you of two hundred pounds. Do you consider me your assistant or your paying guest?"

"What am I expected to do?" he asked, with a furtive look at her, and a sudden distrust in his voice.

"You are expected to preserve my assumed character and your own," she answered: "and you are to prevent any inquiries into Miss Garth's from discovering who I really am. I ask no more. The rest is my responsibility, not yours."

"I have nothing to do with what happens at any time or in any place—after the marriage?"

"Nothing whatever."

"I may leave you at the church door, if I please?"

"At the church door, with your fee in your pocket."

"Paid from the money in your own possession?"

"Certainly! How else should I pay it?"

Captain Wragge took off his hat, and passed his handkerchief over his face for the first time in bed.

"Give me a minute to consider it," he said.

"As many minutes as you like," she rejoined, reclining on the bank in her former position, and returning to her former occupation of picking up the tufts of grass and flinging them out into the air.

The captain's reflections were not complicated by any summary divergence, from the present completion of his own position to the contemplation of Magdalen's. Utterly incapable of appreciating the injury done her by Frank's inflexible adherence to his engagement—an injury which had served him, at one critical moment, to gain an opinion which, delusion though it was, had been the saving aspiration of her life—Captain Wragge regarded the simple fact of her despair just as he found it, and then looked straight to the consequences of the proposal which she had made to him.

In the prospect before the marriage he saw many serious reasons for more than the mere form of a deception, in no important degree different—except as it tended to be aggravated by the deceptions which his vagabond life had long since accustomed him to contemplate and to carry out. In the prospect after the marriage he dimly discerned, through the ominous mists of future days, the looming phantoms of Terror and Crime, and the black gulf behind them of Ruin and Death. A man of boundless subtlety and resource within his own limits, beyond those limits the captain was as marvellously submissive to the majesty of the law as the most harmless man in existence. Conspiracies in looking after his own personal safety the veriest coward that ever crouched under the earth. But one serious question now filled his mind. Could he, on the terms proposed to him, join the conspiracy against Basil Vanstone up to the point of the marriage, and then withdraw from it, without risk of involving himself in the consequences which his experience told him were certainly ensue?

Strange as it may seem, his decision in this emergency was mainly influenced by no less a person than Mr. Noel Vanstone himself. The captain might have resisted the money-offer which Magdalen had made to him—for the profits of the Intermittent had left him in funds on with more than three times two hundred pounds. But the prospect of injuring him after his dark at the man who had estimated his information and himself at the value of a fivepound note proved too much for the captain and his self-control. On the small neutral ground of self-interest they had been met and the contest on the same terms. Captain Wragge's decision when he saw the answer to his adventurous proposal in no retrospective estimate of his own conduct: he was as deeply offended, as bitterly angry, as if he had made a perfectly honorable proposal, and had been rewarded by a very personal insult. He had been too full of his own greatness to keep it out of his first letter to Magdalen. He had more or less forgotten himself on every subsequent occasion when Noel Vanstone's name was mentioned. But, on calmly deciding the course he should take, it is not too much to say that the malice of many years, and for the first time in his life, into the right place, and the motive of malice carried the day.

"I accept the terms," said Captain Wragge, coming briskly on his legs again. "Subject, of course, to the conditions agreed on between us. We put on the wedding-day, Miss Garth, when you don't ask where I go. From that time forth we are strangers to each other."

Magdalen rose slowly from the mound. A curious depression, a sullen despair, showed itself in her look and manner. She refused the money offered hand; and her tones, when she answered him, were so low that he could hardly hear them.

"We understand each other," she said; "and the sooner we now go back. You may introduce me to Mr. Lecount to-morrow."

"I must ask a few questions first," said the captain, gravely. "There are more risks to be run in this matter, and more pitfalls in our way, than you seem to suppose. I must know the whole history of your morning call on Mrs. Lecount before I put you and that woman on speaking terms with each other."

"Wait till to-morrow," she broke out, impatiently. "Don't burden me by talking about it to-night."

The captain said no more. They turned their faces toward Aldborough, and walked slowly homeward.

By the time they reached the houses night had overtaken them. Neither moon nor stars were visible. A faint moaning wind, blowing from the land, had come with the darkness. Magdalen paused on the lonely public walk to breathe the air more freely. After a while she turned her face from the breeze, and looked out over the sea. The immeasurable silence of the calm waters, lost in the black void of night, was awful. She stood looking into the darkness, as if the mystery had no secrets for her—she advanced toward it slowly, as if it drew her by some hidden attraction into itself.

"I am going down to the sea," she said to her companion. "Wait here, and I will come back."

He lost sight of her in an instant—it was as if the night had swallowed her up. He listened, and counted her footsteps by the crunching of them on the shingle in the deep stillness. They retreated slowly and farther away into the night. Suddenly the sound of them ceased. Had she paused on her course? or had she reached one of the strips of sand left bare by the ebbing tide?

He waited and listened anxiously. The time passed, and no sound reached him. He still listened with a growing distrust of the darkness. Another moment, and there came a sound from the invisible shore. Far and faint from the beach below, it crept toward him through the silence. Then all was still once more.

In sudden alarm he stepped forward to descend to the beach and to call her. But he could cross the path footsteps rapidly advancing straight in his direction. He waited instant and the figure of a man passed quickly along the road between him and the sea. It was too dark to discern any thing but a figure. He said, how ever, only possible to see that he was a tall man, and all trace of him in the merchant service whose name was Kirke.

The figure passed on northward and was instantly lost in the darkness. Magdalen crossed the path, and advancing a few steps down the beach stopped and listened again. The crash of footsteps in the shingle ceased for one moment. Slowly as the sound had left him that sound now returned. He called to her, and spoke to him. She came on till he could just see her—a shadow ascending the shingly slope, and gliding past him in silence toward the road.

"You alarmed me," he whispered, nervously. "I was afraid something had happened. I heard you cry out, as if you were in pain."

"Did you?" she said, carelessly. "I was in pain. But it's over now. Let us go home."

Her hand mechanically swung something to and fro as she spoke. It was the little gold watch-chain and the white silk bag which she had always kept hidden in her bosom up to this time. One of the relics which it had been the object of the relics which she had not had the heart to part with before—was gone from its hiding-place. Above the one strange shore, she had torn from her the fondest of her virgin memories, the dearest of her virgin hopes. Above the other strange shore she had taken the lock of Frank's hair from its encircling folds of paper, and had cast it away from her to the sea and the night.

Decidedly one of the best Novels of the season.—LONDON EXAMINER.

OLIVE BLAKE'S GOOD WORK.

A Novel.

By John Cordy Jeaffreson,
AUTHOR OF "ISABEL: THE YOUNG WIFE AND THE OLD LOVE."

8vo, Paper, 25 Cents.

Opinions of the Press.

Decidedly this is one of the best novels of the season. The first chapters of "Olive Blake" prove that Mr. Jeaffreson has in his pen the right spirit of an artist.—Examiner.

The story told is an extremely interesting one; a story that will certainly be read through, and in some parts more than once, by any one who begins it. The plan does not commend itself to the greatest of the sagacious readers until he comes face to face with the solution at the author's own appointed time.—Observer.

This is a striking book, clever, interesting, and original. We have seldom met with a book so thoroughly true to life, so deeply interesting in its detail, and so touching in its simple pathos as "Abel Drake's Wife."—Illustrated London News.

The author can create, and not merely describe, can produce before us feelings when we recognize and sympathize.—Spectator.

THE LATE MARTIN VAN BUREN, EX-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 503.]

A PROCLAMATION.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

In pursuance of the sixth section of the act of Congress entitled "An Act to suppress Insurrection, to punish Treason and Rebellion, to seize and confiscate the Property of Rebels, and for other Purposes," approved July 17, 1862, and which act, and the joint resolution explanatory thereof, are hereinafter published, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim to and warn all persons within the contemplation of said sixth section to cease participating in, aiding, countenancing, or abetting the unlawful rebellion, or any rebellion, against the Government of the United States, and to return to their proper allegiance to the United States, on pain of the forfeiture and confiscation of their estates and property which, by said sixth section provided.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this 25th day of July, [L. S.] in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, and of the Independence of the United States the eighty-seventh.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President—WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

A NEW MOVE ON THE EUROPEAN BOARD.

EUROPEAN politics are a queer puzzle. The latest news from Europe contains the statement that a new and close alliance is to be formed between France and Russia. Simultaneously, we perceive that the Moniteur, the official organ of the French Government, has ceased to take the side of the Southern rebels, since more advices from the North, and even undertakes the defense of General Butler from British scurrility.

If LOUIS Napoleon really cherishes the desire to humble England—as Englishmen generally believe—events could not have shaped themselves more conveniently for the accomplishment of his purpose. His movements have encouraged the British to think that if England interfered in this country France would side with her. Acting on this belief, the London press has pursued us with a brutal and blackguard malignity which has filled the American heart with the most intense hostility toward England. If, in carrying out the policy of the new Russo-French alliance, that we Emperor should resolve to quarrel with England, he would thus have the entire civilized world—with, perhaps, the single exception of helpless Austria—on his side. Spain would want to regain Gibraltar. Italy is turning to arms for the recovery of Nice. And in this country, we are sorry to say, has been goaded into a pitch of fury by the studied snubs, arrogance, and study cruelty of the British press that we should certainly raise no hand on behalf of Great Britain.

It is a little remarkable that, at a late review of Volunteers in England, the Prime Minister, Lord Palmerston, took pains to be present, and to utter a speech—with unusual and hearty earnestness," as a reporter said—to be ready, when the time came, to perform manfully the work for which they had been organized.

TURNING OVER A NEW LEAF.

MAJOR-GENERAL HENRY W. HALLECK is now Commander-in-Chief of the army of the United States, and the public may confidently feel satisfied, in the first place, that the various operations of our forces will be directed with single mind; and secondly, that the direction will be that of a soldier, and not that of a lawyer.

It is impossible to exaggerate the evil which has been done by division of counsels and civilian interference with military movements. General Halleck's rapid success in the West mainly increased the obstacles in the path of General M'Clellan, and enabled Jeff Davis to send to Richmond the ablest generals and possibly some of the troops of the Southwestern rebel army. Again, when General M'Clellan embarked at Alexandria for Old Point, it was with the distinct understanding that General M'Dowell would co-operate with him with 40,000 men from Fredericksburg; it was not till his troops had actually commenced that the civilians in authority at Washington discovered that a movement by M'Dowell on Richmond might leave Washington uncovered, countermanded their previous orders, and paralyzed the Army of the Potomac. General M'Clellan had understood that he could not have the co-operation of M'Dowell his plans might have been very different, and the losses incurred at Williamsburg, Fairoaks, and the Chickahominy might have been spared. We have it on the best authority that General M'Clellan from the beginning of hostilities from Washington that he must dispense with M'Dowell's army, he covered his flank with his own, with the powerful result that he plunged in sombre silence—to use the language of one of his aids, "with an awful expression." He saw that the carefully-laid plan of attack had been submitted to and approved by the civilian authorities at Washington had been overset by an after-thought, and that his army, for the work which had been mathematically certain, was now rendered problematical. If General Halleck had been at Washington with the powers of Commander-in-Chief, Beauregard would never have been set free to go to Richmond, and M'Clellan would never have been allowed to send that fatal expedition whose success could have been afterward defeated by civilian panic.

There has been much said in the papers about a rivalry between M'Clellan and Halleck. There is no foundation for any thing of the kind. General Halleck's letter to the Commander-in-Chief by General M'Clellan on 9th July, when the President visited Harrison's Landing, and was appointed Commander-in-Chief, returned to Washington on 11th. They are old personal friends, thoroughly appreciate each other's genius, and will work together in perfect harmony.

It may not be amiss to refer briefly, in this connection, to the speech of Senator Chandler, of Michigan, on the subject of the war, and to the echoes of that speech in the press. Certain friends of General M'Clellan are vastly indignant that a speech should have been made criticising their hero. We do not share the feeling. In our opinion General M'Clellan has not committed a single error in the whole campaign. He has and has evinced qualities which place him in the highest military ranks. History, we think, will place his movement from the James to Abominy to the James among the grandest military exploits of the world. It will pronounce that others, not M'Clellan, are responsible for the failure of the Union army to take Richmond in July. As a soldier we should be very sorry to believe that we had any soldier in the field who was not subject to criticism, or whose performance was not fairly a topic of debate. Senator Chandler is entitled to the opinion of General M'Clellan, and entitled to express it as the Senator pleases. We are entitled to print it. It must go for what it is worth. General M'Clellan, we are satisfied, would be the last man to object to criticism. There is enough of a man to know that if it be unjust, his record will shine all the brighter for his previous depreciation of it; and that, in the end, it will be the way the better for the country. Thus far Senator Chandler's attack seems to have merely strengthened the public and the President's confidence in M'Clellan.

The appointment of a resident Commander-in-Chief of Major-General Halleck, the national orders directing the army to subsist itself on the enemy, and emploj negroes in every fitting capacity, indicate that the nation has at last grown wise enough in the method of carrying on the war. The new orders from Washington command the hearty support of every loyal man. They show that the rebels should be made to feel, in their hearths and homes, the horrors of the war they have forced on us. And at the same time, in prosecuting the arduous task before us, we should secure any allies we can—white men if they offer, black men if they will.

A number of well-meaning persons complain that the Government is too slow—that we should have had a million of men in the field at once that President ought long ago to have authorized our officers to subsist themselves on the rebels, and employ fugitive negroes. If Mr. Lincoln had done any after the event—very simple for people who have had no responsibility to bear, to turn round upon the men who have borne it, and call the want of public service on their shoulders and say, when disaster occurs, "I told you so."

History teaches us very plainly that revolutions are steadily progressive, and that a Government can be safe and strong, must never be in advance of the nation. If Mr. Lincoln had commanded our generals to seize the property of Southern rebels in the spring, to declare that the North would abandon the Constitution the act as needless and barbarous. If, at the same time, a large majority of the loyal people would have opposed him; numbers of army officers, who are now fierce abolitionists, would have resigned; and such conservative soldiers as General Lewis Wallace, General Ben Butler, General Hunter himself would have refused to serve. Mr. Lincoln was compelled to wait until stern experience had eradicated from the Democratic mind the old pro-slavery prejudices, which had been fostered for a generation. Let any one ask General Wallace what his views were when he raised the 11th Indiana Zouaves: he will say that, while he was for the Union, he was heartily pro-slavery. Now he denounces those who oppose negro regiments as little better than traitors. Simple General Butler's letter to Governor Andrew, dated from Annapolis, in April, 1861, with his present dispatches: the progress is marvelous. In April, 1861, there was not a firmer supporter of slavery in the country than Major Dave Hunter, of Illinois, who has just raised the 1st South Carolina Regiment of Volunteers, consisting exclusively of negroes. It is possible that Mr. Lincoln may have foreseen, five months ago, that he would have to be compelled to arm negroes and seize Southern property. But whether he did or not, it is more than probable that, if he had so far anticipated the progress of public sentiment as to inaugurate any of these main measures, we should have had—what the rebels fondly contemplate now—a divided and powerless North.

Let us, again, wait patiently to the numbers of our forces. Why didn't the President call out 300,000 on April 15, 1861, instead of 75,000? Let any man think over the sensations on the morning when the call for 75,000 appeared and say, honestly, whether he didn't think the numbers enormous. Why, Illinois almost curiously whether she could furnish 6,000 men at a new business. None of the young men knew any thing of drill. The wisest could not tell whether the people of the North would fight en masse for the Union. If Mr. Lincoln had stated in a proclamation that 300,000 men were required, people might have replied that the game was not worth the candle. So in July, when he asked for 600,000 more, the 300,000 called for by ex post facto critics shrink, "Why didn't he call for a million, and finish up the work?" Those very men, when the Tribune appeared on the 5th July, believed and declared that it was merely an exaggeration intended to frighten the South. They didn't know any more than we ourselves what wanted, much less raised, and found too few.

We do not wish to be understood as excusing the mistakes which have occurred. It was a bad blunder to stop recruiting last Fall. And it was an inexcusable error—one of the many absurdities for which Mr. Cameron has to answer—to allow a single regiment to march to the field without establishing a recruiting depot to fill up its ranks when they became thinned by the casualties of war. These are the stupidities into which peaceful nations always fall when they embark in the strange and unnatural business of war. But in the main, history will decide that the Administration of Mr. Lincoln raised the army from nothing as speedily as the temper of the North would allow.

Three hundred thousand more men are now wanted, and will probably be forthcoming without a draft. We trust that the President and General Halleck will not commit the unfortunate blunder of organizing them into small regiments, so as to be useless, when they might be made invaluable by being distributed among veteran battalions. Four is the possible that we may have this lesson, too, to learn by experience.

Meanwhile officials in each State are preparing the necessary registers for a draft. It is hardly likely that the war will be concluded without one. Even with 200,000 fresh troops, our armies will still be outnumbered by the rebels, who have 700,000 men in the field. But it is entirely within the power of the President to exhaust the volunteer system, and then fall back on drafting, rather than run the risk of rendering the more unpopular in the rural districts at the present critical moment by drafting men, if there be no absolute necessity for resorting to such extreme measures. By-and-by the public mind will be educated to the necessity, and then the wiseacres will shout aloud—We told you so! We told you so!

M'CLELLAN UNDER FIRE.

GENERAL SCOTT, when after the battles upon Manassas Plains (won so often not only before they occurred but since, by newspaper strategists) it became necessary to commit to some one the two-fold function of the task of making a great army and planning a vast and complicated campaign, recommended M'CLELLAN, not only because of the military capacity which he had shown in Western Virginia, but on account of his "youth, energy, and indefatigable energy which he exhibited throughout the campaign in Mexico. Into that campaign he entered in the humble rank of commissioned officers—that of second lieutenant—but in the highest department of the service—the engineers—a position achieved by his graduating at West Point with the highest honors.

In Mexico he won not only reputation for skill and courage as a military engineer, but laurels for his gallantry in the field. He was always working night and day in the furtherance of duty. He reconnoitered the heights of Cerro Gordo, and so successfully as to elicit the commendations of the veteran commander, when he was detailed to PILLOW's brigade in the general assault, and where he performed his duties under the fiercest fire of the day; that brigade, which moved upon the Mexican right, having been obliged to attack the enemy under great disadvantages of position, and having met with such determined resistance that it was repulsed with heavy loss—the field having been won by the carrying of the centre and left. In this his first battle he won the meed of special mention. At the battles of Contreras, Cherubusco, on the 19th and 20th of August, 1847, M'CLELLAN again distinguished himself by his daring and gallantry. Being detailed to General TWIGGS's division, he led its way to the attack on the 19th, and performed a reconnaissance for the placing of batteries so near the enemy's lines that he and the topographical officer with him found themselves fired upon from them. The battle coming on immediately, and the commander of the howitzer battery having been killed in the engagement, M'CLELLAN sprang forward, took his post, and fought the battery with great spirit and ability until it became so disabled as to be withdrawn. For these deeds specially recommended him to the favorable consideration of General SCOTT for "efficiency and gallantry in action." Again, on the same immediately invested First Lieutenant of Engineers. Next came the battles of Churubusco—five degrees more conflicts in a day and a night—throughout which M'CLELLAN's conduct commanded the admiration of every one. Then followed the assault upon El Molino del Rey and Casa de Mata, outposts of the Castle of Chapultepec—fearful struggles; for although both positions were carried, it was with the loss of three hundredest loss in killed and wounded of nearly one-fourth of the attacking force. In the midst of these bloody and spirited conflicts Captain M'CLELLAN went imperturbably about his work, managing the guns and placing the batteries as if he were on dress parade. At Chapultepec the Castle itself he was equally conspicuous, and won Lieutenant Colonel's special mention for "gallantry and valuable service," besides the promotion which he received for "signal service" as an engineer in the report of the commander of that corps. And finally, at Mexico, he was the first officer to push into the city, which he entered at the head of his sappers and miners at three o'clock in the morning, and where he commenced that most dreadful of all attacks, firing from windows and house-tops, which was kept up by two thousand released convicts, the Mexican regular army having fled. His previous services on the 12th of September had caused him to be promoted Captain; but as he modestly declined the honor of a sword from Philadelphia lest your because he "had done nothing to deserve it," he was declined the honor promptly; but when upon the taking of the city of the Montezumas he was again brevetted Captain "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle before and Mexico," he accepted the twice-won honor.

There remains but a word to be said to the profound strategists who would at once put him to school as a general, and degrade him in the eyes of the country as a soldier. That as, though they may choose to disregard his subsequent services as an organizer at West Point, as an explorer of the West, and as a Director in the Crimea, which gained him distinction in the councils of the War Department, and, finally, his bringing order out of the chaos of the undisciplined Bull Run; and although he has not yet entered Richmond, it would be prudent for them not to attack a man for the lack of military qualities who, by conspicuous gallantry and daring, as well as by professional skill, won his captaincy upon leaving the fields before he was twenty-two years old.

THE LOUNGER.

KEEPING A GOOD HEART.

IN the prosecution of a great war two things are essential—money and spirit; and of the two the latter is the most important. The South has a lesson which we ought long ago to have learned from the French. We were not, in the early days of the trouble, to console ourselves with the reflection that they had no money, and no credit, and no food, and that therefore they must starve and surrender. But had we not an earlier lesson? And was not Spain long in our history? People will go shoeless, and hungry, and cold. By all the logic of circumstances they will be beaten a dozen times, and will fight forever and ever. Why? Because there is no shoe so stout, no dinner so satisfactory, no fire so warm, as an idea. Good or bad makes little difference. Any idea that ever was over the Protestants and Catholics fought with equal fury. It was the same idea that made the Turk, was quite as much in earnest as William of Orange and his stout Hollanders.

Here is the whole philosophy of medley, but if we lack spirit we are beaten already. "Couldst thou not watch with me one hour?" Are we such faint hearts that, if success will not tumble down sleeper-ripeness into our arms, we will shake our heads despairingly and cry out our inwardest thought? We have a great work to do. It is of a kind that will not be done in a moment. It is, We have to suppress an armed insurrection, and then establish and guarantee peace. It is a tremendous business. It demands men of robust hearts and strong arms and the most cheerful wills. It is precisely the kind of task that should be most welcome to a nation of our race and breeding. It is to educe order from chaos; to quench a miserable semi-barbaric system of civilization, with its few enormously rich, and its hordes of wretchedly poor and abject, and substitute a uniformity of rights and advantage. It is to banish the hideous old night of Slavery with the ground young day-spring of Liberty.

And it is to do this by the way, as it were, while we are maintaining our Government and keeping our borders intact.

There is but one thing wanting to secure to us an easy and transcendent victory—and that is, a little stouter heart than we have displayed; or, to put it more truly, a little quicker appreciation of the scope of the contest. Let us love our cause with an unfaltering love, and we are already victors. But let us higgle-haggle, and shilly-shally, about a vast, overwhelming, universal crushing of the rebellion, root and branch, leaf and bark, top and bottom—an utter annihilation of it in all its symptoms and all its causes, and we shall be shamefully and utterly beaten, because the rebels have that irresistible unanimity and spirit, that absolute devotion and surrender of every effort and every interest to the success of their cause, which has been slower to show itself in us. They stake every thing, and maintain themselves. Let us stake every thing, and subdue them utterly.

Of course they will beat us so long as we furnish them with men and women to do their work while they fight us. Of course they will outnumber us in every battle-field so long as we insist that every able-bodied white man in the South shall turn out against us, and have no reason for staying at home. Of course our levies after levies will be exhausted while we treat the rebellion as something to be episodically snuffed out. The war has lasted a year and a half. We have spent thousands of lives and millions of dollars. It is a strain along the very fibre of our national system. If we think to beat with one finger or one hand, we shall discover our mistake by being utterly vanquished.

Why, then, do we hesitate to clench both hands and to smite with all our force? Let every lawful means of war be employed; let us hold all that a rebel hath, his life included, as an aid to the rebellion; let us understand that the enemy is not to be conciliated but vanquished; and then we shall establish peace and universal security, and not until then.

RUMORS.

THE air is full of rumors which no Lounger can help hearing, of new political combinations and movements. But there are one or two cardinal points in the situation which no political intrigues can disturb.

The first and chief of these is, that while the Government is struggling for its existence there can really be but two parties—its friends and its foes. Its friends are those who are for maintaining its spirit and form at any cost to any enemy. Its foes are those who are for overthrowing its form and spirit altogether, or for maintaining them under certain conditions.

The second of these considerations is, that any effort to divide its friends upon questions of policy of defense is an attempt, conscious or unconscious, to aid the enemy; for no body of men can debate fiercely and fight effectively at the same time.

The third of these cardinal points is, that in every great war of this kind those who are for maintaining the Government at all costs are necessarily the leaders among its friends, as those who are for overthrowing it utterly are the leaders of its enemies. In the English Rebellion, it was the King by divine right who headed one party, and the assertor of the supreme right of the people who headed the other. In France, it was the old régime and the rabble. In America, it was the supporters of the royal prerogative over the colonies, on one side, and the friends of the Congress that declared absolute independence of Great Britain, upon the other.

In all these cases the aspect of the parties was the same, because the quarrel was vital; and wherever men go to war because they differ, if the war continues, they will inevitably distribute themselves around the essential points of disagreement.

Now what is the substance of our quarrel? It is nothing less than the spirit and form of our Government. There are but two sides. One holds that the spirit of the Government is liberty, and that its form secures the peaceful development of liberty for every man. The other sees that the peaceful operation of the form will secure that liberty, and so, hating the spirit, it strikes at the form. The practical question that instantly presents itself to the friends of the Government is, shall we hesitate to strike at the system which is the cause of the insurrection, and which is a perpetual defiance of the spirit of the Government?

That is the question upon which the national mind is really engaged at this moment. The farther consideration, in what way we can most wisely strike, is another question. Are we willing to strike at all? Every moment's delay in answering the inquiry is an army to the enemy. Every effort to divide us into two parties upon it is a victory for the rebellion. Conciliation being impossible, are we willing to conquer, or shall we submit to conquest?—that is the present point. If a party plants itself upon conciliation, it concedes victory to the enemy. Therefore we return to our starting-point, that there can be but two parties—friends and enemies of the Government.

It is not assuming too much to say, that, if the friends of Mr. Thurlow Weed and Mr. Dean Richmond unite in a party-combination, it will include, with all the honest Union men who may adhere to it, all the white-feather peace-men, all the disloyal and doubtful men, all who secretly wish well to the rebellion, with all who utterly disbelieve the Democratic principle and wish to perpetuate slavery. It is equally clear that the opposing party will unite all those who believe in the natural rights of men, who hold that the spirit of the Government is Liberty, and who, to maintain the form of the Government, are as willing to free a rebel's slave as to take a rebel's life. It is no less evident that Jeff Davis and the rebels would heartily pray for the success of the first party, and as heartily hate the last. Nor is it at all doubtful that, if such a combination should be effected, that vigorous prosecution of the war which can alone satisfy the most earnest and devoted friends of the Government could not be expected. Would this be any thing less than disastrous to the great cause?

Let us all understand, then, that the question is whether the war shall continue—not how it shall continue. For if it goes on, it is clear that only the most stringent measures will secure us the victory. If that is borne in mind, we shall have in this State, this year, the true union of unhesitatingly loyal men who presented and voted the Union ticket of last year, which put the State of New York triumphantly upon the side to which she belongs—the side of an unconditional suppression of rebellion by a universal weakening of rebels on every side.

THE PLATFORMS.

WE are glad to be able to lay before our readers the two Platforms upon which the people of this State and of the country are henceforth to stand. One of them has but a single plank; and so, in fact, has the other; but it is hewn to look like several planks. Civil war simplifies all public questions. Eminent political joiners are understood to be still engaged in dovetailing the parts of the Conciliation Platform, and there is little doubt of the result of their labor. We present, first,

The Conciliation Platform.

Resolved, That we heartily believe in the irrepressible harmony of Free States and Slave States in the same government, of which our history for the last thirty years has been the faithful witness.

Resolved, That if the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence and of the Fathers of the Constitution had only been false, or had never been alluded to, there would have been no trouble in the land, and Southern gentlemen, our natural rulers, would have continued to govern us for the benefit of their peculiar institution, for the great glory of the country, and for the honor of mankind.

Resolved, That we most respectfully deprecate what we are constrained to call the erroneous views entertained of the nature of our government by those whom we must still be permitted to call our brothers, friends, and fellow-citizens—to wit, President Davis, General Floyd, General Wigfall, General or Colonel Pryor, General Cobb, the Honorable and brilliant, but for the moment misguided, Mr. Yancey, the brave General Jackson, General Johnson (who, we regret to hear, still suffers from his wound, and to whom we respectfully tender our sympathy, with the most earnest hope of his speedy restoration to health and to sounder views of our national system), General Magruder, the skillful but mistaken defender of Yorktown, General Lee (whom we can not but congratulate upon his military ability, although we are constrained to differ with him, respectfully, as to the propriety of showing it in the way he has thought fit), General Morgan, the romantic hero of the West, the worthy Hollins and excellent Tatnall, of maritime renown; the eminent jurist and profound statesman, Benjamin; the honest Slidell and the humane Mason, honors to our kind, whose unhappy detention of last season we greatly deplore; the high-principled Soulé, now reposing in a seclusion which he dignifies and adorns; and the amiable magistrate Monroe, at present residing in the immediate neighborhood of the seat of his magistracy—these we can not but regard as still our most loving and loyal fellow-citizens, although, as it were, for the present, and in a manner, so to say, beclouded; and, with them, all and singular our Southern fellow-citizens of every sex who have shown, at Manassas, in Baltimore, and New Orleans, that innate chivalry and superior quality which have always proudly distinguished them from the mud-sills and fierce fanatics, whom, we regret to say, we have not wholly extirpated from among ourselves, and among whom we may name Ellsworth, Winthrop, Greble, Lyons, Baker, Putnam, and many more.

Resolved, That we venture to suggest, in all kindness and with great reluctance, to our many Southern brethren, that they are acting unadvisedly; that although they have been goaded into their present attitude by the most unconstitutional and exasperating and atrocious Northern libelers, incendiaries, and traitors, and have every reason that outraged human nature and broken political faith can allege to do what they are doing; that although they are valorous, and chivalric, and gallant, and every inch gentlemen, and could not be expected to endure a Constitutional political defeat at the ballot-box, yet still that they ought to reconsider their hasty but perfectly natural action.

Resolved, That if they do not, we expect nothing less from their proverbial generosity than toleration of our difference of opinion in taking a military attitude; yet we beg most humbly to assure them that in agitating with arms our temporary and doubtless perfectly honest differences, we shall have the most constant and scrupulous regard for their comfort, convenience, houses, lands, cattle, and prejudices, and we hope most earnestly that nothing very serious will happen.

Resolved, That slavery is the most beneficent and peace-promoting system of labor for a free country that could be devised; and that we utterly renounce, and abhor, and despise, and (begging pardon of our sunny Southern brethren for using the word) spit upon the traitorous, black-hearted, renegade, scoundrelly scamps, the Abolitionists, who have irritated the lovely South, have plunged us into the burning pit of civil war, and who, we heartily hope and pray, may at the first convenient opportunity be hanged, drawn, and quartered—or, if more agreeable to our sunny Southern brethren, wasted at slow fires.

Resolved, That on our knees we humbly beg pardon of the injured, and chivalric, and sunny South, and confidently commit our cause to its kind clemency and consideration.

The other is

The Patriotic Platform.

Resolved, That we gladly pledge our time, our utmost energies, our resources, our honor, and our lives for the speedy and unconditional suppression of the rebellion against the principles of civil order and the spirit and form of this Government, by the most vigorous employment of every method sanctioned by the right of self-defense and the customary usages of war.

The vote upon these two platforms will show us exactly where we are.

AN INTERIOR VIEW.

IF every thing does not go for our side just as we would have it, we may be very sure that the course of things is not altogether agreeable for the rebels. They have been often in dire extremity, at least in their own estimation; and at the present moment, if they enjoy a breathing time, although they may crow lustily they can not crow away the facts of the situation. They know as well as we that the nation is only deepening and strengthening its resolution of subduing the rebellion. The prospect for the conspirators is not essentially changed, although our final success is somewhat postponed.

The following letter gives a glimpse into the secret feelings of leading rebels in the month of April last. It shows how precious Richmond is to them. The writer has, of course, been surprised and pleased by the course of events. But the depression of spirits which was universal in the rebellion at that time will never be permanently relieved. The letter was recently found upon the Peninsula:

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, April 18, 1862.

MY DEAR GENERAL,—Your esteemed favor of the 11th was received by me yesterday, and I hasten to answer. I greatly fear our cause will be lost should Davis and his advisers conclude to vacate Yorktown and Williamsburg, falling back into North Carolina.

The sacrifice of the Peninsula (thereby necessarily giving to the hated Yankees the present capital of our Confederacy) will most certainly demoralize our army to such an extent as to place us in a desperate strait. M'Clellan and the gun-boats will, I fear, succeed in opening their way up the Peninsula and James River.

I have just received a letter from our old friend Yancey, as also one from Hon. T. Butler King, by the last mail from Europe. They both write despondingly. We have every thing prepared, so that we can destroy our property (although I doubt the policy of it) on the first approach of the Federal fleet. . . . . . My regards to Sid Johnston and old Jack Magruder. Yours sincerely,

W. A. HAMMOND.

To Brig.-Gen. S. R. ANDERSON,
Commanding South Carolina Volunteers.

MR. BATES OF THE BARINGS.

THE Union and Government of the United States have no more constant, and faithful, and frank friend than Mr. Bates of the House of the Barings in London. He has lived for many years in England, and by character and position speaks with great weight and influence; and from the first moment of this rebellion he has thought and said but one thing; namely, that the Government might, could, would, and should utterly overwhelm and suppress it.

These views of Mr. Bates have been perfectly familiar to his friends and correspondents in this country. But as he has been publicly denounced as a friend of the insurrection, it is but just to a most honorable, loyal, and intelligent American, who in the midst of sneering and skeptical foreigners has steadily kept the faith, to say that the statement of his secession sympathies is utterly untrue.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ESSAYS AND REMARKS.

BOOTS.—To get good boots, the best plan, perhaps, would be to find out who makes those of Professor Faraday, or Professor Owen, and employ him, if there is any such particular person; for a philosopher should be the best judge of the fitness of things, including boots. But there may be no such person; for many philosophers are accustomed to buy their boots ready made; true philosophy seeking to discover, by the shortest process, where the shoe pinches, and rejecting that shoe or boot for another which does not pinch.

Durability of boots is a quality undervalued by inexperienced or unwise dandies, because they never half test it. No new boot is so comfortable as an old one in sound condition. Old boots are like intimate old friends, and hand-and-glove is not more the symbol of intimacy than foot-and-boot. Never, if you are undesirous of corns and bunions, discard well-worn boots while their upper leathers are whole. The Emperor of the French and the chiefs of the British nobility would never have had occasion to attest the skill of Eisenberg if they had always made a point of having their boots forepieced, and heelpieced, and soled, and otherwise mended, so long as they would hold comfortably together. It is remarkable that the names assigned to different kinds of boots are mostly those of princes or soldiers, as Coburgs, Bluchers, Wellingtons, and Napoleons. The present fashionable cothurnus of ladies is called a Balmoral. But no boots are ever named after men of eminence in science and letters; there are no Macaulay boots, no Brunels, no Stephensons, no Liebigs, no Brownings, no Tennysons. Perhaps it is the confined idea of nobleness and distinction thus evinced by some leading shoemakers which has earned for their respectable and useful fraternity the too sweeping denomination of Snobs.

DINNER PLATITUDES.

Twice of soup is vulgar, but three times of soup implies that you must be more than double-plated with vulgarity. Such a thing was never known, not even at the Trinity Board, and Turtle is not the slightest excuse for your pushing things to such a vulgar length. An Alderman would really blush for you.

A soft answer turneth away wrath, and an invitation to take a glass of wine will frequently restore warmth between two friends where only coldness existed before.

No matter how plain your cook may be, so long as your dinner is well-dressed.

A few compliments go a great way. A little savory pâté is quite enough. Try too many, and you'll find they'll prove heavy.

When the ladies retire from the dinner-table, it is not usual for you (supposing you to be a gentleman) to retire with them. In this instance the same law extends to the mistress as to the servants: "NO FOLLOWERS ALLOWED."

A gratuity well bestowed frequently has a happy effect. The servant that is fee'd well takes care that his master does the same.

In the hands of an inferior artiste, whether an omelette turns out good or bad, is quite a matter of toss up. It is the same with a pancake.

Keep ill-natured people from your table as you would sour fruit. They are sure to disagree with every one. Avoid crab-apples, lest the Apple of Discord should turn up among them.

"Union is not always strength," as the sailor said when he saw the purser mixing his rum with water.

In a fight take your friend's part; at a feast let him have it himself.

FREAKS OF FASHION.

We have noticed a sweet thing in parasols. It is made of white satin, with a lining of pink arranged like the gills of a mushroom, the stalk being ivory, so that altogether it exhibits a pleasing resemblance to that elegant fungus.

In bonnets we have the pleasure to announce an exquisite novelty. The front of the bonnet is shaped like a church window in the pointed style, and trimmed at the sides with rolls of muslin to represent mouldings, and a drip-stone supported on either side by a rose in the place of a corbel. One of the mouldings is filled with the toothed ornament of the Early English pattern. Two trefoiled arches extend over the head, and are surmounted by a quatrefoil, and the tout ensemble is coquettish. This bonnet is much worn by young ladies, and is particularly becoming to the middle-aged.

FLUNKY (out of place). "There's just one question I should like to ask your ladyship—Ham I engaged for work, or ham I engaged for ornament?"

Judgment is a faculty which very few people have enough of to discover that they want more.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEW INSTRUCTIONS TO GENERALS.

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, July 22, 1862.

First—Ordered, that military commanders within the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas, in an orderly manner, seize and use any property, real or personal, which may be necessary or convenient for their several commands, for supplies, or for other military purposes; and that while property may be destroyed for proper military objects, none shall be destroyed in wantonness nor malice.

Second—That military and naval commanders shall employ as laborers, within and from said States, so many persons of African descent as can be advantageously used for military or naval purposes, giving them reasonable wages for their labor.

Third—That as to both property and persons of African descent, accounts shall be kept sufficiently accurate and in detail to show quantities and amounts, and from whom both property and such person shall have come, as a basis upon which compensation can be made in proper cases; and the several departments of this Government shall attend to and perform their appropriate parts toward the execution of these orders. By order of the PRESIDENT.

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

Generals Halleck, Dix, Meigs, Burnside, and M'Clellan have just had an interview at the head-quarters of the latter. The meeting between General Halleck and General M'Clellan is said to have been as cordial as the former officer's opinion of the Potomac Army was laudatory and satisfactory. General Halleck expressed himself highly gratified at the condition of the troops after their late severe trials in the field. A vigorous programme is said to have been agreed upon, and that immediate activity is to be the order of the day.

SUCCESSFUL CAVALRY EXPEDITION.

General Pope reports another successful cavalry expedition by General King, on the 22d inst., from Fredericksburg, in which our troops defeated the rebel cavalry near Carmel Church, on the road to Richmond, destroyed the telegraph line to Gordonsville and burned the enemy's camp, together with six cars loaded with corn. General Stewart's cavalry made an attack upon our troops subsequently, but were also repulsed, driven across the North Anna River, and pursued within sight of Hanover Junction.

STONEWALL JACKSON AT LOUISA.

Stonewall Jackson is reported to be at Louisa Court House, and Ewell at Gordonsville. The united commands are said to amount to thirty thousand men.

REBEL RAID IN TENNESSEE.

The Tenth Ohio Regiment, which was guarding the Memphis and Charleston Road between Decatur and Courtland, was attacked on the 26th inst. by a large force of rebel guerrillas under General Stearns and General Ward. Some thirty or forty of our troops were killed, and the road was damaged to some extent. It is said that there is a large rebel force at Tuscumbia, and that Colonel Forrest is at Carthage.

A RAID AT FLORENCE, ALABAMA.

The steamer Evansville, from the Tennessee River, brings the news of a rebel raid at Florence, Alabama, on Tuesday last. The rebels, it is said, entered the city and burned all the warehouses used for our commissary and quarter-master stores, and all the cotton in the vicinity. They also seized the United States steamer Colonna, used for conveying army supplies over the shoals. They took all the money belonging to the boat and passengers, and then burned her. A small detachment of General Mitchel's army was captured. The rebels then proceeded down the Tennesee River to Chickasaw, Waterloo, and the vicinity of Eastport, and burned all the warehouses which contained cotton. Another band of forty rebels attacked a wagon train near Pittsburg Landing and captured sixty wagons conveying commissary and quarter-master stores.

RAIDS IN MISSOURI AND KENTUCKY.

The rebel guerrillas in Missouri made a dash upon the town of Greenville, which was occupied by two companies of Union militia troops, who, being taken by surprise, were driven out and the town was taken possession of by the rebels. Governor Gamble had accordingly issued a proclamation calling out all the militia of the State to put down those troublesome rebel marauders.

The guerrillas continue to annoy the people of Kentucky by raids in various places, destroying and stealing property. Morgan, however, has made a speech in which he confesses that his expedition has proved a failure.

REPORTED CAPTURE OF THE "ARKANSAS."

On July 20th it was stated that a scheme was on foot to capture the rebel ram Arkansas. The Granada Appeal (rebel) says that she was cut out from under the rebel batteries at Vicksburg by the Union gun-boats General Bragg and Sumter. No date is given.

GENERAL SHERMAN AT MEMPHIS.

General Sherman has assumed command at Memphis, in place of General Grant, recalled to Corinth, in consequence of the absence of General Halleck. It is understood that General Sherman will enforce all the orders issued by his predecessors, including the one requiring all the male inhabitants to take the oath of allegiance to the Government or to leave the city. On Tuesday last four hundred persons took the oath of allegiance, and one hundred and thirty received passes to go South.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

A general exchange of prisoners has been agreed upon—the basis, according to the Richmond Enquirer, being the cartel of 1812 between the United States and Great Britain. The Enquirer claims this agreement as an acknowledgment of the quasi nationality of the Confederate States.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

NON-INTERVENTION.

MR. FORSTER, M.P., has given notice in the House of Commons that when Mr. Lindsay brought up his motion for the recognition of the rebels by England, he (Mr. Forster) would move an amendment pledging the House to sustain the Government in its policy of non-intervention.

COTTON FROM INDIA.

A dispatch from India from a private source, received in London, states that 115,000 bales of cotton had been shipped from Bombay in one week.

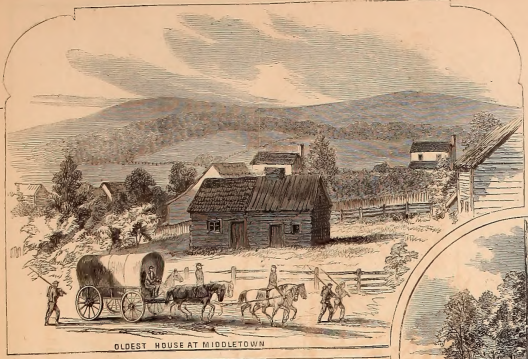
THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—CHARGE OF THE FIFTH CAVALRY AT THE BATTLE OF FRIDAY, JUNE 27.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 503.]

THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA.

In connection with the illustrations on page 501, we give the following extract from a letter dated

SPERRYVILLE, July 19, 1862.

IT is a week to-day since General Siegel's corps d'armée marching from Luray in the early morning, crossed the Blue Ridge through Thornton's Gap, and encamped on the hills overlooking this village. Milroy had arrived before, and occupied an advanced position, while part of General Banks's column, which had once reached Sperryville, countermarched, and is elsewhere posted. General Von Steinwehr, commanding the second division of this corps, occupies the pass some miles to the rear.



The week of repose since our arrival has been helpful in several ways, and even the march was a boon in hopeful which was greatly needed. I can speak only of the division whose performances I witnessed—General Schenck's—but that deserves praise. There was little straggling or plundering by the way, and regiments came in as much with ranks as full as when they started in the morning. General Schenck rightly held his brigade and regimental commanders to a strict accountability for the presence and order of their men; and, with the exception of the month from Luray to Sperryville, the troops were kept well in the ranks. Along that road the temptation of cherries trees was too strong for military discipline and the choice of commanders, and the men were suffered to gather the fruit without restraint.

The week, however, though I have called it one of repose, has been devoted to far constant drill. The troops are, indeed, I suppose there are few volunteer regiments not capable of improvement in that respect. General Siegel has been absent, and General Schenck in command. Under him, and with the constant supervision of the divi sion and brigade commanders, the troops have been ex cised daily. Yesterday was a grand review of General Schenck's division, consisting of General Bohrer and Colonel Krzyanowski's brigades. General Siegel, who returned on Tuesday, was present. The battalion movements were good, better than the manual, and the move was really a creditable one to officers and men.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We continue in this number the reproduction of Mr. Waud's sketches of the six days' fighting before Richmond. On page 500 we illustrate

A CHARGE OF THE FIFTH CAVALRY.

Mr. Waud writes:

"The Fifth Regular Cavalry, and small portions of some other cavalry regiments, made a dashing charge in the course of the afternoon of Friday, 20th, at the head of the Chickahominy, and coming down upon the enemy, they drove the gunners from a battery and, sitting along the line of infantry, discharged their pistols in the face of the soldiers. They suffered severely in officers and men, but they lost one officer being all to report for duty. They expected that reinforcements would follow their charge, but none arrived, so, cut to pieces and dispirited, they returned, leaving behind the battery they had captured. It is superfluous to say that the Fifth was considered the finest cavalry regiment in the service."

On the same page we give a picture of

on Monday, June 30. Mr. Waud says:

"In a fight, such as is represented in the picture, it is impossible to get a view of an extended line of battle from any one point. A majority of the battles so far have been of this description, usually termed bushwhacking—very deadly, but hardly affording a chance for a display of tactics. For the rest, the picture describes itself, and gives a good idea of what our soldiers have to stand up to in the Virginia swamps and woods."

On pages 504 and 505 we reproduce a picture representing the fought on Monday, June 30. Mr. Waud writes:

"For Franklin's division this portion of Monday's fighting was altogether an 'affair,' but it was one of the sharpest and most important of this eventful week. Porter's First Massachusetts Artillery alone hurled from 500 to 600 rounds of spherical case-shot upon the enemy from this point, part of the time only 300 yards distant. Upon a battery of brass Napoleons also fired with telling effect, although not so hotly engaged as the First Massachusetts, the enemy having placed the bulk of the latter battery with great accuracy during a portion of the action. This was one of the most desperate situations our army occupied in falling back upon the James River, and nothing but the savage endurance of our troops saved the position from destruction and capture. Slocum's heavy artillery fire, and the stubborn front which Newton presented against greatly superior numbers, keeping the rebels at bay, and finally repulsing them with great loss, compelled them to withdraw and turn upon the James River before the exhausted rebels had a thought of renewing the, for us, unequal contests.

"In this battle our troops were attacked on three sides, and on one side the ground was so wet that when Kearney's jaded troops fell back before heavy reinforcements of the rebels, the Confederate shell flew right across the ground, and not a man, in the New Jersey brigade of Slocum's division, soon recovered the lost ground.

"In the left foreground on the left, and Porter's artillery to the right, are represented on a ridge gradually sloping to the rear the Fifth and Sixth, the limbers and caissons; behind the left-hand caisson Doctors Davis and Ohlenschleger, with ambulances and medicine-chests; and, in the rear, the supporting regiments of infantry. On the left the tiverton in Sixteenth New York, and the 44th remain so kindly presented to them by the Colonel's thoughtful lady—that Sixteenth whose return of casualties to-day was astonishing enough, only 19 missing to 238 killed and wounded, a proportion for below the average of most engagements. Also, the right, lying down for better protection, like the Sixteenth, is another good regiment, the Twenty-seventh New York, and this is still the best friend of the country permits the artist to represent in one view; for when nearly all the fighting is done in the woods little can be seen at one glance."

THE CITY OF RICHMOND, VA.

On page 502 we publish a plan of the CITY OF RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, from a drawing made by a Union refugee who has just made his escape. He describes the city as follows:

"The ancient Rome, Richmond stands upon seven hills, of which two, with an intervening valley, form the principal part of the city.

"Rocket Hill contains that portion of the north-west of which Broad Street forms the main artery, and Church Hill the part traversed by Main Street. These are the two principal business streets, and the city is truly beautiful; its resemblance to Baltimore, particularly in the vicinity of Monumental Square, is very striking.

"The Capitol grounds are a highly-elevated symmetrically-sloping piece of ground, containing perhaps six or ten acres, in the centre of which the Capitol, an old stuccoed building, presents no significant pile; but whatever this unpretending, inadequate building lacks in elegance is redeemed by the colossal bronze equestrian statue of the general Washington, who, from his high granite pedestal, looks away proudly and serene, like a resident god, upon the ungodly crowd below him, his right arm gracefully stretched out, while his finger points to the distant west. A secession friend, while contemplating this master-piece of art, remarked to me, in a cavild, jocular vein, that General Washington, while looking upon the rebel Congress, significantly points toward the peninsula, by which in reality rears its massive walls in the direction of his warning finger. The statues of Patrick Henry, Jefferson, and Mazzini, and Stelli's Manco—stand in bronze around the base of this granite pile. Farther below, on a little mound, in a cozy, modest, white chapel, stands a chaste, marble statue, where Henry Clay seems to address the bashful Senate. It is a beautiful likeness of the great statesman. On the western side of the square is the War Department, a brown pure sandstone building, where General Lee, the Commander-in-Chief, and imbecile Randolph, the new Secretary of War, hold their levees. The crowd around this and other departments is so great that guards are ground keepers are constantly in attendance to restrict and regulate the immense applicants. General Winder, the commander of Richmond, and general provost-marshal, can be read daily, during his fanatic sway at the northwest corner, fronting on Broad Street. Here the Passport Office, the Plug-Uglies, and all the blood-hounds of persecution are let loose upon the disloyal and suspected; here women meet the Gallows-bird on a level term and in vain for a permission to see their imprisoned husbands, fathers, and brothers.

"On the south side of the Post-office and (in the fine marble Custom-house erected by the United States) the Treasury Department Building. The Transportation Office, the dépôts for volunteers from Texas, Mississippi, Alabama, etc., range side by side throughout the whole south side. The Spotswoods Court-house, a large stone building in the Doric style, also fronts the Capitol Square, and is the capital of the Confederate army meets and passes their bloody verdicts. Woe to him who is summoned before this modern inquisition. In the western corner of the square is the plain house of an enraptured Yankee, who, before leaving his whisky plant, of which he is reputed to consume immense quantities; and truly his ruddy nose, with prominent veins, seems to corroborate this testimony thereof.

"The banks of the city—of which the Spotswood, kept by a New Yorker, and the Ballard and Exchange are the principal and the most expensive ones; the American Hotel, Franklin House, Monumental—are all large buildings, where, for the modest charge of two dollars and a half, a person can starve at his leisure. The restaurants attached to shed every night their celestial performances upon an enraptured and admiring audience. At one time immense crowds to applaud the classic Dixie, which is the standing episode of drama in Richmond.

"On Capitol Square, Franklin, in the left of the city situated upon Church Hill, are a series of large brick mansions, many of which present the widows of which—at all hours of the day—sad, pale, anxious faces and languishing eyes follow the passers-by. These are our friends, sympathizers, heartbroken, closely guarded. He who sees their wish, will gain will gain their favor. The prisons are crowded. In May last a woman was arrested for throwing a note into one of the windows; since then the passers-by are allowed to linger in front nor to walk on the inside of the trottoir. Guards with pistols and tomahawks watch the pedestrian, not over-politely nor softly. Notwithstanding all the boastful proclamations of the rebels and their leaders, there is a deep and universal fancy and gloom hanging over the doomed city, and every body seems to feel that the hour is coming."

EX-PRESIDENT VAN BUREN.

On page 497 we give a portrait, from a photograph by Brady, of EX-PRESIDENT MARTIN VAN BUREN, who died at his residence, Kinderhook, Columbia County, New York, on July 24th, aged eighty.

Mr. Van Buren was born on 5th December, 1782, at Kinderhook. His father was a man of moderate means, and gave his son a fair though not a collegiate education. In 1803 he was admitted to the Martin began the study of law, and at the age of twenty-one opened an office at Kinderhook. He was an active Democrat from the outset, and in 1808 was appointed Surrogate of Columbia County. In 1812 he removed to the county of Hudson, the county town, and practiced there for seven years. In April, 1812, he was elected to the State Senate, which then included Albany and the State, which appointment required him to remove to his residence there. His was reasonably active in his party having been defeated at the polls, and he resumed his private practice, to which he devoted his attention till 1820, when he abandoned the profession altogether for politics. Already, in 1821, he had been elected United States Senator and had taken a leading part in the consolidation of the Democratic party on the basis of opposition to protective tariffs, internal improvements at the expense of the General Government, and the United States Bank. In 1824 he was elected Governor of the State of New York. He only served three months, however; for in March, 1829, he was appointed Secretary of State under Jackson, and resigned the Gubernatorial chair in consequence. He was a leading member of General Jackson's Administration; but the most important office he filled since was paralyzed by his rivalry with Mr. Calhoun, whose successful plot to ruin Jackson's leading seeming formed. Their mutual hostility became so marked that in 1831 Mr. Van Buren resigned, and was appointed Minister to England. In 1832, the existing-vote of Mr. Calhoun, who hated Van Buren as a Northern man, and as a successful rival, was turned home at once. On his return he was appointed Secretary to the Treasury, and it was soon apparent that the Democratic party was about to bog increased by the hostility displayed against him by the Bank of the United States. In May, 1832, he was nominated, and in November was elected Vice-President of the United States, General Jackson being re-elected to the Presidency. And on the ensuing National Convention of the Democracy, held in 1835, at Baltimore, he was nominated for President. His election followed as a matter of course, and in March, 1837, he was inaugurated. His Administration was not a happy one, owing to the commercial distress which prevailed throughout the country, and which the Democrats were badly beaten by the Whigs, and General Harrison was elected to the Presidency, many Southern leaders, guided by sectional views, having been led by Calhoun to distrust Van Buren as a Northern man. About this time the split in the Democracy which was occasioned by slavery began to make its appearance; Mr. Van Buren was chosen by the Northern Democrats as their leader. They were however beaten in Convention, in 1844, by the Southerners, who nominated Polk; and again in 1848, General Cass being deemed "sound" enough to suit the South. This time Mr. Van Buren and his party were disposed to let the case go by default. The free-soil Democracy met at Buffalo in August, and nominated Martin Van Adams, present Minister to England, and nominated Van Buren on the platform of no more Slave States. He was beaten, of course; but he drew away votes enough from General Cass to defeat General Cass, and place then Mr. Van Buren has taken no part in politics.

In personal appearance Mr. Van Buren was about the middle height, erect and slenderly built, capable of great endurance. His features were animated and expressive, especially his eyes. His forehead exhibited in its depth and expansion the marks of great intellectuality. The physiognomist would assign to combativeness, cautiousness, of approbation, and benevolence of disposition. The phrenologist would add unusual reflective faculties, firmness, and caution.

THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA.

We devote page 501 to illustrations of the ARMY OF VIRGINIA, now under the command of General Pope, in the field. Since the army has done nothing but move forward, in detachments, toward a general concentration, when the entire force is to be concentrated; hence Mr. Davenport's sketches are mere illustrations of scenery and encampments. They will, however, prove interesting. Front Royal, Middletown, Sperryville, etc., are now familiar names to the ear. Every Northern household will be glad to see pictures of the places. General Pope's army is in the finest condition for an advance, and we doubt not but his energy will soon afford Mr. Davenport an opportunity of making some more striking pictures. He will make a name for himself, if Providence permits.

STORKS.

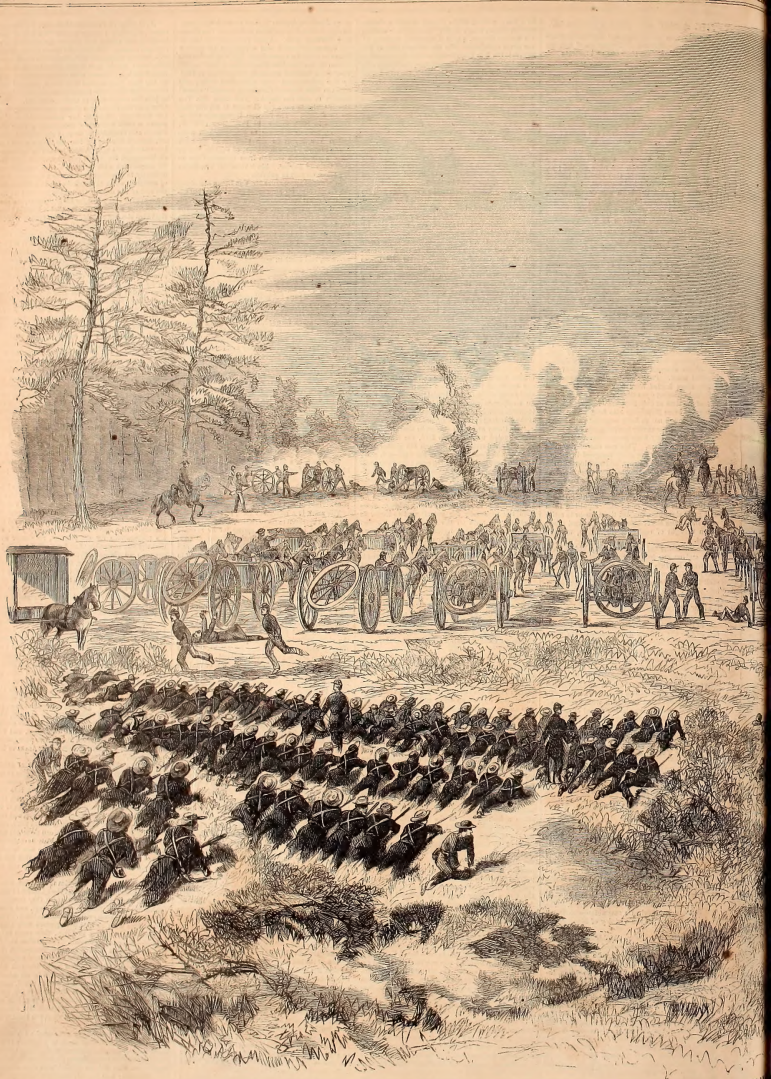
The stork is a biblical bird, as Isaiah and Jeremiah testify. It dwells in Europe, Asia, and Africa. The stork has supplied David and Jeremiah with illustrations, Aesop with a fable, Lafontaine with two fables, and a whole crowd of authors have panegyrized him in a variety of languages.

The stork is a migratory bird, passing the winter in the northern parts of Africa, and particularly Egypt, and spending the summer in summer quarters, which comprise Spain, France, Greece, Holland, Germany, Poland, Russia, Sweden, and Norway. Its flight is nearly every country in Europe except England. In size the stork is something larger than a horse; his plumage is white, except the wings, which are black; the bill, legs, and claws are red. The food of these birds consists of all kinds of small animals, reptiles, frogs, and fish. The nest of the stork is an enormous fabric of coarse sticks and other rude materials, and is sometimes built in trees, but more usually on some part of a house-top, and notably on chimneys, which are unfrequently rendered thereby useless as a passage for smoke. Hence the custom which prevails in Holland, and other countries where the stork breeds, of making a kind of artificial chimney or large box on the roofs of the houses to serve as a receptacle for its nest; and whenever a pair of storks condescend to avail themselves of the abode provided for them by human ingenuity, the inhabitants of the house are the owner of the house. It is indeed curious to note in what high regard storks have been held from the very earliest ages. Their Hebrew name (Chasedah or Chasedah) signifies "pious" or "benevolent," and both among the Greeks and Romans the stork was the emblem of filial piety, of chastity, of conjugal fidelity, and gratitude. It was reserved for modern times to make the stork a "Free and Easy" bird. Most of our readers have heard what the Germans say about bringing the child down the chimney—how, when the parents grow old, and incapable of labor, they send the young bird brought them food, and waited on them with all possible tenderness, even taking them on their backs and placing them in a safe corner. In reference the law attributed to Solon, by which children were bound to support their parents in old age, was called the Pelargian or Stork law. It is certain that storks possess an unusual degree of affection for their young, and for each other. In some instances have been observed of birds who were unable to fly, from the total loss of one wing or some such injury, being fed by their stronger companions. Of the devotion of the parent storks for their offspring, a remarkable instance is recorded by Hadrian Junius in his "History of Batavia." In the year 1593 the town of Delft was half destroyed by fire, and when the stork, who had been absent for some time in quest of food, returned to her nest she found the whole locality in ruins and ashes. At first she endeavored with all her powers to extricate her young ones from the impending destruction, but finding it impossible to fly, and finding all her efforts useless, she at last covered them with her body, and died in the midst of lamentations along with those she was powerless to save. Another anecdote respecting storks and a conflagration is probably more apocryphal. According to this story, when the town of Kelbra, in Russia, took fire, the storks converted themselves into impromptu engines, and assisted to extinguish the flames; the precise way in which they set about it he has unfortunately neglected to record.

Michael Neander and that famous old ornithologist Ulysses Aldrovandi have recorded a variety of anecdotes, more or less mythical, about storks, among which are the following:

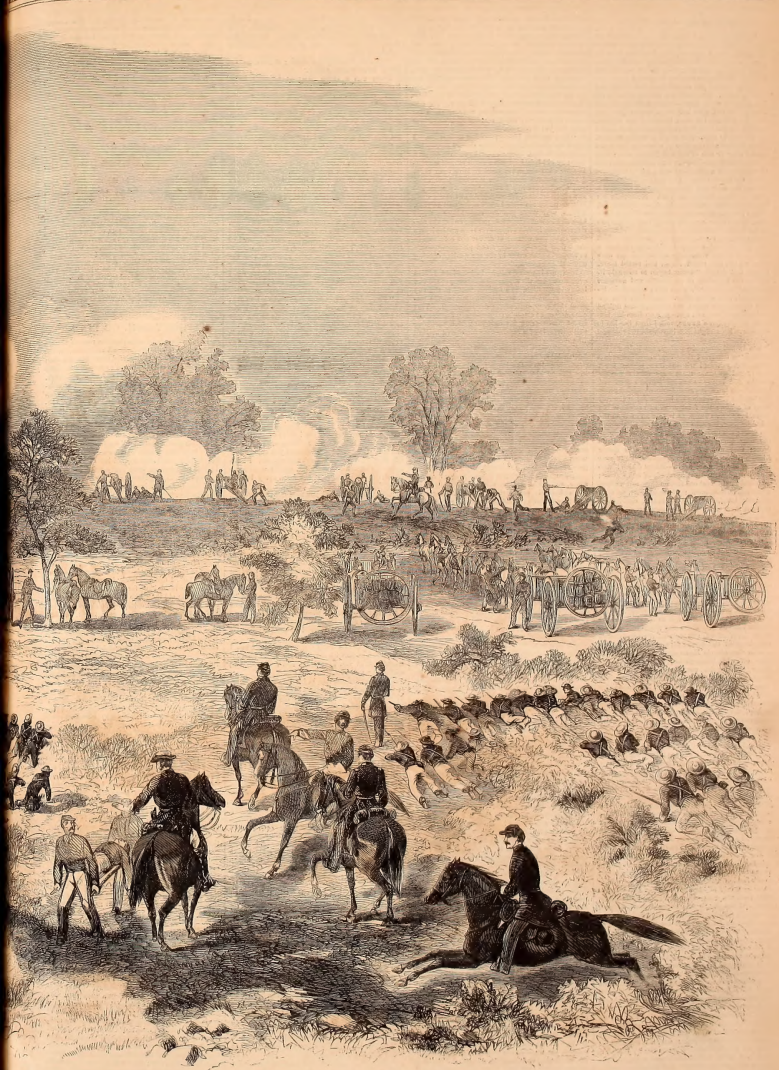
"In the city of Tarentum there once lived a poor widow, who was inconsolable for the loss of her husband, and passed her time in the greatest poverty and misery. One day she saw a young stork, who, having attempted to fly before his wings were sufficiently grown, had fallen from the nest and broken his leg. Moved with compassion, she took up the poor bird, carried him home, and fed and nursed him till he was perfectly recovered and able to join his companions in their migration. Next spring, as the widow was sitting at her window near the sea-shore, confiding her melancholy to the waves, she saw a stork hovering over her from the clouds, and alighting in front of the afflicted widow, dropped into her lap from his beak a pebble as large as a duck's egg. Astonished at this behavior, she examined the pebble carefully, and though like the acquisitive Greek proverb, she had had no difficulty in guessing that it was a diamond, and of sufficient value to maintain her in affluence for the rest of her days. On taking leave, the stork begs to give him a kiss for his generosity, she perceived from a voice in his right hand was the identical bird she had nursed, and who now in gratitude repaid her kindness."

Conjugal fidelity is a virtue which ranks very high among storks, and any infraction of it is punished with the utmost severity. Michael Neander relates that in the reign of Duke Robert of Bavaria there was, at a town called Tangen, a flourishing colony of storks. One of these storks was so far from imitating the example of Penelope, that during the absence of her lord her spouse was daily absent in search of food, she was seen to lend too willing an ear to the seductive discourses of a youthful bachelor stork. On one day in particular, early earlier than was his wont, discovered the guilt of his fair partner; but not wishing to create a scandal of the neither upon her children, he dissembled his knowledge till the latter were grown up and had left the nest. Then, when the whole colony was collected together preparatory to the autumn migration, he set his erring spouse before the assembly, explained in brief but touching language the conduct of which she had been guilty, and pronounced the fatal doom of death upon her. This justice was terrible; she was condemned to immediate execution, and was instantly pecked to pieces and her bleeding material by the whole host. The husband, though avenged, was inconsolable, and instead of accompanying the rest of his flight he betook himself to an uninhabited desert, and was never more heard of. "For," adds the translator, "he died of the pangs of love, for he could not persuade him to be cured."



As a set off to this, we doubt not, scandalous libel on storkish virtue, we are happy to meet with a more pleasing history: "A female stork at Vorarlberg, in the Tyrol, had constructed a nest on one of her wings a few days before the general migration. The gentle spouse, who was aware of all his preparations for the journey, no sooner saw that she was incapable of so long a flight, than he left her to her fate, thought of forming an attachment with her the whole winter, watching over her, and supplying her with food, like a faithful and tender lover." The narrator adds that a man can scarcely form an idea of the self-control which a bird of passage must exert over himself during the long fasting to visit distant countries.

Respecting the sagacity of the stork Oppian has the following curious story: "A pair of storks had built a nest and hatched their young ones, but a serpent crept up and devoured the latter before they were old enough to fly. This happened two years following, and in the third year the parents brought with them a strange bird, somewhat smaller than themselves, and having a large beak as sharp as a sword, to him they intrusted the care of the nest, and when the serpent came up for his usual meal the bird attacked, and, after a severe combat, killed him. In consequence, however, of the venomous bites inflicted by the serpent, the whole of the bird's feathers fell off, and the grateful parents took care of their champion, and fed him, and staid with him till new feathers grew, and then sent him away also to accompany them to his native land.



In Africa there is a gigantic species of stork called the marabou, which is of a domestic turn, and easily tamed. Smeathman gives an account of one which he had in a state of entire freedom in the house at dinner-time and take his meat with the family; but he was rather apt to be troublesome by defiance of the ordinary rules of politeness, and one day he stuck his bill into a whole boiled fowl, and ran off with it, and could not be induced to desist by any means. On another occasion he behaved still worse, for in a fit of cowardly he was so hasty-barous as to swallow the cat, trusting that feline pet even worse than Cora is proverbially said to do.

Storks are of immense service to mankind, especially in warm countries, from the quantity of reptiles and vermin of all kinds which they destroy: field-mice, snakes, lizards, worms, frogs, and even tools—nothing comes to amiss to the stork. The Thessalians were so highly impressed with their utility that, according to Pliny, they made it a capital offense to kill a stork. Some tribes in Africa do not seem to have so much veneration for the stork, if we believe a story in Bosci a turtle stork with an African arrow right through his breast. This phenomenon had for some one means prevented the bird from migrating as usual, only he flew awkwardly (we can well believe it), and appeared to be in considerable pain, while his ally an shrial Blondin. A swiss sunset shot him out of necessity, wishing to ascertain what the stork was carrying under his wings.

There is one peculiarity connected with these birds which we must not omit to mention; it is, that every author who has ever written about them seems inevitably compelled to draw a considerably longer bow than did the African who shot the arrow aforesaid; and lest we should be accused of doing the like, we will be content to leave the wives of the virtuous, interesting, and affectionate family of storks.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—THE BATTLE OF CHARLES CITY ROAD, FOUGHT BY GENERA

ENTZELMAN AND FRANKLIN, ON MONDAY, JUNE 30.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 503.]

THE ROSE AND RING.

A ROSE and a ring!—there they were, lying in her lap. A half-blown rose with the faintest blush on its petals, and a massive ring ringing from its stem, bearing only the infinitesimal initials, H. L. They were real enough; they didn't vanish into thin air; but how to account for them?

Lillian knitted her smoothly arched brows and tried to think. She had been sitting there in the bow-window quite alone—nothing stirring in the long parlor and wide hall but a breeze that, rustling in through the open leaves of the window, swelled out the long curtains like sails, and carried off the stupid paper that she was trying to read. She had intended to go after it, of course; but it had floated over by one of the tall Parian vases, and, by a weary distance—two yards of polished tile, its chairs, past a gilt stand and a music rack, and across the Brussels carpet. She had grown very much inclined to ring the bell, and then she couldn't decide if it were not more trouble after all. Meanwhile her feet were growing comfortably on one of those little round cushions that people are always tumbling over in parlors; her pretty head rested just in the luxurious hollow of the fauteuil, and it was such a drowsy, murmuring day. And spite of herself, the lazy lashes dropped softly over the brown eyes and opened virtuously again, and fell once more on the hazel round cheek, and then stayed. Senses had dulled, thought began to entangle itself in the labyrinth of phantasms and nonsense that had to do with sleep, when had occurred the inexplicable part of the affair. There had been neither footstep nor rustle, yet something had lighted on her lips a kiss, and springing up from her fauteuil, not yet quite awake, rolled from her lap to the floor, with a slight metallic clink, the rose and ring.

She looked down the parlors, but only a spirit could have traversed their long stretch so soundlessly, and vanished without trace of any kind. She looked out, but there were fathoms of waving boughs and leaves, sunshine falling—checkered patches—on broad lawns and brown gravelled beds. She heard a bird singing loud and clear in the cool heart of a tree; the faint creak and strain of the Sollie, her uncle's sloop, as it rose and fell on the lake-like river, her sails showing partially through the trees; the occasional talk of two or three of her crew lounging near in their shirt-sleeves and pea-jackets—but all and yet that was Harry Lidell's voice, and he had promised to come and tell her till they should meet again—Harry Lidell! who must be at that moment hundreds of miles away; who could not have set foot on Union soil without arrest and imprisonment; whom, in short, not even madness itself, but only strategy, could have brought there to her uncle's plantation.

So attested was the that she never even heard the smart click of her cousin Natchalie's high-heels on the polished floor till she was close upon her.

"What! are you not ready yet, Lillian? That face might do for the Secretary of War, or our poor President himself."

"Thinking, as usual! nothing. I was dozing, I believe;" and with a guilty start and flush Lillian slipped the rose and ring into her bosom.

"Dozing! No wonder: you have been trying to read that paper which, though the thing seems impossible, grows more and more dry. Now, do I can tell you what is in it as if I had read it (which I haven't). There was the Secretary's letter on the Yankees, stating that they were cowards, besotted and incapable, and only making us wonder that our old ladies don't go out and whip them off with broomsticks; there is the other leader, proving that our Government is made up of imbeciles, equalled only by the people who settle them to govern. There is a letter about the valor of the regiment that stormed and carried the hen-coop; and a paragraph about our house-spun dresses, the beauty and virtue, in fourteen verses, ending by comparing us to those Roman and Spartan frights. Now isn't that the way it runs?"

"I—that is, I believe so," answered Lillian, who had scarcely heard at all.

"See here, Lily! I want to talk to you." And down went Natchalie, regardless of her organdie flounces, beside her cousin. "I am hailing over with treason. If that dear, handsome, chivalrous knight who was in my heart, he would have me shut for a traitor! I am positively going for Newport. I would give my stout complexion for a good old-fashioned rebuke with some of the enemies of our cause. I would even accept a challenge from Mr. or Max Grainger, for instance. (Apropos of Harry, I saw his name in Northern papers: he is a lieutenant in the Federal navy.) And as for all our Revolutionary grandmothers dressed like Sowdies, it doesn't console me for Le Roi and the Democrat in the least. All my dresses are last year's fashion, and I am sure they have something twice as pretty at Stewart's. Do you think we can hear from the girls—Lar Baracde, Belle Bayderen, and the rest? And as for a quiet, steady, downright flirtation, I have scarcely had one since they fired on Sumter. Can the men now are so fearfully serious; want you to marry them before they go—which, of course, isn't to be thought of. I did hope to keep in practice with Mr. Grainger, since he chooses to be so sweet on you—eh! there is Herculus and his sloop, sign, sign indisputable of dinner! My dear, don't you mean to dress for it?"

Ludlow tells us that, even at the height of the barbarian invasion, some mysterious influence kept in him sat apart reasoning on his vagaries and keeping guard over the proprieties. So with Lillian.

The enforced calm and resignation which for so long been fare was broken up; the presentation of some coming crisis was strong upon her; her heart throbbed painfully; nervous shudderings thrilled her through. What is this? Where is he? she asked herself again and again, till she grew half afraid that she had spoken the words aloud; and, as she stood before her dressing-glass, peered sharply through the veil of her long hair to see if she could read any thing in the strange look of trust on her cousin's face. But Natchalie sat idly playing with one of the crystal bottles, humming to herself snatches of merry little songs. Oh! inscrutable human heart! Here were two girls cradled together, having each other's looks and words by heart, and one was panting through such a fierce agony of doubt and fear as seemed like the bitterness of death itself, while outwardly calm, although back for long days, or fattening the little collar and its knot of gay ribbon, very much as she might have done any other of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year. The other sat careless and unconscious, running on in her own thoughts, very blind to those of her companion who lost given up.

"Mrs. Carrington, Lillian; coming to dine too. I know by that little box. She always carries her dress cap in that. My dear, did you ever see such a fright as old Isly? I often catch myself thinking for what she could possibly have been born. I asked somebody that, in the very same way, and you should have heard her. Yes, Natchalie, she's one of the belles of the county; but I really don't know for what. Mrs. Carrington is kind to her, Lillian, why don't you say something? Come here and help me. I was getting out of the carriage—quick! Were there ever such weeds? We shall have two courses at dinner not set down in the bill of fare—gossamy and silk worms—and to reconcile each other in the one quality of being indescribably nasty."

Ill-natured, weary talk! It jarred on Lillian in even more than the rapturous salutation of the two girls to Natchalie, who said a few words to the two cousins in the orthodox feminine fashion the moment that dinner was announced.

Lillian loved, and therefore was the "Tyrant" to her; and, advanced Captain Dandy—the "Tyrant" referred to—wearing his uniform and a becoming jacket—coat, the leaves wound receiver at Bull Run.

Natchalie gave him two fingers and a saucy nod. Lillian did not look up; only suffered her hand to passively in his for an instant, and then withdrew it. Behind them, in the hall, Herculus, his sloop, as the irreverent little beauty whispered Lillian "a small tug pulling along with a large tow in the wake." Herculus, indeed, in the light costume of a bronzed, athletic young man in sailor's dress, and as shy as a girl.

"Captain Ward, of the Sollie," said Dr. Carrington, presenting him. "Trust him well, girls, as he is a Union man, volunteered to be the slave here, and ran the gauntlet of the Federal vessels when Captain Ward was stood before the Forts, guess dinner. Lillian, take the Captain's arm!"

Lillian bowed, murmured something to vacant space, and accepted the tips of Herculus' fingers as the awkwardly proffered arm with a reluctance that was perceptible to Natchalie, and indifference; and yet he was not ill-looking, the lumbering hero! If he could have solved the problem of his strange conduct, he would have said first, if he had been a little less gipsy-like in complexion and strong in the matter of hair, if his clothes could even have been induced to the idea that long hung on him, he might have been superb. Eyes of that clear blue to affect a Southern belle's heart, and it always shaded by long dark lashes; a mouth at once weak and determined; chest-cut features, broad shoulders, deep chest, and a commanding air, were not altogether amiss even in the Captain of the Sollie, Government lighter, for Lillian had forgotten to look at him.

Mrs. Ogleby fastened on her.

"Warde! and; are you any relation of the Wards of Raleigh? Their great-grandmother was Miss Prince—connected with the Princes?"

"Oh, mother!" interrupted Clara; "please don't set Captain Ward climbing his family tree before dinner, to have it cut down by the overwhelming shout from dreadful Yankees, and whether they are coming here or not."

"Little danger, Miss Clara," said the Doctor, kindly. "We'll give them enough to do at home. Their young men will have business leaden to promenading Broadway, I reckon."

Natchalie pouted.

"But it is hard, after all. Think of it. Eustace met Harry Lidell on some of their expeditions, and Harry has built up a large name for beleaf at Eustace's breast. That was like generous, Harry! Hal, Eustace! Hal, Lillian! Lovers! I don't mean as if they could be our enemies."

"Enemies!" echoed her father. "Natchalie, I loved Harry Lidell as I did few men. I would be God do to me, and more also, if I did not hang on the nearest tree! He is a double traitor. He was born South."

Waves of color surged up in Lillian's face, and sudden bone glowed in her soft eyes. "He said that rested on the young sailor's arm was slightly pressed.

"Does Lillian indorse that?" was asked, in a very low but distinct voice, close in her ear.

She looked up, startled, confused, and as she met the singular glance fastened on her face sudden flame glowed on her cheek. She clung now to the despised arm.

"Because," he went on, "I see that you wear a rose and ring."

Lillian began to tremble violently. Her shy lips parted, but gave forth no sound.

"Will the Captain Ward Eustace, bending on her a look that was almost a frown; "are you ill?"

"No: it is nothing," gasped Lillian.

"Oh! I am really glad to hear it, though 'nothing' certainly seems a strange answer. Natchalie, you know I almost thought that your companion had been saying something to agitate you?"

Lillian made no answer. Indeed she seemed incapable of speaking, and sat almost like a statue through all the chattering and the clatter and the courses, the monotonous talk of Mrs. Ogleby and the maddening trustees of her daughter. It really seemed to her that Mrs. Carrington never would leave off the signal to rise, and when at last it came, as her cousin passed out before her, she leaned with an utterer hand for support and held her little fingers in his for an instant. Lillian shrank back.

"In the name of God who are you?" she said under her breath, but with terrible earnestness. The young man glanced around them. Eustace was lingering under the arch of the door evidently watching them.

"Captain Ward of the Sollie; at your service, Miss," he answered, coldly.

Then he made a sharp pang at Lillian's heart. Doubt, terror, disappointment must out in some way. She pulled away her arm and ran out at a side-door, first whispering to Natchalie:

"Let no one come to look for me. I am sick, and want to be alone a little while."

Eustace saw her go and would have followed, but was held fast by the inexorable Clara.

"Now, Captain Danby, don't you see that it is a more philosophical and philanthropic view? Consider, Mr. Eustace, that Natchalie's nerves will snappish, snobbish fact, and he becomes disgusting; but say to yourself I imagine that there is a little bird in my breast and amiable; then you see how much more elevating and philosophic he would be made of."

"Probably; yes, certainly," sighed Eustace: wished that he dared consider Miss Clara's one practical piece of wisdom avoirdupois as the concretion of his fancy, and treat her accordingly.

Meanwhile Lillian, hidden in the depth of a little arbor situated a mile from the house, on what was known on the plantation as the Knoll; but the Knoll was a slight elevation, sinking toward the little rustic hedge, when the tall form of Captain Ward parted the bushes and stood before her. She started up at once, angry and terrified, but he caught her hands.

"Lillian, my little darling, don't you really know me? Does a little paint and a wig alter me so very much?"

"Harry! Harry Lidell!" Then drawing back, "Oh, I am half afraid of you! don't touch me yet. Are you sure you are yourself? those are your eyes, and it is your voice, but how could you come here? Oh, Harry! if it is you, don't torment me. I have suffered so much, so much, and am still full of illness. I felt as if shut out from every human sympathy."

"My poor little girl! you need feel so no longer. As for my coming, that was simple enough. I captured the Sollie by trying to run the blockade, helped ourselves to her papers, and the rig of her crew, and came on here to see you and Natchalie. That is, the others did: as for me, I confess that my chief anxiety was to see if my little Lilly would keep the promise she made me when we parted. You can never know what a thrill I felt when, wandering about the house, I came on your rose-bud in that dear old bow-window. I couldn't help kissing you, and then I dropped the rose and ring. Darling, that I should guess that I was not indifferent to you, but, Harry! go at once; you are in dreadful peril, unprotected."

"Your promise, Lilly; you promised when I came back to go with me, be it when and where it would. Will you keep it? The Sollie sails at midnight; will you go with me?"

Lillian looked down at the face in her hands.

"I will be father, brother, sister—all to you; pleaded the young lieutenant, softly and eagerly. "Take courage, Lilly. Say yes."

"Venez ma reine, venez ma belle," chanted Eustace's voice outside the arbor.

"Quick" urged Harry. "Speak, Lilly. Will you come?"

"Yes, if I am alive," answered Lillian, with sudden and strange vehemence, and breaking from his hold fled down the lanes like a frightened bird.

How the intervening time passed she hardly knew. People sung, talked, did various unmeaning things, and Lillian sang about, too. The hours (cycles they seemed to her) dragged away, the house looked quiet, and at midnight Lillian slipped from her cousin's side, and began hurrying on her clothes; but every hand and taken unto its self a crying, and Eustace had grown anxious and refused to open, and in her agitation she knocked down a chair. On the instant Natchalie's black eyes were wide open, and her little muslin night-cap perched up over the side of the bed.

"Lillian, Lily, are you going? What does this mean?"

"I want my sails; I left them in the library," and my head is intolerable."

"I should think so when you put on your hat and shawl and your boots! Lillian, you are a fool for your sails! Come back. Stop, Lillian! If you stir one step I will alarm the house."

Lillian came back and stood by the bed, white as marble, and with dilated, flashing eyes.

"I will go, though I have to run away."

"I am going to run away."

"What do you mean?"

"I promised Harry Lidell if alive, and I will go or die." Then suddenly throwing herself on her knees, and grasping her cousin's hand, "Oh, Natchalie, my little sister, pity me! I have suffered so this dreadful day. Harry Lidell is here; he dined with us to-day."

Natchalie struck her hands together.

"I knew it! I knew there was something odd about that Captain Ward."

"Natchalie, you know how long we have loved each other; but you can never know what it has been to be insulted from him, my life, my whole life, and to have to keep it from him. Natchalie, whatever you could say, know that I have said it, I would rather die than endure it again. Alarm the house if you choose, Natchalie. His life and mine are in your hands. You heard your father at dinner—you know whether or not I could survive him. Act as you think best."

But Natchalie's work nature was past acting. She could do nothing but crouch on the bed and sob. Lillian bent down and kissed her.

"Good-by, little sister. I do not think you will betray us."

Then left the cry at her heart should burst out, she ran quickly out at a little door in the lower hall of which she had taken the key, pursued by a confused humming noise of girls' voices, still sudden by strong arms seized and held her against a fast-beating heart.

"Have you, my darling, for coming, and God help me to make your happiness!" whispered Harry Lidell, low in her ear, as he hurried her toward the shore.

Mr. Carrington found in the morning an open door, a vacancy where the rose and ring had been, and a note on his library table, reading as follows:

"Dr. Carrington:

"DEAR SIR—For your hospitality of yesterday I am obliged; still more for the kind intentions that you were good enough to express in my behalf, though he is little me to afford you an opportunity to execute them.

"Your ward, Miss Sollie, is now going, with my distinguished consideration, to a better ones, but I offer an apology for carrying off your little Lilly. She was pressed on, as you know, long ago, and I only take what is my own. Will you have to Natchalie, and kiss her for Mrs. Carrington, I remain

Yours respectfully,

"H. LEWIS.

"(alias Captain Ward of the Sollie)."

WITHOUT SAIL OR RUDDER.

It is no longer strange that the men of the sea have a dialect and habituals all their own, for the longer they are separated more unused from the land is their life from the landsman's; no possible bridge may unite these hemispheres of human existence. In spite of mountains it may be scaled, in spite of stones or finger-posts to point highways; shut from land over a rounded sea of sea and sky will land become a doubtful memory, and when they meet a sail they ought, but for hardening repetition, to be startled at the sight of a ghost. Neither one could it be but that shadow and substance are confused, for the one is so thin and the land so near but seem, but a brief dream, from which awakened there will be the long swell and eternal lay of blue again? In this strangeness hours may thing a dissimilar. I accept the Flying Dutchman, who never makes land except in a storm, and then only sheep; his eyelids are dry, but let him shut them and he sits on towers and hear the bells in them. The men of Heligoland are not so unfortunate, for they can slid down this glassy slope out of sight of land, and be hapless in the thick of climbing lark.

Some such reflections as these were more misty than I have made them here, I had as I stood leaning on the rail full of a Gloucester schooner on a July afternoon of several years ago. Like those who are drifted, a long mate to make a great blaze at the start, I had rushed down to the pier as the first Nature had laid up for a dozen, and was grown to a dreamy quiet, and, indeed, almost to a stupid leaf for myself in the great unfathomable boat whose bottom I have been spending one after another since the first day. Be careful how you spend your strength, and then come to steal a look into this volume. It is the reading of individuals of any number of cities; but the old one sought fresh water and I was glad to get it. I am not to tell my own story, I must drop metaphor and tell that of one out of my bands; I was only on board a schooner bound for Gloucester, Massachusetts, for a passage cause and touched me on the shoulder. I started, and the Adalmonte and the Dutchman went back between the sea and sky, and I was standing in a dingy quarterjogy.

"I'm sorry 'bout the eyes; gettin' used to it, that's all. First trip out, ain't it?"

I nodded.

"Thought so," said the skipper. "Fresh-water enthusiasm—know it won't see it. You chaps take basin and bucket, and you wash and wash, and wonder when you hasn't seen any water 'cept what they wash their faces in you get a sort o' confused idea that you've seen it all, and you don't care one afore you can get the true one in. Only one thing to do, and that's to look at nothing else, and keep at it till you're used to it. Now an' then when there ain't fish in sight, an' every thing's one blue, like, I like to take a look at the sky myself. I've been watchin' you these ten minutes; while you was lookin' down you didn't see it, but you was sick, and I dare swear you hain't noticed how neat it looks off that side?"

I looked up, and saw a morning, and the skipper's phrase, it was "neat." We were then near the middle of the Bay, headed for the mouth of the St. Lawrence. A light wind broke ripples under the bows; the sun hung, a crumpled coppery disk, from the bottom of a watery cloud, and splintered slanting bolts of dull red fire on the masts of a vessel under him; the sea crawled away in lessening wrinkles until they blended with the horizon that bound them in; Anticosti Island lay vast in the distance like a shadow; and behind a white misty sweep I could see other schooners, some with blue and red bands, and some with the more quiet orange peel picked in relief against the sky—black-ground, sea, air, and sky, there there.

seemed met in transfiguration. I called the skipper's attention to another object that loomed up in our rear, a white, shapeless thing which might be a vessel, only it had no outlines; had some ocean-spirit suddenly taken form, or was Amphitrite floating to us on her morning-conch with curtains of cloud drawn round her?

"Guess 'tain't none o' them," said the skipper, after we had watched it a while; "I think it's one o' them things that knows what became o' the Pacific; it looks to me jus' like a berg, though it's mighty oncommon for one to get through in here."

Sure enough it was an iceberg—lonesone, half-melted thing! A sacrifice to Fate or its desire of travel; without oars or fins, there was no return when it once cast loose from recesses of Arctic night and headland—it had come through the Straits, spilling its life in the sea along its track, pale and quivering with the fatal warmth.

Perhaps I spoke out my thought. "Don't pity it," said the skipper; "it does me good to see it melt; it hadn't any business to be comin' this way. Them things look sleek in a picter', but 'tain't any more like the real things than a starved bear in a cage is like a real Rocky grizzler. This is jus' as nigh's I ever want to get to such a thing's that; ever sence I was up 'mong 'em where they grow it allers gives me the shakes to see one, an' I gen'rally give 'em plenty o' sea-room."

Aglow with curiosity at the prospect of such a novelty as a genuine sailor's yarn, I prompted the skipper with all zeal, and was rewarded by the certain sign of a fresh quid.

"'Twas some dozen years ago, when all kinds o' fishin' was better'n 'tis now, whalin' as well's the rest, for they hadn't got up these coal-burnin' 'bominations then, I was comin' home from a cruise in this bay, 'fore I got to be runnin' for myself. We'd jus' got through the Gut an' was headed for the cape, when we met a brig beatin' along to windward an' makin' speakin' signals. We see by her rig she wa'n't a fisherman, an' by the way she was handled she'd got a green set aboard, but she come 'longside an' told us she was from Boston, bound up north for the sport of it; a painter 'd chartered her, an' was crazy to go where he could sketch the ice from the life, he said. He come round in his boat himself, a bright-eyed, steel-springy, little chap; I see he'd got the true grit an' handled his oars neat, but a'ter all, it wasn't jus' nat'ral, he was used to mahog'ny an' red cedar more'n to white-ash. He said he'd hired his brig an' his men, but the lubbers 'd backed out, but he'd be d—d if he didn't go ahead if he had to swim for't; give him one decent man to spell him an' he'd send all he'd got back an' push along; an' he wanted to see any sailor on that fleet 'twas smart an' spunky enough to go say so an' name his price. This kind o' touched me in the right spot an' I was on my taps in a minute, an' told him I was his man. I asked him 'bout how fur up he meant to go, an' he said he didn't know any thin' about it; he was goin' till he got a sketch to suit him, if he had to squat on the end o' the North Pole. Father—he was skipper then an' I was sailin' under him—told me to mind my eye an' steer clear o' that scrape; but it didn't make no difference, I picked up a few things an' jumped into the boat. Probably I should been smarter if I hadn't been so smart; but young folks is obstreperous, an' I was only two-an'-twenty; besides, I was to go out on a craft of my own next time if we'd had good luck this trip; but it happened jus' so't we didn't, an' we was comin' home sheepish enough with our strike-barrels next to empty, an' so I was cross an' blue an' mos' ready for any thin' that come along; an' the offer of ten dollars a week an' a command of my own—that was the real spot 'twas touched, to be on my own deck a'ter bein' jus' cheated out of it—was more'n I could stand. I don't think I half heard what father said; fact is, a'ter a boy's old enough so't you can't make him mind it don't do no good to give him advice, for he'll take his course jus' as fur's he can get from what you tell him, an' I've heard folks say't a skittish horse, though I don't know myself for I never druv one, never takes the bit in his teeth till you try to hold him in a little—then he's off.

"But as I said, I'd gone an' done it 'thout stoppin' to think, an' the first I came to consider that I'd better have looked afore leapin' the old schooner was a little speck down south, an' instid o' bein' home in Gloucester in four days I was bound the Lord knew where, an' to be home the Lord knew when. But it don't mend a broken line to cry, an' I thought leastways I hadn't got to sneak home like a kicked cur; I was on my own deck an' a bigger craft it was than any mackerel-smack, an' I was sure to go where I should see somethin' new an' have a big yarn to spin if ever I got back. To be sure, I'd left a girl behind me, a tall lass straight an' trim's a bow, one 't could break wrists with most fellows who think they're cordy; but that didn't fret me much, for I knew she'd wait patiently, an' in fact every girl 't promises herself to a sailor knows the sea's got a promise of him as well's she an' may get its claim first. I couldn't have faced her after comin' back empty; father was older an' wouldn't mind it so much, 'cause every body knew he was a good hand, but my case was different, I'd got to show my smartness or 'twas all up with me.

"I found young Kellerton as good a fellow as ever was, only two or three years older'n me; I could hugged him for his grit, for he was a little ahead o' me there. He was jus' the sort o' company to keep off the dumps, an' the brig was a dull sailer, lumberin' an' rollin' a good deal, as if she wa'n't well balanced, though she was tough an' stanch for all that; besides, he'd sent off all but three o' the hands, so't it kep' us busy as bees to work the ship, an' somethin' to do's the best way to keep content. 'Twa'n't so easy by half as I thought, but I could manage things pretty well: a keen, quick eye, an' a steady hand that does what the eye says 'thout stoppin' to argy, are what you want to get along anywheres in the world, an' we both had them, so we didn't fear; but when we'd rounded Cape Race an' was fairly headed north the men begun to look white 'bout the gills, an' I—well, I was a little shaky, but Kellerton said he'd run into St. Johns an' land any man 't said so, but not one of 'em spoke. There wa'n't really no great danger ahead, but you must remember we was all young an' used to short cruises 'long shore, an' started in haste with some bad signs an' bad luck, not knowin', either, where we was bound to; but I believe I shouldn't backed out then if I'd known for certain I was never comin' back.

"It wasn't long afore we met our first iceberg, in a foggy morning so thick you couldn't see two yards from the wheel; the fog squatted on the water like a big sticky jelly, but the stars twinkled confusedly overhead, an' all a sudden a sort o' lane opened 'fore us with gray walls 't you couldn't see into an' couldn't hardly break a dent in, an' right ahead was a berg as big agen as the one you jus' see, as high's a church steeple set adrift on end, an' lookin' ghostly enough—I could see the freeze all over its sides. It come down the lane an' we sheered off as well's we could, but it grazed us when it slid by, makin' the brig shiver as though the touch felt cold.

"I don't remember any thin' more 'twas extr'ordinary till we got pretty well into Baffin's Bay; we stopped at one place where the natives live, an' I vow, fishin' ain't the cleanest business, but I thought I never see dirt afore. We got a few o' their dogs, to be in the fashion, though we didn't think of ever usin' 'em; as for furs an' supplies, Kellerton 'd laid in enough to serve through two winters. Them are queer waters to sail in, up there; instid o' genuine waves there's a little choppin' sea slappin' on the bows, an' the wind acts as if 'twas lost, sinks down a while an' then on a sudden gets up an' whops round one way an' 'nuther, ragin' an' tearin', as if 'twas a wild beast 't had got into a pit; every thin's turned round, and if there's any fishes I believe they swim tail first; there ain't no sound to be heard nor any livin' thing to be seen 'long shore, an' what green things there is looks as if they'd jus' stuck up their heads an' was too scared to grow any higher—you never see a sail, an' it's lonesome v'yagin'.

"But when we got up to where 'twas ice an' nothin' but ice, what with the crackin' an' grindin' there was noise an' excitement enough. Seems to me the Lord didn't finish this part the world, an' left all the materials lyin' round loose an' piled in great heaps. I ain't book-larned, though I read some when I'm in-shore, an' all I can 'member o' them places is a sort o' jumbled mess o' chunks, all mixed up together. There was bergs in all shapes: some like a mountain tipped upside down; pinnacly fellers runnin' up to a point as sharp's a needle; thin ones turned up on edge, lookin' like a sheet with a hole torn in it; some was stretched out full length fast asleep in the path, an' some juttin' over the water an' threat'nin' to fall, with long spars o' ice hangin' down off their heads. I can't tell half their shapes, but I couldn't get rid o' the notion that they was live critters sailin' about there so white and slow; and there was cliffs o' hard stone made into stairs as reg'lar's if they'd been cut with a knife, with moonshine tumblin' down 'em, an' every thin' looked big an' misty. We went along like as if we was goin' over dry land a'most, part the time in fogs, in the openin's in the ice; sometimes they'd open all nice till we'd got in, an' then shut an' squeeze the brig like a pair o' nut-crackers, an' we'd be penned 'thout a chance to move either way, but pretty soon they'd open their jaws an' let us out; an' bimeby a big berg 't had been lyin' in wait for us 'ud slide out of his hole meanin' to jam us agen the shore, the wind meanwhiles haulin' off to see the sport, and lettin' our sails flap down so't we'd have to get out a line an' make a race, all hands a-tuggin', an' the white monster 'd grind by so close we couldn't get the blade of a knife 'twixt his nose an' the ship's side. There was as many pretty sights as we could spare eyes for, but we wanted eyes all over our heads to see it all. The sun used to get up at midnight sometimes an' peek over the top of a berg, an' then the little white clouds off a good ways 'ud be like washed mats o' wool tied up with gilt strings, an' it seemed 's if the Lord's big furnace o' light had burst an' all the hot gold was a-drizzlin' from the bottom down onto the ice, an' spreadin 's it cooled; an' a'ter a while it 'ud shift a bit, an' there'd be a splosh of all sorts o' colors, an' instid o' gold a string o' diamonds an' all sorts o' jewels 't I don't know the names of 'ud come slippin' down—you could most hear 'em ching when they struck the ice. I used to look at Kellerton those times, an' I've seen his cheeks flush up red for all the world like a girl's, so't he looked positively han'some; I've always thought 'twas a pity such nice shows must be stuck way off to the top of the world where there's nobody but bears and walruses livin' to get the good of 'em, an' a man can't go after 'em 'thout riskin' his neck. But that's the way allers; you can't see the inside of a hole 'thout you put your head in it an' run your chances.

"Well, we worked 'long in this way till we'd got somewheres near the upper end o' Melville Bay. We wasn't much afraid, for we hadn't been through any thin' very solid, seein' we started early in the season, an' we knew 'twas safe enough while there was an openin' behind us; we'd no notion to get wedged in, but we was sure we could break our way back where 'twasn't open water, an' I s'pose, too, there was a kind o' excitement about it makin' us crazy to go ahead. But 'twouldn't do to risk it any further, for it'd now got close onto September, an' so we hauled up under the lee o' the biggest berg we could find, thinkin' to start south in a week an' then make quick time. Kellerton 'd got his book pretty full o' sketches, good sketches they was, too, but them places is so wild an' topsy-turvy like, 't I declare I couldn't tell, 'bout some the picters, which side up to hold 'em; the sea an' sky both is pretty much alike, an' icebergs ain't like other things, they lay in the water jus' as it happens; but some o' his figures o' bergs topplin' over look nat'ral enough: I can most hear the thump when they hit the water, and I'll show you some I've got in my bunk yet when we turn in. Kellerton couldn't use his paints out the cabin any, of course, an' not much any way, every thin' stiffens up so—he used to say he'd give his eye if he could only reach up an' get one brushful o' the sun's color; but he'd take his sketchin' frame an' go off, he and I, with the dogs a-scamperin' ahead, half a dozen miles from the brig, over the fields o' ice to draw, an' we had jolly times, for he was a crack hand to take hold of any thin', an' as good's a forecastle mess at yarns. He beat me out-and-out at shootin' all through, for he'd lived whole summers in the woods, while I was green at the business, an' somehow never could hold the thing steady. Two birds was all my game, an' I had a notion 't I'd take a seal home to show, any way. So I left him alone a mile or two from the brig, with a peaked berg liftin' up its head out o' fog an' mist on his paper, an' set off without the dogs, fur I didn't want their company, an' besides, they was unruly critters an' went jus' where they was a mind to. Not knowin' then the trick o' walkin' behind a screen, I couldn't get near enough to the seal for a decent shot till I'd gone quite a piece, an' at last I see one asleep an' managed to hit him by creepin' pretty close; he flopped, but afore he could roll into his hole I had my knife in him. I hitched a rope on an' begun draggin' him, which was hard work, but when I got mebbe a half mile I was brought up short by a crack an' a strip o' water at least a hunderd yards wide; I slapped my hand to my for'ead an' like to fainted, for I'd been up there long enough to know the meanin' on't. I could see a place I 'membered passin' a little time ago, jus' over the water, but it might as well been a hunderd miles, fur no live man could swim in that ice-water, an' I hadn't a dog to help pull me over. I run round another side an' 'twas water, round another an' 'twas jus' the same—'twas nothin' but water clear round an' the bergs an' the fast ice beyond, not a strip so wide's a razor-edge to crawl off on. I'd got to know it, the wind 'd broke my piece off the rest the field, an' I was afloat without sail or rudder.

"You want to know what I did—what 'ud you done in my place? I jus' sunk down on the ice fur a hearty cry, it come over me so sudden an' sweepin' like; but grown folks' tears ain't much 'count, leastways when they freeze on the cheek as fast's they come an' threaten to wall up the eyes, an' so I stopped that an' begun thinkin'. Kellerton 'd sarch fur me as long 's 'twas any use, but I knew the ship might as well been down to t'other pole fur any good she'd do me, though she wa'n't more'n three miles off; it don't make no difference whether a man drowns a rod from shore or fifty miles, only it does make the choke a little harder to get most in. Standin' here now on the Huldy Stevens, where I know every plank an' rope by heart, I can't hardly believe I ever was there, but Kellerton's picters 't I've got brings it all back; but 'twas real, an' I declare I'd ruther been on a log in the middle o' the Atlantic. The quickest thing was to jump under an' let my drowned head rap up agen the bottom o' the ice, but I could do that any time, an' when you've got a length o' rope 'twixt you an' dyin' an' don't know how long 'tis, jus' wait till the end comes into your hand afore you cast it off. I'd dropped my rifle when I run for the seal an lost that, leavin' me only five fathoms o' rope an a knife besides my two hands; I shouldn't freeze—'twa'n't likely, nor drown, an' the bears won't meddle 'cept they're ravenous; as for eatin', I'd got a few ship's-biscuit and the seal, and when these was gone?—well, then I'd go too.

"I knew I was driftin' pretty fast, but didn't know which way 'twas, an' it didn't much matter. Perhaps I should get onto a berg an' float down, an' I follered it clear down round Newfoundland; but that 'ud take six weeks, so't I should be sittin' stiff on it 'fore that time; an' when we got into the ships' track they'd see my face scowlin' down from the top o' the berg, an' mebbe take it for the berg's own head—perhaps some Gloucester man 'ud see it—an' it's one o' the onaccountable things in human natur' that I most laughed at first at thinkin' how queer I should look, an' then felt mad to think my own folks 't knowed me might see me, an' say they was sure all the while I'd never be back alive. Pretty soon a walrus stuck up his nose an' leaned his tushes on the ice, blowin' the water an' his strong-smellin' breath off his whiskers; an' I see a bear walkin' 'long out on the field, an' I thought I'd fretted myself for nothin'.

"I don'o why 'tis, but when one gets a bit onsettled he gets to hearin' queer sounds in the first place; an' somehow when you think of a voice it's allers a woman's. Jus' a little screech from a woman's throat 'll go further'n the loudest a man can bawl; an' when sailors hears cries a-comin' off the water 'thout any sail in sight, an' a wailin' abaft the mainmast an' through the shrouds, it's a woman's voice, never a man's; there's sunthin' 'bout women's voices that goes right through a man, an' starts him in a way 't nothin' else in the world can. For one reason or 'nuther I begun to hear all sorts o' voices moanin' round in the air, sobbin' right behind my head, it seemed, an' callin' to one 'nuther across the bergs. I could hear my old mother singin' above 'em all, jus' as she used to sing in the rockin'-chair by the window, with me on her knee, an' watchin' the landin' to see if father's smack had hove in sight. I could hear her singin' 'Mear' an' 'Boylston' to the hymn she liked; an' the words was:

'O where shall res' be found?—
Res' for the weary soul!—
'Twere vain the ocean's deps to sound,
Or sarch to either Pole.'

I don't remember whether I was scared or not, but it seemed real enough; an' if they was in trouble so was I, and misery loves company; but 'twas dre'ful ghostly. I wasn't sure—but if they was only human critters!

"'Twasn't so much dyin' that went so hard with me, or the way of it, but the place. Goin' down to Davy Jones an' rottin' 'mong weeds an' fishes ain't a decent or pleasant style o' burial; but sailors get used to such an idee by long cruisin'; an' out in the country, where the hills lie in the sun year on year, an' the grass an' flowers grows green an' kindly, with the singin' birds, an' brooks runnin' over the stones, an' every thin' full o' life, there's a fellow-feelin' with a man, for all these breathin' things have jus' the same wants as he has, an' live an' die jus' the way he does; an' so they try to make him happy while he's alive, an' when he's dead they hold him, an' kind o' mourn for him; an' God seems close by these. But up in them lonesome places there ain't a livin' soul, an' nothin' but cold bergs 'thout any feelin'. They don't live or grow, but stand piled up jus' the same one year to another; an' no matter what awful things might be goin' on afore 'em, they wouldn't care, but 'ud be stern all the same, an' the last look out o' starvin' eyes wouldn't move 'em to showin' pity; there ain't any soul there, but only jus' a pile o' dead an' still matter; an' it seemed to me—for the sun wasn't shinin' then—that God 'd heaped this part the world full o' frightful things, an' then gone away Himself an' left it. But sunthin' whispered, 'If I take the wings o' the mornin' an' fly to the outermost parts o' the earth, behold, Thou art there;' an' so I knew, an' blessed the Lord 't there's no such thing as bein' out o' His reach; that He's jus' as near 'mong icebergs as livin' hills, an' looks out jus' as much in the dark as in the mornin' flushes, fur He don't need the sun to see by; then I see the Lord's glory lightin' up the place, an' I felt I could trust Him, though trustin' an' bein' resigned in one's bed ain't much like doin' it alone on a slab o' ice up in the northern deserts. All the prayers 't I hadn't thought of sence I was a boy diggin' clams an' huntin' shells on the beaches they come back to me, an' I prayed with a will—fact is, there's no blessin' that stays by a man so long's them little prayers 't mothers teaches; they won't be forgot, an' they'll hide 'emselves, all white an' pure, down in the heart o' the worst sinner on earth, an' stay there till he gets in trouble, an' then come risin' out the filth to his mouth, jus' as a spring o' water bubbles up out of a muddy hollow; and I 'membered how I used to say, 'Now I lay me down to sleep,' an' I said it with real feelin', an' then I curled into a ball an' went to sleep.

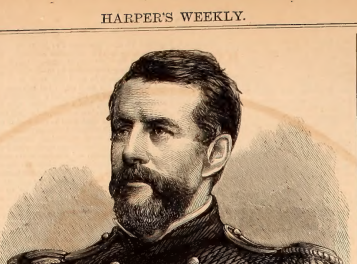
"When I woke up the first thing 't come into my head was a line of a hymn I used to say, beginnin',

'Night her solemn mantle spreads,'

but 'twasn't dark, but a great deal worse'n dark, for the moon was shinin'. An' that moonlight was awful. It gave every thin' such a look as I can't tell you an' I never see afore or sence; the bergs reared 'emselves clear into the sky an' elbowed the clouds, glarin' with their white, frozen-lookin' eyes, an' throwin' black shadows onto the water, an' their sides was a great dazzle; all the little slabs o' ice piled round looked jus' like grave-stones, an' the moon was continually layin' out white shrouds on the water; the ragged cliffs was sheddin' the light off down to their feet, an' it was comin' down from above as fast's it fell off, the great hollows in the sides a-gapin' with their black mouths way in where the moon couldn't get; and now an' then a big lump 'ud roll off the top somewheres an' roar down into the water, makin' white streaks run 'long the sea, twistin' an' hurryin' like a troop o' scared ghosts; 'twas all big an' stretched-out an' glary, white and onsartain, what little black there was makin' the rest jus' so much whiter—'twas the frightfulest thing I see, an' I'd a sight ruther had it dark as pitch.

"Bimeby it begun to snow—the queerest snow 't ever fell, fur 'twas soft an' fine an' hardly seemed to be comin' down from clouds, only the air was full of it, settlin' round like a white lace veil; I couldn't see an inch, but 'twas better'n to have the moon all the time. Fallin' snow's lonesome; but we're all used to it so't it seems kind o' pleasant, an' it couldn't hurt my case any. I'd had to drink the sea-water afore an' worry it down best I could, an' so the snow seemed sent o' purpose an' I caught up a handful of it, but good God! what'd it mean? I might as well filled my mouth with blazin' coals, for it burned like fire, an' pretty soon I found my lips an' tongue was swelled thick an' raw an' bleedin'.

"I can't tell how long I was there or half what I did, for I couldn't notch the days, an' most likely I was wild a good part the time; it all seems queer an' confused now, as if I'd jus' woke up out of a talkin' dream. I must have got up every now an' then an' eat away on my seal, and then gone to sleep agen; fur that's the most I 'member while I was floatin' an' waitin' fur my fish to be gone an' then sunthin' to happen which only the Lord knew.



"That ripple you see there 'bout two miles off the lee-bow means we're goin' to work shortly an' 'minds me to be cuttin' my yarn short. I'd drifted a good ways in some direction, I couldn't tell what; but the water was gettin' more open an' the bergs was bigger an' more of 'em. The leads in the ice 'd got to be wider an' thicker, an' I thought most likely I'd floated toward the south, but I was in a perfect den o' bergs, sailin' in an' out with the wind an' sometimes only jus' missin' o' smashin' my little raft o' ice. There was one comin' straight down on me, an' all I could do was to wait an' see whether I found myself kickin' in the water, for I couldn't stir an inch; but when it come nearer I see masts an' cordage standin' out on the sky, but I was hazy an' didn't take any notice on't, though I heard the cables a-creakin', till the next thing I see a figure-head, a sailor holdin' a harpoon glidin' above me, an' there was a great thump and a crack run 'long close to me an' left me swimmin', or tryin' hard to, but in five minutes I was on board a British whaler 't had happened to drive agen me. I suppose mebbe I'd been four or five days on the ice, an' I'd drifted down into what the sailors call the 'Bergy Hole.' 'Twas a straight track an' a short run to home then, and a'ter a while I found Kellerton 'd sarched fur me till he'd got to leave or be froze in fur winter, an' then he left an' got into Boston a fortnight later'n I. That's the end. Mackerel ahead—here they gnaw! Look alive, lads, there's a school!"

BRIG.-GENERAL KEYES, U.S.A.

We publish on this page a portrait of General ERASMUS D. KEYES, commanding the Fifth Army Corps in the Army of the Potomac. General KEYES was born in Massachusetts about the year 1810, and entered West Point from that State in 1828. In 1832 he graduated and entered the Third Artillery, in which he served till 1837, when he became a member of General SCOTT's military family. In the following year he was appointed Assistant Adjutant-General. In 1841 he obtained his commission, which he commanded for three years, after which he resumed the post of Instructor of Cavalry and Artillery at West Point. He remained in this position during the Mexican War.

At the outbreak of the rebellion General KEYES was one of the first officers to whom the Government looked for aid. On 14th May, 1861, he was appointed Colonel of the Eleventh Infantry—one of the new Regiments; and, three days afterward, Brigadier-General of Volunteers. He served in the Army of the Potomac under General M'DOWELL, and afterward, when the army was subdivided and reorganized under General M'CLELLAN, he obtained command of a corps d'armée.

He is regarded as one of the most efficient officers in the Army of the Potomac.

THE REBEL IRON-CLAD "ARKANSAS."

We publish herewith an illustration, from a sketch by Mr. Theodore R. Davis, representing the REBEL IRON-CLAD STEAMER "ARKANSAS" RUNNING THROUGH OUR FLEET FROM THE MOUTH OF THE YAZOO RIVER TO THE PROTECTION OF THE BATTERIES AT VICKSBURG. The feat was equally glorious to the rebels as it was mortifying to us. After describing how the Arkansas was discovered in the YAZOO RIVER, and CAPTAIN WILLIS had dispatched the Tyler to warn the fleet, the Herald correspondent says:

The Arkansas, in return, fired two and a half inch bore guns with telling effect, but the test and only thing regarding her shot-proof qualities which could be ascertained, was that her armor was repeatedly perforated, some of the shot going entirely through and passing out on the opposite side. Two men were killed by a shot and three wounded by splinters. The loss is quite trifling. The Carondelet was not struck below the water-line, nor was her machinery injured. She will be in proper trim again in a short time.

The Carondelet at length succeeded in getting alongside and grappling the Arkansas. The order "Boarders" was given, was instantly passed, and the crew of the YAZOO, gallantly mounted the deck of the rebel and looked around for those they found so few to engage, and the crew of the Arkansas somebody or something else. The order "Boarders" was also instantly passed, and the iron hatches were closed and fastened down, so that it was utterly impossible to land forces and continue the action. The men of the Carondelet were much in the condition of one who attempts to open an oyster, but has neither knife, scissors, nor stone with which to perform the operation. Hide and shield were removed from various loopholes, and hot water and steam were sent forth from the pipes of the Arkansas, while the guns of the rebel continued to play against the comparatively frail sides of the Carondelet. The Carondelet replied with her steam apparatus, and this kind of fighting might have continued till both were exhausted had not the vessels struck bottom, by which the gunboats were lowered, and the Arkansas allowed to drift down the stream, leaving the Carondelet in the shore. To the surprise of those on the latter boat, the Arkansas did not renew the battle, but put on all steam and moved slowly down the river.

The Tyler succeeded in reaching the fleet nearly half an hour in advance of the Arkansas, thus giving a little time to prepare for the reception of the ram. None of the boats had much steam up, though all had fires in their furnaces. Instantly the anchors were made to get the boats ready to manœuvre in case the Arkansas should attempt to run them down.

But two or three were able to move at the time the Arkansas appeared around the bend, though the fires were "forced" as much as possible. The Louisville and Cincinnati succeeded in getting their wheels in motion and hoisting anchor, and the Benton had just swung from her moorings. The CAPE was doing her best, and the RAMS were pressing to perceive the exigencies of the occasion and make ready for an attack. The vessels of Commodore FARRAGUT's squadron lent to quietude, and determined to receive the enemy while at anchor.

As the Arkansas approached she encountered gun-boat No. 6 of FARRAGUT's fleet, carrying one heavy DAHLGREN and two light guns, and a crew of forty of the best. The boat received only a few shots from the Arkansas, as Captain WILLIS ordered his fire, and, sending one ball through the side of the latter, without stopping her engines the Arkansas ran past No. 6, and next encountered the Louisville, which gave her the full benefit of her broadside and bow guns. The Arkansas had by this time reached a position where her shot were effective in every direction, and she used all her guns at the same moment, firing of transports and gun-boat indiscriminately. None of the boats were able to fire more than one gun more than one or two times, and then the way out of reach. Most of the shots were thrown at short range, but many of the rebel projectiles plumed off, while the shells were observed into a thousand fragments by the force of the concussion alone. The Benton, Louisville, and Cincinnati moved as speedily as they could turn in the river, and followed closely upon the heels of the Arkansas.

As the rebel boat passed, the Hartford, Iroquois, and Richmond she received a heavy broadside from each. The Essex, which arrived only a few days since, managed to send two 160-pound shot clear forty through the sides of the Arkansas, causing her to careen fearfully. One of them is thought to have struck near her engine and caused her to lurch badly, as she kept her pump constantly going, and poured a stream of water from her after deck. One of the Richmond's 160-pound Parrott shot is also thought to have gone completely through her. After each discharge of her guns the port-holes of the Arkansas were instantly closed, her sides presenting nothing but a mass of almost impenetrable wood and iron. One of these port-holes was left open for a moment, and a ball from the Benton entered, killing ten men and wounding several others. A shot from one of the boats, at short range, is said to have struck at right angles upon the side of the Arkansas, and rebounded, falling into the water close to the vessel, from which it was discharged.

The Arkansas did not slacken her speed during her perilous progress down the river, but kept steadily forward, firing her guns as she moved ahead. Her speed of motion is not as great as some of her friends have thought, as would seem, her immense weight causing her to draw too much water for rapid movements. Her enormous iron prow is very prominent to view; but she did not attempt to run it upon any of the boats after the first attack. This was probably owing to her slow pace, and it is to her failure in this respect that we are doubtless indebted for the present safety of our boats.

The ram Lancaster, No. 3, at one time started for the Arkansas, intending to run her down; but before getting along far she received three shots, one of which severed her steering-gear, and she was obliged to turn over to the CAPE to be towed, two of them fatally. Notwithstanding the great number of boats opposed to her, the Arkansas succeeded in passing safely through and making the protection of the rebel batteries.

THE NEW COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

We give on the next page a portrait of MAJOR-GENERAL HENRY W. HALLECK, who was appointed on the 11th ult. Commander-in-Chief of the Armies of the United States.

Henry Wager Halleck was born at Weston, Oneida County, New York, in 1820, and is consequently forty-two years of age. He entered West Point in 1835, graduated third in his class, and obtained a commission in the engineers. For a year he served as assistant professor of engineering at West Point. From 1840 to 1845 he exercised his military duties by lecturing; he likewise published one or two important scientific and military works. When the war with Mexico broke out he was in California, and for conduct in skirmishes there in November, 1847, he was brevetted Captain. He was subsequently chief of Commodore Shubrick's staff, Secretary of State of California, and, in 1849, a member of the Convention which drafted the Constitution of the State. He took such a liking to the Pacific coast that in 1854, being then Captain of Engineers, he resigned his rank, studied law, and opened an office in San Francisco. His firm, Halleck, Billings, Hyde, & Co., were very successful at the bar. It is a little curious that one of the first business transactions in which General HALLECK was engaged when he went to St. Louis to command the department of the West, was a pecuniary matter in which he acted as the legal adviser of his old client, Major-General PRIMROSE, when, in effect, he came to supersede.

When the rebellion broke out, General HALLECK was at once summoned from California by the Government, at the instance of General SCOTT, and appointed to the command from which PRIMROSE had been removed, and which General HUNTER had temporarily filled. His administration has been a series of brilliant triumphs. When he arrived at St. Louis the rebels held all Tennessee, most of Kentucky, and three-fourths of Missouri; the Mississippi was blockaded to within twenty miles of Cairo; secession was rampant and loyalty at a discount. General HALLECK began by hanging bridge-burners, which put a stop to the destruction of bridges; he then made the secession sympathizers pay the losses of Union men who had been robbed by the rebels; this put an end to rebel outrages on Unionists and cooled the wealthy traitors of St. Louis. Then moving his armies and his gunboats in a methodical manner, he expelled the rebels from Missouri and Northern Arkansas, took Fort Henry, Fort Donelson, and Island No. 10, compelled the evacuation successively of Bowling Green, Columbus, Corinth, and Cumberland Gap; and now enables his soldiers to rest on their arms during the hot months—having nearly completed the work they were set to do. He has hardly met with a single check since he commenced his operations. So thorough has his work been, that even if the Union armies were to stay where they are and advance no further the rebellion could not survive.

In illustration of General Halleck's character, the Herald tells the following story of his boyhood:

When about sixteen years of age he formed the determination to leave the paternal mansion to his parents, and seek his fortune in the world. After consulting an uncle, who resided in Syracuse, he removed to Hudson, New York, and took board in his family of I. V. Bunnell, and, under the patronage of the aforesaid uncle, commenced his studies at the Hudson Academy, which was at that time conducted by J. W. Fairfield. To conceal his residence from his father, he entered the academy under the name of Henry Wager, and was thus known during his three years' residence in Hudson. He was known as a youth of quick perception and studious habits, acquiring himself with honor in his studies. After finishing his course at this academy, through the influence of the uncle before mentioned he was appointed a cadet at West Point.

His personal appearance is thus graphically sketched:

Major-General Halleck, in personal appearance, is below the medium height, straight, active, and well-formed, and has a brisk, energetic gait, significant of his firm and decisive character. His nose is delicate and well formed, his forehead ample, and his mouth by no means devoid of humor. His eye is of a hazel color, clear as a morning star, and of intense brilliancy. When he looks at a man it seems as though he were going literally to read him through and through. No amount of oily duplicity, no known effrontery, no studied concealment could avail any thing before that keen, penetrating glance. It is no eye to make an ill-regard tremble, and even honest men look about them to be sure they have not been up to some mischief. The profound and implicit confidence in him of all who have had dealings with him is no mystery after seeing what manner of man he is.

Such is his personal appearance, and he does business off hand, is impatient of long stories, and cuts away an officer short in his verbal communication. He evidently has his old ways: he puts on a citizen's dress and walks through the camp. Lately he helped a teamster out of the mud, then gave him a quarter to wear the child more carefully. He laughed heartily to hear the child cry out to the teamster, "Mister, you swore!" The high water in the river is unprecedentedly all but impassable. The teamster had wandered through it, and, having reached the top of the bluff, and being in sight of head-quarters, relieved himself of volley after volley of oaths upon the creek, his horses, the roads, and lastly upon General Halleck for not having the creek bridged. The criticism was just; but the General had already ordered the construction of a bridge, and, being incog., could enjoy the verbal castigation.

General Halleck in the camp and in the field is hardly the same person who might have been seen (previous to 8 P.M. Leaving from the Fleetzer House to head-quarters by 85 Lexington. He does not look a whit more military in uniform, as he looks, in his new and rich though plain civilian dress, very much like a successful clothier. In church he bears a most striking resemblance to some clergymen Methodist parson dressed in regimentals, with a wide, stiff-rimmed black felt hat sticking on the back of his head, at an erratic angle with the ground. His demeanor in front of his tent is very simple and business-like. No pomp, no unusual ceremony, and no lack of order. When on horseback his Western riding seller is more and more prominent. He neither looks like a soldier, rides like one, nor does he carry the state of a major-general in the field, but is the impersonation of the man of peace.

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "HIDE AND SEEK," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER II.

THE tall man who had passed Captain Wragge in the dark proceeded rapidly along the public walk, struck off across the little waste patch of ground, and entered the open door of the Aldborough Hotel. The light in the passage, falling full on his face as he passed it, proved the truth of Captain Wragge's surmise, and showed the manager to be Mr. Kirke, of the merchant service.

Meeting the landlord in the passage, Mr. Kirke nodded to him with the familiarity of an old customer. "Have you got the paper?" he asked; "I want to look at the visitors' list."

"I have got it in my room, Sir," said the landlord, leading the way into a parlor at the back of the house. "Are there any friends of yours staying here, do you think?"

Without replying the seaman turned to the list, as soon as the newspaper was placed in his hand, and ran his finger down it, name by name. The finger suddenly stopped at this line: "Seaview Cottage; Mr. Noel Vanstone." Kirke, of the merchant service, repeated the name to himself, and put down the paper thoughtfully.

"Have you found any body you know, captain?" asked the landlord.

"I have found a name I know—a name my father used often to speak of in his time. Is this Mr. Vanstone a family man? Do you know if there is a young lady in the house?"

"I can't say, captain. My wife will be here directly: she is sure to know. It must have been some time ago, if your father knew this Mr. Vanstone?"

"It was some time ago. My father knew a subaltern officer of that name when he was with his regiment in Canada. It would be curious if the person here turned out to be the same man, and if that young lady was his daughter."

"Excuse me, captain; but the young lady seems to hang a little on your mind," said the landlord, with a pleasant smile.

Mr. Kirke looked as if the form which his host's good-humor had just taken was not quite to his mind. He returned abruptly to the subaltern officer and the regiment in Canada.

"That poor fellow's story was as miserable a one as ever I heard," he said, looking fixedly absently at the visitors' list.

"Would there be any harm in telling it, Sir?" asked the landlord. "Miserable or no—a story's a story, when you know it to be true."

Mr. Kirke hesitated. "I hardly think I should be doing right to tell it," he said. "If this man or any relations of his are still alive, it is not a story they might like repeated to a host. All I can tell you is that my father was the salvation of that young officer under very dreadful circumstances. They parted in Canada. My father remained with his regiment: the young officer sold out and returned to England; and from that moment they lost sight of each other. It would be curious if this Vavasour here was the same man. It would be curious—"

He suddenly checked himself, just as another reference to "the young lady" was on the point of passing his lips. At the same moment the landlord's wife came in, and Mr. Kirke at once transferred his inquiries to the higher authority in the house.

"Do you know any thing of this Mr. Vavasour who is down here on the visitors' list?" asked the subaltern. "If he an old man?"

"He's a miserable little creature to look at," replied the landlady; "but he's not old, captain!"

"Then he is not the man I mean. Perhaps he is the man's son? Has he got any ladies with him?"

The landlady tossed her head, and pursed up her lips disparagingly.

"He has a housekeeper with him," she said, "a middle-aged person—not one of my sort. I dare say I'm wrong; but I don't like a dressy woman in her station of life."

Mr. Kirke began to look puzzled. "I must have made some mistake about the house," he said. "Young there's a lawn cut octagon-shape at Sea-View Cottage, and a white house all in the middle of the gravel walk?"

"That's not Sea-View, Sir! It's North Shingles you're talking of. Mr. Bygrave's. His wife and his niece came here by the coach to-day. His wife's tall enough to be put in a box, and the worst-dressed woman I ever set eyes on. But Mrs. Bygrave is worth looking at if you venture to say so. She's the finest girl, to my mind, we've had at Aldborough for many a long day. I suppose you they and I are talking of the same, captain?"

"No," said Mr. Kirke, with a shade of disappointment on his dark, weather-beaten face; "I never heard the name before."

After replying in these words he rose to take his leave. The landlord vainly invited him to drink a parting glass; the landlady vainly pressed him to stay another ten minutes, and another cup of tea. He only replied that his sister expected him, and that he must return to the entertainment immediately.

On leaving the hotel, Mr. Kirke set his face westward, and walked inland along the highroad as fast as the darkness would let him.

"Bygrave?" he thought to himself; "Now I know her name, how much am I the wiser for it? If it had been Vavasour, my father's son might have had a chance of making acquaintance with her." He stopped and looked back in the direction of Aldborough. "I wonder if I am?" he burst out suddenly, striking his stick on the ground. "I was very sorry last birthday." He turned, and went on again faster than before, with his head down, his resolute black eyes searching the darkness on the look-out for a carriage, and it many a time on the sea from the deck of his ship.

After more than an hour's walking, he reached a village, with a primitive little church and parsonage standing together in a hollow. He entered the house by the back way, and found his sister, the clergyman's wife, sitting alone over her work in the parlor.

"Where is your husband, Lizzie?" he asked, taking a chair in a corner.

William has gone out to see a sick person. He had just time enough before he went," she added, with a smile, "to tell me about you, and your baby; and he declares he will never trust himself at Aldborough, as long as you and your boy are a steady married man." She stopped, and looked at her brother more attentively than she had looked at him yet. "Robert!" she said, laying aside her work, and suddenly crossing the room to him—"you look anxious, you look distressed. William only laughed about your meeting with the young lady. Is it serious? Tell me, what is she like?"

He turned his head away at the question. She took a seat at his feet, and persisted in looking up at him. "Is it serious, Robert?" she repeated, softly.

Mrs. Kirke's mother-beaten face was accustomed to no concealments—it answered for him before he spoke a word. "Don't tell your husband till I am gone," he said, with a roughness quite new in his sister's experience of him. "I know I only deserve to be laughed at, but it hurts me for all that."

"Hurts you?" she repeated, in astonishment. "You can't think me half such a fool, Lizzie, as I think myself," pursued Kirke, bitterly. "A man at my age ought to know better. I have not set eyes on her for as much as a minute altogether; and there I have been, hanging about the place till after nightfall on the chance of seeing her again—skulking, I should have called it, if I had found one of my men doing what I have been doing myself. I believe I'm bewitched. She's a mere girl, Lizzie—I doubt if she's out of her teens; I'm old enough to be her father. It's all one: she stops in my mind in spite of me. I've had her face looking at me through the pitch darkness every step of the way to this house; and it's looking at me now, as plain as I look at your pretty face."

He rose impatiently, and began to walk backward and forward in the room. His sister looked after him with surprise as well as sympathy expressed in her face. From his boyhood upward he had always been accustomed to take the master of himself. Years since, in the failing health of his wife, he had kept his feelings to himself and their support. She had heard of him in the desperate emergencies of a life at sea, but had never heard of his losing command and look to his steady self-possession for rescue from closethreatening death, and had looked in vain. Never in all her life before had his sister seen the balance of that calm and equal mind lost as she saw it now.

"How can you talk so unreasonably about your age and yourself?" she said. "There is not a woman alive, Robert, who is good enough for you. What is her name?"

"Bygrave. What is her name?"

"No; but I might soon make acquaintance with her. Come, you had a little time before us; if I could only get to Aldborough to-night, I'd see her. But you are going away to-morrow; you ship sails at the end of the week."

"Thank God for that!" said Kirke, fervently.

"Are you glad to be going away?" she asked, more and more amazed at him.

"Right glad, Lizzie, for my own sake. If I ever get on shore again I shall find my way back to them on the deck of my ship. This girl has got between me and my thoughts already: she shan't be a girl, further, much longer between me and my duty. I'm determined on that. God as I have sense enough remaining to me, I trust myself within easy hail of Aldborough to-morrow morning. I'm good for another twenty miles of walking, and I'll begin the journey back to-night."

His sister started up, and caught him fast by the arm. "Robert!" she exclaimed; "you're not serious? You don't mean to leave us on foot alone in the dark?"

"It's only saying good-by, my dear, the last thing at night instead of the first thing in the morning," he answered, with a smile. "They and make allowances for me, Lizzie. My life has been passed among men, and I am not used to using my mind upset in this way. Men above are used to it; men above can take it easy. I can't. It's stopped, I shouldn't wonder, if I waited till to-morrow. I should only be going back to have another day's misery. I'm off to-night. I'm more ashamed of myself than I do already. I want to fight my way back to my duty and myself without delay. Don't say any more about it. Darkness is nothing to me—I'm used to darkness. I have not been in bed for two nights, and I can't lose my way. Let me go, Lizzie! The only sweet-heart I have any business with at my age is my ship. Let me get back to her!"

His sister still kept her hold of his arm, and still pleaded with him to stay till the morning. He listened to her with perfect patience and kindness, but she never shook his determination for an instant.

"What am I to say to William?" she pleaded.

"What can he think when he comes back and finds you gone?"

"Tell him I have taken the advice he gave me in his morning sermon, and have turned my back on the world, the flesh, and the devil."

"How can you talk so, Robert? And the boys too—you promised me to be kind to the boys during your holiday."

"That's true. I made my little nephews a promise, and I'll keep it." He kicked off his shoes as he spoke on the mat outside the door. "Light me a candle, Lizzie, Lizzie, I'll see the boys good-by without waking them."

She saw the uselessness of resisting him any longer, and, taking the candle, went before him up the stairs.

The boys—both young children—were sleeping together in the same bed. The youngest was his uncle's godson, and was called by his uncle's name. He lay peacefully with his head in a rough little toy ship hugged fast in his arms, Kirke's eyes rested on the child's face, and on the child's side and kissed him with the gentleness of a woman. "Poor little man!" and the subtler, tenderly; "he is as fond of the sea as I was at his age. I'll cut him out a better one when I come back. He'll make a fine sailor in a couple of these days, Lizzie, and will you let me make a sailor of him?"

"Oh, Robert, if you were only married and happy, as I am!"

"Hush! you has gone by, my dear. I must make the best of it as I am, with my little nephew for there to help me."

He left the room. His sister's tears fell fast as she followed him into the parlor. "There is something so very beautiful in the way he takes to us like this," she said. "Shall I go to Aldborough to-morrow, Robert, and try if I can get acquainted with this young lady?"

"No!" he replied. "Let her be. It's ordered that I am to see that girl again, I shall see her. Leave it to the future, and you leave it right." He put on his shoes, and took up his hat and stick. "I won't overtask myself," he said, cheerfully. "If the conch doesn't overtake me on the road, I'll be in time before I stop to breakfast. Dry your eyes, my dear, and give me a kiss."

She was like her brother in features and complexion, and she had a touch of her brother's spirit—she dashed away the tears, and took her leave of him bravely.

"I shall be back in a year's time," said Kirke, falling into his old sailor-like way at the door. "I'll bring you a China shawl, Lizzie, and a chest of tea for your store-room. Don't let the boys forget me, and don't think I'm doing wrong to leave you in this way. I know I'm doing right. God bless you and keep you, my dear—and your husband, your children! Goodby!"

He stooped and kissed her. She ran to the door to look after him. A puff of air extinguished the candle, and the black night shut him out from her in an instant.

Three days afterward the first-class merchantman Endeavour—Kirke, commander—sailed from London for the China Sea.

CHAPTER III.

THE threatening weather and change passed away with the night. When morning rose over Aldborough the sun was master in the blue heaven, and the waves were rippling gayly under the summer breeze.

At an hour when no other visitors on the watering-place were yet astir the indefatigable Wragge appeared at the door of North Shingles in search of company. He was accompanied, with a neatly-bound copy of Lyon's "Scientific Dialogues" in his hand. Arriving at the waste ground overlooking the sea, he descended to the beach and opened his book. The interview of the pair could be observed by all perceptive of the difficulties to be encountered in the coming enterprise. He was now doubly determined to try the Lyon-Wragge experiment at which he had hinted in his letter to Magdalen, and to constitute himself, in the character of a remarkably well-informed man, the centre of interest and attention of the formidable Mrs. Lecount.

Having taken his dose of ready-made science (to use his own expression) the first thing in the morning on an empty stomach, Captain Wragge joined his small family circle at breakfast-time with an appetite worthy of the day. He observed that Magdalen's face showed plain signs of a sleepless night. She made no complaint: her manner was composed, and in other respects perfectly under control. Mrs. Wragge—refreshed by undisturbed conscience-sleep and uninterrupted repose—was in excellent spirits, and up at heel (for a wonder) with both shoes. The captain himself, ready to appease the hunger-shoes of tissue paper, cut crisply into mysterious and unctuous rashers, which immediately provoked from her husband the shrewd answer-question, "What have you got there?"

Mrs. Wragge was in the habit of keeping, in timidly conciliating tones, "I went shopping in London, and bought an Oriental Cashmere Robe. It cost a deal of money, but it was going to try and save by making it myself. I've got the pattern, and the dress-making directions written out plain as print. I'll be very tidy, captain; I'll keep in my own corner, if you'll please to give me room; and whether it's Jane Buzzes, or whether it don't, I'll sit straight at my work all the day long."

"You will do your work," said the captain sternly, "when you know who you are, who I am, and why you're here. Not before. Show me your shoes! Good. Show me your cup! Good. Finish the breakfast."

When breakfast was over Mrs. Wragge received her orders to retire to an adjoining room, and to read aloud to herself her husband's own favorite author as soon as her back was turned Captain Wragge's voice resumed the conversation which had been suspended by Magdalen's own desire, on the preceding night. The questions he now put to her referred to the subject of her visit in disguise to Noel Vanstone's house. They were the questions of a thoroughly disciplined man—close, searching, and straight to the point. In less than half an hour's time he had made himself acquainted with every incident that had happened in Vauxhall Walk.

The conclusions which the captain drew after gaining his information were clear and easily stated.

On the adverse side of the question, he expressed his conviction that Mrs. Lecount had certainly detected her visitor to be disguised; that she had secretly felt the strongest suspicion of her identity; that she had purposely concealed Magdalen's identity, that she had, in her own person, defy the housekeeper's closest scrutiny, to be the master of possession on her concerned. The difficulty of deceiving Mrs. Lecount was, as well as her eyes, was, he readily admitted, not at all to be disposed of. But looking to the fact that Magdalen, on both the occasions when she had forgotten herself, had spoken in the heat of anger, it was of opinions that her voice had every reasonable chance of escaping detection if she carefully avoided the outbursts of temper for the future, and spoke in the most unnatural and ordinary tones which Mrs. Lecount had not yet heard. On the whole, the captain was inclined to pronounce the prospect hopeful if one serious obstacle were cleared away at the outset—that obstacle being nothing less than pressure on the scene of action of Mrs. Wragge.

To Magdalen's surprise, when the course of her narrative brought her to the story of the ghost, Captain Wragge listened with the air of a man who was more annoyed than amused by what he heard. When she had done, he plainly told her that her unlikely meeting on the stairs of the lodging-house with Mrs. Wragge was, in his opinion, the most serious of all the accidents that had happened in Vauxhall Walk.

"I can deal with the difficulty of my wife's inquisitiveness," he said, "as I have often dealt with it before. I can hammer her new identity into her head, but I can't hammer the ghost out of it. We have no security that the woman in the gray cloak and poke bonnet may not come back on their residence here, and the most critical time under the most awkward circumstances. In this English, my dear girl, Mrs. Wragge is a pitfall under your feet at every step we take."

"If we are aware of the pitfall," said Magdalen, "we can take our measures for avoiding it. What do you propose?"

"I propose," replied the captain, "the temporary retirement of Mrs. Wragge, looking simply in a pecuniary point of view, I can't afford a social separation from her. You have often read of very poor people being comfortably relieved by legacies reaching them from remote and unexpected quarters? Mrs. Wragge's case, when I married her, was one of those. An elderly female relative left the favors of fortune on that occasion with my wife; and if I don't keep up domestic appearances, I happen to know that Mrs. Wragge will procure a second legacy probably to me on that elderly relative's death. But for this circumstance I should probably long since have transferred my wife to the care of a society at large, in the agreeable conviction that if I didn't suppress her existence she would do it. Although I can't afford to take this course, I see no objection to having her comfortably boarded and lodged out of the way for a few days. Leaving me at a retired farm-house, in the character of a lady in affliction, for instance. You would find the expense trifling; I should find the relief unspeakable. What do you say? Shall I pack Mrs. Wragge off, and take her place in the next coach?"

"No," replied Magdalen, firmly. "The poor creature's life is hard enough already; I won't help to make it harder. She was affectionately kind to me when I was ill, and I think I won't allow her to be shut up among strangers while I am well. The risk of keeping her here is only one risk more, Mr. Wragge," said Captain Wragge, if you won't."

"Think twice," said the captain, gravely, before you decide on keeping Mrs. Wragge."

"Once is enough," returned Magdalen, "after what I have just seen of her."

"Very good," said the captain, resignedly. "I will undertake to keep her out of your sight. But I have a word to say on my own behalf. If my services are to be of any use to you, I can't afford to be starved while I am at sea. Understand, I won't trust my wife and Mrs. Lecount together, if I can help it. I will be sent; and I make it a condition that if Mrs. Wragge is to stay here she keeps her room. If you think her health requires exercise, you must let her go out in a hackney-coach; it is too important to be trifled with. What do you say—now?"

"I say yes," replied Magdalen, after a moment's consideration, "on the understanding that I am to have the last word to say in the process."

Captain Wragge bowed, and recovered his suavity of manner. "What are our plans?" he inquired. "Shall we start our enterprise this afternoon? Shall we begin with your introduction to Mrs. Lecount and her master?"

"Quite ready."

"Good again. We will meet them on the Parade at their usual hour for going out—two o'clock. Mrs. Wragge will be in her own room before me—just time enough to fit my wife into her new Skin. The process is absolutely necessary to prevent the unfortunate woman from a servant. Don't be afraid about the results; Mrs. Wragge has had a wonderful variety of assumed names hammered into her head in the course of her matrimonial career. It is merely a question of hammering the last impression once more. I think we have settled every thing now. Is there any thing else? Any last words to-day? Have you any employment for the morning?"

"No," said Magdalen. "I shall go back to my own room and try to rest."

"You had a disturbed night, I am afraid?" said the captain, politely opening the door for her.

"I fell asleep once or twice," she answered, carelessly; "but I suppose my rest was ill-timed, shaken. The bold black eyes of that man who stared so rudely at me yesterday evening seemed to be looking at me again in my dreams. If we see him to-day, and if he annoys me any more, I must request you to speak to him. We will meet here again at two o'clock. Don't be hard with Mrs. Wragge; teach her what she must learn as tenderly as you can."

With those words she left him and went up stairs.

She lay down on her bed with a heavy sigh and tried to sleep. It was useless. The dull weariness of body which she would willingly have won not the weariness which finds its remedy in repose. She rose, and sat down by the window, looking out listlessly over the sea.

A weaker nature than hers would not have felt the shock of the encounter as she had felt it—as she was feeling it still. A weaker nature would have found refuge in indignation, and comfort in tears. The passionate strength of Magdalen's love clung desperately to the sinking wreck of its one delusion—would not disturb herself from it by main force of will. All that her nature could do for the man she had wrong could do, was to shame her from dwelling on the thoughts which still caught their breath of life from the undying devotion of the past; which cill perversely sacrificed Frank's heartless fare-well to any other but the inborn baseness of the man who had written it. The woman never lived yet who could cast a true love out of her heart because the object of it was unworthy of her. All she can do is to struggle with it in secret—to sink in the contest, if she is weak; to win her way through it, if she is strong, by a process of self-laceration which for all moral remedies applied to a woman's nature, the most dangerous and the most desperate, of all moral changes the change from love to hate is the most dark.

Mrs. Lecount was not strong enough to struggle through the struggle, and the issue of it had left her what she now was.

After sitting by the window for nearly an hour—her eyes looking mechanically at the view, her mind empty of all impressions, reflections, and of thoughts—she shook off the strange waking torpor that possessed her, and rose to prepare herself for the serious business of the day.

She went to the wardrobe, and took down from the peg her two dresses—a handsome one, which had been made for summer wear at the Comte Raven's a year since, and which had been one of the little articles that she was to have carried with her other possessions. After placing these dresses side by side on the bed, she looked at the wardrobe once more. It only contained one other summer dress—the plain alpaca gown which she had worn during her interview at Perivale with Noel Vanstone and Mrs. Lecount. This she left in its place, resolving not to wear it up from any part that the housekeeper could require a pattern too quiet to be noticed, and too common to be remembered. She was quite conscious that it was neither gay enough nor becoming enough for the purpose. After taking up a plain white muslin collar, a pair of large gilt gloves, and a garden-hat of Panama straw from the drawers of the wardrobe, she laid it, and put the key carefully in her pocket.

Instead of at once proceeding to dress herself, as she might have done, she now began another exercise which she wore, and yet inconsistently enough, which she could not forbear from practising when in a hurry, with a reckless laugh; "I am equally worthless in my own estimation, whatever I put on." She shuddered, with the instinct of her own laughter had startled her, and deeply caught up the dress which lay nearest to her hand. It was a colors were blue and white, the shade of blue which best suited her fair complexion. She hurriedly put the dress on, before she gave hear her looking-glass. For the first time in her life she shrank from meeting the reflection of herself, except for a moment, when she arranged her hair under her garden-hat, before the glass in the hall. Hitherto, she could not surf over her shoulders, and fitted on her face, with her back to the toilet-table. What! afraid?" she asked herself, feelingly sensitive that she was turning pale. "The rouge is still left in my box. I can't make a very fine show than it is already." She looked round to-ward its glass, and again turned away from it. "I am afraid," Mrs. Lecount repeated, more to well as her master. No paint." After ing her watch, she left the room and went down more quickly. It wanted ten minutes past two o'clo'clock.

Captain Wragge was waiting for her in the parlor—respectable in a frock-coat, a stiff summer cravat, and a high white hat; speckless and cheerfully calm. He was a half-smoked grey cheroot, and gaiters to match. His collar was higher than ever, and he carried a brass cane-stool in his hand. Any tradesman in Perivale who had seen him at that moment would have trusted him on the spot.

"Charming!" said the captain, paternally surveying Magdalen when she entered the room, "so fresh and cool! A little too pale, my dear, and a great deal too serious. Otherwise perfect. Try if you can laugh."

"When the time comes for smiling," said Magdalen, bitterly, "trust my dramatic training for any change of face that may be necessary. Where is Mrs. Wragge?"

Mrs. Wragge had learned her lesson," replied the captain, "and is rewarded by my permission to sit at work in her own room. A sanction her fancy for dress-making, because it is sure to shortly all her attention and to keep her at home. There is no fear of Mrs. Wragge and Samuel Rolle in a hurry, for there is no mistake the process of making it which she is not to consult. She will sit industriously at work in the garden the expression—like a hen over a chicken. I assure you we have no reason to sorrow. Nothing could be more convenient under the circumstances."

He strutted away to the window, looked out, beckoned to Magdalen to join him. "There he said, and pointed to the parade.

Mr. Noel Vanstone slowly walked by as she spoke, dressed in a complete suit of old-fashioned mourning. It was apparently not at all to him that the state of his health was at the worst. He leaned on Mrs. Lecount's arm, and looked protected from the sun by a light umbrella which he held over him. The housekeeper—in her best dress, as usual, in a rich black silk—moved with consummate solemnity, a black mantilla, an astonishing white bonnet, and a crisp blue veil. She screened her invalid master with the kindest attention: sometimes directing his notice re-ently to the various objects of the sea-view, sometimes bending her head in graceful acknowledgment of the courtesy of passing strangers on parade who stopped aside to let the invalid by. She produced a visible effect among the idlers on the beach. They looked after her with unanimous interest, and exchanged confidential nods of approval, which said as plainly as words could have expressed it—"A lady and gentleman, every inch a truly superior woman!"

Captain Wragge's part-colored eyes followed Mrs. Lecount with a steady, distrustful attention. "Tough work for us there," he whispered in Magdalen's ear; "tougher work than you think, before we turn that woman out of her place."

"Wait," said Magdalen, quietly. "Wait, and see."

She walked to the door. The captain followed her without making any further remark. "I'll wait till you're married," he thought to himself, "not a moment longer, offer me what you may."

At the bottom of the stairs Magdalen stopped him again:

"We will go that way," she said, pointing southward; "then turn, and meet them as they come back."

Captain Wragge signified his approval of the arrangement, and followed Magdalen to the sea-beach. As she opened it to pass through the garden-wicket, she was startled by a little nursery-maid and two little boys behind her, who had come out on the same errand. Instantly the lady started, looked eagerly, and smiled to herself as Magdalen came out. Curiosity had got the better of Kirkes's misery, and she had come to Aldborough for the express purpose of seeing Miss Bygrave.

Something in the shape of the lady's face, something in the expression of her dark eyes, reminded Magdalen of a woman whose image she once unconfirmed admiration had annoyed her on the previous evening. She instantly returned the stranger's scrutiny by a frowning, ungracious look. The lady colored, paid the nurse-maid a shilling, and walked away. Miss Bygrave was left to ponder over the question and answers plainly.

"A hard, bold, bad girl," thought Kirke's sister. "I wonder what she is thinking of to admire her? I am almost glad he is going to hope and trust he will never set eyes on Miss Bygrave again."

"What boors the people are here!" said Magdalen to Captain Wragge. "That woman was quite rude enough to stare at me, and to make him in the face. I wonder who she is?"

"I say!" said the clergyman's wife and the captain's sister. "Where's the woman to-day?"

"Oh his way to London, I should think, Sir. His doctor has sent him for change of air to China! As that one word passed the man's lips a pang of the old sorrow struck Magdalen to the heart. She turned away, to hide from her companion the bare mention of the merchant-captain's name. The remembrance of the events of the past night; and now, when she was most desperately and recklessly bent on forgetting her old homesick misery, it had been the immediate cause of recalling her friend to Frank.

"Come!" she said angrily to her companion. "What do we care about the man or his ship? Come away!"

"By all means," said Captain Wragge. "As long as we don't find friends of the Bygraves, what do we care about the rest of the world?"

They walked on southward for ten minutes or more; then turned and walked back again to meet Noel Vanstone and Mrs. Lecount.

JOHN MORGAN, THE HIGHWAYMAN OF KENTUCKY.

THE BANDIT MORGAN.

WE give herewith a portrait of the guerrilla and bandit, JOHN MORGAN, of Kentucky. This man was a well-to-do planter in Kentucky when the war broke out. Having predatory instincts, he collected together a band of dare-devil vagabonds, proclaimed himself their captain, and commenced the life of a guerrilla chief. He has distinguished himself by burning bridges, tearing up railway tracks, robbing supply trains, and plundering and wasting the few remaining properous portions of Kentucky. Being well aware of the doom which awaits them if caught, he and his men display the most desperate courage in their encounters with the soldiers and the Home Guards, and thus far none of them have been captured alive. They have just completed a most successful raid through Kentucky, stealing their food, clothing, and other necessaries from the people of whom they claimed to be the friends. John Morgan is said to possess some of the chivalrous qualities of his namesake and prototype, Morgan, the Buccaneer of the Caribbean Sea: they will not, however, save him from being hanged if he falls into the hands of his fellow-citizens in Kentucky. Our portrait of him was made by a prisoner who was lately several days in his hands.

"AUNT CHARLOTTE"—OUR OLD COOK.

WITHIN our lines at Newbern "Aunt Charlotte," whose portrait we give herewith, is one of the institutions. She is an old family cook. When her master and mistress ran away and deserted her, to join their fortunes and their fates with that of rebels and traitors, on the approach of the national forces, and their premises were assigned by General Burnside as the head-quarters of the Sanitary Commission for his division, "Aunt Charlotte" came into the employ of the Sanitary Inspector for the Department of North Carolina, and many a sick and wounded soldier from the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts has had reason to bless the culinary accomplishments of this venerable contraband cook, and to praise the alacrity with which, in times of their greatest need, she exerted her skill to save them from suffering.

On one occasion, soon after the battle, when a steamboat-load of sick and wounded soldiers from the battle-field were unexpectedly landed in Newbern, and found themselves in a sore hall, with no accommodations for the night, without provisions or any appliances for cooking, and too late in the evening for any relief from the ordinary regulation sources—when their aide and devoted surgeon—since a martyr to his professional duties—was almost in despair at the prospect of that night's responsibility, "our old cook" was appealed to, and the alacrity with which she came to the relief, and the unbought zeal which she brought into that night's work should endear her to all whose sympathies are enlisted for the sick and wounded soldier.

By the time comfortable beds had been prepared for their occupation "Aunt Charlotte" had sent over a warm and bountiful supper fit sense forty odd famished and exhausted patients—a supper of those choice materials which the noble charity of Northern ladies has so generously supplied the service through the Sanitary Commission, and which the skill of "our old cook," on that night of wretchedness, served up to our wan and famished soldiers with a mirth and a delicacy of flavor which can only come from an accomplished cuisine, but which all palates, however unsophisticated, can appreciate. The poor soldiers were no less surprised than gratified at such unexpected relief from the sufferings of that wretched day of exposure and hunger. And their expressions of satisfaction, as they quietly dropped off to sleep after their hunger was appeased and their wants attended to, would almost have paid the old slave woman for her long life of toilings. The next morning, and the next night, and a second morning, did this old "colored lady" add to her ordinary day's labor the preparation of suitable food for this whole hospital of sick and wounded soldiers.

AUNT CHARLOTTE.

"Aunt Charlotte" was born in Charleston, South Carolina, but came many years ago to Newbern, and was the slave of one of its wealthiest citizens. She is about sixty-five years old. She has a great deal of character, and follows a thorough, systematic routine of life—always at her post—always reliable. She possesses no mean administrative abilities. She reminds one of an old merchant, habituated to a regular, systematic life, with ability enough to keep all surroundings subordinate to that system. It would seem as if we were to be superseded in her kitchen, she would lose her hold on life, and the whole "darkey" appendage to the domestic establishment would be deprived of its balance-wheel.

SEARCHING FOR REBELS IN A CAVE IN ALABAMA.—SKETCHED BY MR. HOSNER, THIRD OHIO VOLUNTEERS.—[SEE PAGE 525.]

When, therefore, on the first occupation of the premises, she was told that so long as she did right she would keep her place in the kitchen, and receive six dollars a month, the "old lady" appreciated her position at once, and from that day forth, without further trouble to her employer, was secured the proper regulation and deportment of all the servants "on the lot"—men, women, and children—and all who visit them. Whatever ever happens among them to annoy or displease. The household is as well-ordered as if her old mistress were there to direct. In fact, appearances would lead to an inference that the old colored servant had heretofore habitually relieved her mistress of all such direction.

"Aunt Charlotte's" domestic relations are as well-ordered as the household. She has children, grand-children, and great grand-children. Her old husband "Uncle Sam"—a patriarch among men—now almost supernaturated, at the age of seventy-five, is General Burnside's gardener, and is delighting to witness the habitual care which "Old Aunty" takes of this venerable partner of her life and her bosom. At regular as the clock on the wall with his staff, comes in at mid-afternoon from his daily occupation. He invariably finds a meal prepared for him on the kitchen piazza, by the side of a well-scoured deal table. On this "Old Aunty" places before him a plate well filled with the best dishes which she has that day served for her employer's table. But "Old Aunty" is not content to further than supplying the appetite. She shows, maybe, her knowledge of human nature—at any rate, the wisdom of keeping the fountain awake—even after a good dinner; for, by the side of "Uncle Sam's" plate is invariably placed a small measure of corn in the ear. And after his dinner, the old man may always be seen wearing away the late hours of the afternoon in shelling of the corn for the next supper; for "our old cook" allows nothing "on the lot" to suffer for food.

Our sketch is a faithful everyday picture of the old lady, as she wished it taken, in an attitude showing her obedience to the duties of her station.

"Aunt Charlotte" has many virtues that ennoble her profession. And in the industrious performance of her duties in life, and in her attention to her Christian obligations—for she is a devoted churchmember, and regulates her servants by the simple understanding of the precepts of the Bible—she might safely be held up as an example to many who pride themselves on purer blood and a higher scale of existence.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 16, 1862.

IN EARNEST.

THE President has ordered a draft of THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND MEN from the loyal States, in addition to the one forty of three hundred thousand volunteers, which is to come if they are not filled by 15th inst., are likewise to be filled by draft.

The people have received the news with exhilaration. A few craven spirits show signs of alarm; but the immense bulk of the people, including those who are subject to draft, hail the new policy with transport, as being the shortest and the only reliable road to the restoration of the Union and the re-establishment of peace. We must have, at the present time, fully 200,000 men in the field. An additional number of 600,000 will swell our army to the enormous figure of 800,000 effective men, exclusive of negroes. This force will enable us to occupy the rebels into the Gulf of Mexico, even though they should arm every male in their country. We may, therefore, consider the contemplated order of 4th inst. as rendering the victory of the Union a mathematical certainty, beyond all contingency and ground for assurance.

It will be received in our camps on the Mississippi and the James River with feelings which can be easily imagined that are indescribable. Those gallant bands of heroes, whose ranks have been thinned by the enemy's cannon and the fevers of the Chickahominy and the Tennessee, will learn with irrepressible delight that they are at last to be fully reinforced, and enabled to perform the work which they have so nobly begun. Our army in the West will read the order as meaning that Vicksburg is to be taken, the highwaymen who call themselves secessionists bound down and hung, and the navigation of the Mississippi secured beyond all possibility of accident. The Army of Virginia and the Army of the Potomac will discern in it substantial evidence that they are to receive from home the strength which they require to take Richmond, and drive the wretched, lying, swaggering slaveowners beyond Virginia into the swamps of the Carolinas, and eventually to the sands of the Gulf. A distinguished officer of the army of the Potomac, who has been here on public business for several days, could not control his feelings when he read the order, but burst into tears like a child, and, falling on his knees, cried, "Thank God! thank God! The country is saved! saved!"

And we who have staid at home, and died a hundred deaths in spirit at the news of our brave brothers being outnumbered in every fight, and perishing miserably in swamps and torrid sandplains, what shall we say of them? What can we say except to echo the cry of the officer, and thank God that the country is saved at last, and that our rulers have at length learned that a duty of making her superior strength tell in the war, and of leaving nothing hereafter to chance, the policy of drafting and conscription, at discretion becomes indefinite. The North can satisfy SIXTY MORE drafts of 300,000 men each, after supplying the 600,000 now called for. If 300,000 men, who will soon be in the field, should by any accident prove insufficient to subjugate the rebel host, the 600,000—why, it will be a matter of perfect ease to call out another levy of 300,000 or 500,000. The work has got to be done, and we can and will do it.

The effect upon the rebels of our new policy will be worth observing. Those among them who have any capacity of reasoning must now realize that it deprives them of the small chance of success which they derived from the previous feebleness of our military policy and from the division of commands. With all their skill and all their devilish energy they can not hope to cope with 800,000 men. Should such a man as Jefferson Davis must perceive that the cause of the Confederacy is lost. Beauregard, Lovell, and Price will probably come over to some since. If the Southern leaders were wise, they would anticipate the future, and at once take to colonizing, or they would succeed in the escape the consequences of the Confiscation Act. But men engaged in desperate enterprises seldom possess coolness enough to adopt a wise policy at critical moments. The probability is that the rebels will be spurred on by the news of the order of 4th to attempt a grand and bloody slaughter on Washington or Nashville—that they will stake every thing upon the die, and will either succeed in capturing one of the two capitals or lose all, or will utterly ruin themselves in the attempt.

Meanwhile let us not rashly conclude, because the Governments of foreign nations have no presentiment of interfering, that foreign intervention may not suddenly occur. It may come from the iron-foundry in the country, and every ship-yard, that is employed to be filled especially in the construction of the most approved class of iron-clad ships. Until the war ends, let us never stop building. Our foundries and shipyards never stop building. Our foundries and shipyards would not be too much to devote so long a coast line as ours, with its bays and rivers. There is no guarantee that England may not relish against foreign intervention but the certainty of being able to repel it.

The work before us we have to do is immense. But our capacity is still greater. The South has already developed its full strength. Every able-bodied man is in the army. Every weapon in the rebel States is in use. The public revenue is strained to the utmost. Every day increases the difficulty of feeding our armies by long drafting and transporting them. Of us, on the contrary, we may say, with Paul Jones, that we have only just begun to fight. We have a million of 900,000 men who will soon be in the field, a reserve of over 2,000,000 fighting men to fall back upon. Our supply of arms of all kinds is prodigious and daily increasing. Our people are only just awaking to the fact that this is a deathstruggle for them as well as for the rebels. Our means are unlimited, and our public credit stands higher than it did a year ago. After a year's blundering our military machinery is at length at last. We can now transport and feed and clothe and arm an army more easily than we could have done a regiment a year ago. After only a year's playing at war, we have discovered that, in order to beat, subjugate, and keep down 5,000,000 people on their own soil, we must employ every weapon we can find, and enlist in our service every creature and every thing that can assist us—including the 1,000,000 negroes who are ready to take our side.

In the language of gallant General Burnside: "All is right at last to going right: only you must fill up the old regiments!"

GENERAL BUTLER.

THE most amusing reading of the day is the articles in the British journals on General BUTLER. In one article in a leading British paper we find our gallant General described as a "cross raging nature and the law of nations," called a "shabby attorney," a "bully abroad and a lying," "brutal," "licentious," "insolent," and "vulgar;" "a Yankee spy," a "pettifogger," a dealer in "Billingsgate communings," "cruel," "deceit, vanity, and empty boasting" Nearly all the British papers assume, as a matter of undoubted historical certainty, that General BUTLER consigned the "pure and modern maidens and matrons" of New Orleans to the "brutal licentiousness of a Northern soldiery" The fact being, as these writers know perfectly well, that not one single lady in New Orleans has been outraged or insulted, and that no idea of outrage or insult ever existed save in the foul and prurient imaginations of those "guardians of civilization." So far from imitating the conduct of the British soldiery at Badajos, Lucknow, Delhi, Canton, etc.—where every female who could be found was brutally outraged—far from copying the "Booty and beauty" precedent established by the British General PAKENHAM in this very country, Major-General BUTLER of the troops under the command of General BUTLER have so conducted themselves that not a single complaint of wrong has been made, even by a female, though there have been women in New Orleans so forgetful of modesty and decency as to endeavor to provoke outrage by gross and insulting our soldiers, and even by spitting on the coffin of a dead officer of our army.

When the history of the present period comes to be written few actors upon the scene will win more encomium from the historian than General BUTLER. His name has been one of execration, not difficult. He was placed in command of the commercial metropolis of rebeldom, and called upon to deal with a city where about one-third as great as that which fled at his approach. He had to govern a city nine-tenths of whose people had sworn in the most solemn and wise were savagely hostile to him. For ten years before he came New Orleans had been in the hands of speculators, thieves, gamblers, swindlers, and robbers, who had overawed the authorities, and who, under the disorderly period of rebel supremacy, had perpetrated every crime with perfect impunity. For years, the season during which he was to hold New Orleans had been so unhealthy that it was no easy task to keep it. He was worth to spend a week in the place; yet he was to stay here with 5000 or 6000 Northern, unacclimated soldiers. He was involved in the duty of regulating the civil relations of non-combatant rebels toward the Union; of tracing out a path for the administration of the military government in a rebel city; of securing some supplies of sugar and cotton for the North and food for the starving inhabitants; of dealing at once with an extremely factious, treacherous, and rascally gang of foreigners, sympathizers with their rebellion, and claiming the protection of their respective Governments as a cloak for schemes of treason.

The history will decide that General BUTLER'S success in grappling with these unparalleled difficulties was so marked and so brilliant as to excite him the highest admiration of impartial men. For the first time for ten years he has given to New Orleans a good and a strong government. He has put down the Thugs. He has given employment in cleaning the streets to the unemployed workmen, and has thus fed their families and kept them from starving. He will probably demonstrate before the year is out that yellow fever, which has been the scourge of New Orleans, has now only the fruit of neglect and dirt, and that a little Northern cleanliness is an effectual guarantee against it. He has held the reins of government with a firm a hand that neither the traitors within nor the rebels without the city have ventured to attack him. He has reopened the port to Northern trade, and made his auspices Southern cotton and sugar are again largely exchanged for Northern food. He has fought the battle intrigues and consuls, and discomfited them at all points. He has established safe and sound precedents for the administration of military government in conquered cities which will be followed for generations. He has shown infinite promptitude rescued Northern property from the hands of Southern rogues. And at the same time he has not inflicted a single injustice upon the most rancorous of his enemies.

If we had a few more Major-Generals like BUTLER the rebellion would be crushed in short order.

THE LOUNGER.

WHAT NEXT?

At the moment of writing the public mind is in a curious condition of suspense. It is impossible to resemble that of the great and good Wigfall in the midst of our spring victories, who said, with bitter humor, "Nothing will be seen here, but we had heard of no new disaster since dinner.

The nation has been in a torpor of quiet. It is sound, as we sincerely believe, and heartily resolved and fully capable. It has the wish and the power to crush the rebellion. But it must have the conviction that its efforts will be made to tell; that the power which it is willing to use, shall be used to the utmost. The Government, which has hitherto so adequately responded to the averaging of these sentiments, seems not to preserve the harmony with the increased rapidity of that sentiment. The nation is the only loyal part of the nation—and that is the only portion which the Government is to look for guidance—suspects a very decided reluctance to the employment of vigorous measures. And it is just the doubt whether they are to come which keeps it in suspense.

It is a condition which requires some radical shock to disturb it and to rouse the national heart. Of course no one believes that we are about to be victorious state of the public mind. It is not the spirit which secures success, but sullenly forecasts defeat. It is an infinite pity, let it not become a disgraceful shame, that we are in this mood. But what can give us the shock? What can rouse us?

There are but two ways in which it can come. It must be from the enemy or from ourselves.

It may come from the enemy by some desperate movement against the army of the Peninsula or upon Washington. If the rebels should advance with a heavy body of seventy or eighty thousand men through Eastern Virginia, and the nation should see its capital actually threatened by them, if it did not spring to arms a million strong it would be because we have all been mistaken in supposing that we were a brave and patriotic people. The Government would fall, and utter anarchy succeed it.

On the other hand, the shock may come from our own Government by its frank declaration of the actual peril of the country, and by the summons to arms of every loyal and capable man in the land.

The immediate consequence at the North would be the complete relief of the heart pang, the death-grapple with rebellion; we may well know that while he struck at the disease he lay upon the rack of pain. Every one would be compelled to throw himself either entirely or entirely against the Government. At the South society would be disintegrated. In the Northern army the soldiers must inevitably scatter to their various homes. Many of the officers would be now unprofessionally and instantly such news circulating among the slaves. In 1812 they pleaded fear of insurrection as a reason for not conquering Canada; in the war; the white population was too thin.

It is better that this should be done, than that the nation should be destroyed. Then if done, the general levy would be regulated by the national power. Only loyal persons would be invited within our lines and enabled to fight for the Government. Then the Emancipation Proclamation are absolutely necessary for the work who came, and the work the better. The suppression of the rebellion would then be no obstacle but a direct advantage to the circumstances would be utterly hopeless; and the intervention once over, the entire disposition of the freedmen would be a question for subsequent deliberation.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE SEAT OF WAR.

MR. BRADY'S series of card photographs of characteristic and picturesque scenes in every part of the seat of war in Virginia is profoundly interesting. With them in hand, the reader, like the strategist who conducts the campaign at home may almost see the places of which he is talking; may look for ever the brave Kearney fell from the field of Centreville, or stand among the ruins of Mrs. Henry's house at Hill Run where the battle was fiercest: or mass over the soldiers' graves; or look upon any part of the shattered stone bridge where the flight of our army was checked; or walk through Richmond, or sit upon the low, awkward piazza of the old Virginia house in which Johnson had his headquarters just before the battle of Seven Pines: or gaze from Cub Run to the brow of the hill when the brave Hampton Legion fell. Or, without descending to the Peninsula, the strategist at home may see the interior of battery No. 1, at York River, with its huge guns, or Fortress Monroe, or Yorktown, or he may step closer to the works and almost lay his hand upon the new and terrible Parrott pound rifle guns; or move on to the mortar battery at Newport with groups of officers at their posts; or look out upon the broken Alexandria Line from the earthworks through the orchards; or chat with the occasionals in front of Fort Lee and calmly watch Lee Fayette's head-quarters; or pass with amusement through the gateway at Yorktown; or count such rows of glacis in the wonderful works at Fort Ricardson; you may pause before the slave-pen of Price, Birch, & Co., in Alexandria, and cross the Long Bridge to Washington.

The collection has an almost painful interest. The vivid reality of the photographs is a thousand melancholy memories, and the interest is one which will only increase with time. For long after the fortifications and encampments have become grassgrown mounds upon which cattle graze, and long after the brave men whom valor and love for Union are gone, their children will stand pensively among them, and in these magic cards see them exactly as they were when the struggle was at its greatest, the timber just felled and placed, the earth just heaped up, and the very heart pause over it where the most buoyant mind grave as they contemplated the magnitude and character of the work to be done.

A LITTLE COMMON SENSE.

"BUT why," asks an honest man, "why do you people, who engage to manage the Government at any cost, always lurch into the 'slave question?' Why not let slavery take care of itself? It is strangling under the blows that it has dealt. But while honest Union people differ about it, why should we spend every time the war is mentioned? Do you think that slavery is the only fundamental military school that the blacks would be superior soldiers?"

Here is a volley of questions, but the answers are not very difficult.

We say the Government must be saved even at the cost of slavery, because there are a great many who are fighting against it who are devoted to the old Union men, who say that there is one price that we have no right to pay, and that is liberating slaves.

We, too, insist upon letting slavery take care of itself when the Government shall invite every loyal man to its assistance. But those who complain of us are the very ones who insist that slavery shall not take care of themselves, but shall be protected.

We speak of it constantly because every man man in the land knows that the war comes from slavery. And there had been no slavery there would have been no war. To put the Abolitionists cannot it does not help the matter. For what make the Abolitionists? And as long as men are men, just so long, wherever there is a Pro-slavery, there will be an Anti-slavery party. The same sense man knows not only that the war began in slavery but that its present strength is there. Sting that, and the whole rebellion writhes. That fact indicates a policy; and for that reason we hold it before the public mind.

We do not think that slavery is such a wonderful military school, but we do think that if you can make it the interest of four millions of persons among ten million enemies to be your friends rather than indifferent to you, you have taken a very great road to defeating them. It is not the actual military aid of the freedmen themselves, but the immediate effect upon the mind and the army of the rebellion, and the effect upon the great body of loyal men, the immense majority, now with us but that they are not only saving their country but slaying its enemy, which is the conclusive argument for the liberating policy.

We have not all of us always been of this opinion. So long as it seemed to be certain that the insurrection would be suppressed by the army in the field the question was inevitably postponed. But now that the exigency demands the most summary measures, it inevitably reappears.

We debate it and insist upon debating it, as usual in this country public opinion governs, and when you have persuaded that, you have insured reality of policy. To refrain from this step is to abandon public opinion for the reason that you differ from it is only to say that you mustn't try to change it because it is not unanimously with you—a view thing to say. Nobody wishes to go faster than the general public sentiment; but in a discussion in this country, where public opinion is educated and intelligent, whoever outruns it overshoots the mark of useful action. But to persuade them is not to defy or to scorn as the enlightenment and education of public opinion; and to that end a frank and full discussion is always essential.

To suppose that such questions can be left to the course of events, as if there were any course of events independent of human agency, is feeble. That is the course of events but a succession of men applied and controlled by the wishes and the will of men? When the people of this country heartily desire a result the course of events will soon determine that result. Your duty, meanwhile, is to try to make those desire what you believe to be essential to their security. And you don't try so so long as you hold your tongue.

A NEW BROOM.

It can not be denied that the nation is disposed to give a fair trial to every chief military adviser whom the President summons. When Fremont was first retired and General McClellan was called to command him, there was a universal sense of pleasure and satisfaction. We instantly extolled the latter as "the soldier and the leader of hundreds of thousands of veterans" as if he knew how to do it. Epsom was after his long experiences. It was said that he was going to "put down the rebellion" only said, when a sword was given him in Philadelphia, "I know nothing to deserve it." Well, perhaps we replied: it is indeed true that Captain Cesar and Hannibal were charlatans compared with you.

A year has passed, and General Halleck is called to the chief command. He too is received with loving confidence. There are many who think him in order No. 8 cut him off from the sources of information. There are many who think that Prince Beauregard's retreat from Corinth. There are those who ask whether the plan of the Western campaign must be abandoned, and the many forts which have been so scattered concentrated at a commanding points. But whatever these questions and criticisms, there are probably very few men in the country who do not concede to him great military knowledge and a general capacity which is the ablest ally of special science.

He finds a working army in Virginia, known in their foes and are fully capable of maintaining it, and we only say that they may be led with vigor and comprehensive intelligence. No man had ever a clearer chance. The nation waits for its victory and its regeneration. It asks that no blood shall be wantonly too precious to be shed for it. But that blood shall be spared to secure it. If it feels sure that General Halleck's policy is the best for that, it is neither timid nor vacillating, it will give him all the hands and hearts he needs.

A WORD WITH WORKING MEN.

Lincoln was recently at extraordinary statement, that the President of the United States is the only man in the country recommending his subordinates to emancipation. Of course General Lincoln believes that the President without whom they are honorable men in the country, that every honest, capable, intelligent, loyal person shall have employment, and justly pay for it, we have no doubt. But because he is unique in being a man of good practical sense, and that he has especially recommended the employment of some loyal men to the exclusion of others, as their capacities, we have very serious doubts.

The whole weight of practical difficulty in dealing with the slavery question as connected with the war is the Irish jealousy of colored men. Mr. Lincoln's words and the sympathizing press are constantly pulling this wire. "Yes," they say, "that's it. The negro is to be excited at the expense of the Irishman"—or whatever race or color may put it. This is the steady talk of papers, which, as a class, are conducted for the purpose of cherishing this prejudice.

We say the cardinal principle of the Government is its impartiality. It recognizes no distinctions of race, but proposes ultimately to treat them as each other for any class. No man may truly doubt the essential character and intent of the Government from the President, and there is some mistake in the report, which we hope will be corrected before these lines are read.

We will say reasonable man, whether he be an Irishman or not, just consider this: that the slaves are in the South, and have a very strong attachment to their native region; that there is no motive to drive them here; that the climate suits them; that they understand and like labor; that they are not in the least a migratory people; and that the only reason why they come North at all is that they are kept as slaves instead of being hired as laborers at home. When they are free there will not be a single reason why they should wish to leave the South. While they are slaves, of course they will run away whenever they can, and will become the direct rival of Northern laborers. When they are free they will stay where they were born, and where they prefer to live.

A very little common sense goes a great way in considering this question.

A LITTLE CHARITY.

THE war ought to teach us little one lesson, and that is, forbearance—of leaders. We really know so very little. Yet we think we, honestly of plans and purposes, of successes and failures which we can not possibly know, because we have no means of knowing the truth. Common sense, we say, and we say truly, is as good in war as it is in every thing else. But the remark may remain true, and yet not very closely affect the particular point under discussion.

Take our peninsular campaign as an illustration. All who say, yes, say some zealous patriot, that a splendid army went there superbly equipped, and that it is half gone and its deadly peril. Common sense cries that such a thing would.

Yes, so it does if it knows the facts. If it knows what the peninsular campaign was carried out as it was conceived, if it knows why it was undertaken, if it knows the difficulties and dangers of the whole case. But common sense knows none of these things. But common sense will certainly agree that Pilate was a fool when he advised against the battle which was fought and won, and that he who preached him be answered, "Yes, but my counsel is not common sense."

Every story comes to us so beclouded with rumor, so hearsay, and extravagantly stated, that it is only common charity to wait a while until the fog lifts. A general may not be so great as Marlborough, but Marlborough was human, I have the misfortune to be married to the woman."

A person boasting of being able to sing alto, tenor, or bass, was asked which he could and said, "Yes, I know you can sing very high, very low, and very middling."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE NEW LEVIES OF 600,000 MEN.

THE following order, calling for further recruits for the several States, has been issued:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, August 4, 1862.

Ordered, First—That a draft of three hundred thousand militia be immediately made from the militia of the several States, to serve for nine months, unless sooner discharged. The Secretary of War will assign the quotas to the States, and establish regulations for the draft.

Second—That if any State shall not by the 15th of August furnish its quota of the three hundred thousand militia, volunteers authorized by law, the deficiency of volunteers in that State shall be made up by a special draft from the militia. The Secretary of War will establish regulations for the draft.

Third—Regulations will be prepared by the War Department, with the approval of the President, with the object of securing the promotion of officers of the army and volunteer forces according to merit, and especially with a view of preventing the nomination and appointment in the militia of persons unfit for commissioned officers. The regulations will also provide for filling the service of militia companies proposed to be organized.

BY ORDER OF THE PRESIDENT.
EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

The rebel batteries on the south side of James River opened fire at midnight on Hot ship, upon the mail-boat Galena at the mouth of Herring Creek, Captain Jeffers, wounding the first officer and the engineer. Captain Jeffers immediately ran his boat out of range. A shot of our vessels were struck by the rebel shot, but not seriously.

On the 14 August General McClellan threw 600 men across the river, who destroyed woods, houses, and every thing which could afford shelter to the rebels. The expedition went across the river accomplished its purpose without the loss of a man. It took accounts our gun-boats were shelling the houses and the entire shore, within range, down the river.

The army is in fine spirits. General McClellan is busy preparing for the coming attack. A reconnoissance of a body of cavalry and infantry was made on 14, down the Peninsula, between the Williamsburg road and the river pickets. None of the enemy were seen in the course of their advance.

A RECONNOISSANCE TOWARD PETERSBURG.

On the 14th Generals Keyes, Smith, Fitz John Porter, and Sumner made a reconnoissance to within fourteen miles of Petersburg on the road to Hicksford. After this route they met the Thirteenth Virginia Cavalry in line. Our men charged them, and the cavalry broke and fled. Our troops then to their encampment at Sycamore church, ten and a half miles from Petersburg. They again formed, but were not to fight, leaving behind all their tents, camp equipage, and provisions. Our troops built up camp-fires together and burned. The rebels had two horses killed, and their wounded, with two Indian prisoners. Our loss was one killed, after securing the country a short distance from they returned to the river.

WHAT M'CLELLAN WANTS.

General M'Clellan, in a letter to Governor Washburne of Maine, dated July 15, says: "New enlistments should be made to fill up old regiments, rather than to raise new ones. I would prefer fifty thousand recruits for my old regiments to the same number thousand men organized in new regiments."

CHANGE OF THE NEW COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

General Halleck, according to the Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, has completely defined his position with regard to certain matters of importance. He stated to certain prominent citizens of Ohio, and announced them as the views of the statement as they chose, that he was and had been in favor of a thorough cleansing of all the property of rebels, slaves, etc., included. He explained that order No. 3, as published, is right, to apply to any body, blacks or whites; that his theory was that no men not having military leaders in their camps should be allowed to be shot it, and that with the sole purpose of keeping military operations secret as possible that the order was issued. He stated that he had issued orders to M'Clellan to impress and use all the negroes he could get in any way which he can make them useful, and that he was to pay no stipulation as to their freedom. He says there are no orders to return fugitives or rebel masters. These questions belong to the civil authorities. As the rebels had brought on the war, they must bear its burdens with and would not consider them.

THE CAMPAIGN OF VIRGINIA.

General Pope took the command of the army on 29th July. Intelligence from this advance states that no general fight has been made since the advance commenced, and that the rebels have only had small strong reconnoissances making constructed at the front. The rebels in the valley of Orange are supposed to be in the highest spirits, and confident of complete success when they shall attack the army. The reconnoissances appear to be conducted with entire caution on his arrival, but it is said are not disposed to take the risk of offensive. Several of them are being executed outside our lines.

CAPTURE OF ORANGE COURT HOUSE.

Major-General Pope has pushed a reconnoissance in force as far as Orange Court House and captured two cavalry regiments of the enemy, under General Jackson. The rebels had disposed in accordance with their usual tactics. After reconnoitring column, under General Crawford, entered the building and pushed pickets to Orange Court House yesterday and took possession of the town. They were surprised by the appearance of the enemy's cavalry, under General Robertson. Eleven of the enemy were killed by the fire of our skirmishers; sixteen prisoners, one gun caught, two caissons, and two limbers. Our loss was one killed and seven wounded. The rebels retreated in such haste as to leave their wounded in our hands. The railroad and the country also between Orange Court House and Gordonsville was destroyed."

ARE THE REBELS EVACUATING RICHMOND?

Intelligence from General Pope's headquarters, partially confirmed by reports presented each day to Washington, states that the rebels are really evacuating Richmond and taking up a position on the south side of the James River. The cause of the movement is said to be the appearance of a pestilence at Richmond.

UNSUCCESSFUL ATTEMPT TO CAPTURE THE ARKANSAS.

A special dispatch from Vicksburg, on the 23d, records the capture of the rebel ironclad Arkansas in the attempt to capture the rebel ram Arkansas. It appears that the engagement occurred between Commodore Farragut's fleet and the ironclad below was to engage the lower batteries, the first steamers were to engage the upper ones, and the gun-boats Essex and Queen were in the main time to attack the Arkansas as she came down. The engagement was most outstanding only a few shells were fired from the mortars and the Arkansas had no other effect than to fire from the Essex, which attempted to run into the Arkansas and to run her aground. The Arkansas was then attacked and her guns grazed her side. As the pursuit she gave the rebel ram considerable punish ment from her guns. The Arkansas, however, unsuspected she dropped down the river. The Queen, Lieutenant Porter, and the Essex, Captain Stevens, kept her company, but failed to run ashore. Perceiving herself, the Queen ran on to her assistance as to attack the more vulnerable body. Both boats then returned up the river.

REBEL CRAFT ON THE YAZOO.

From Vicksburg it is reported that the rebel fleet of the West, captured some time ago off Galveston by the rebels, is now in the Yazoo, and does a great deal of damage. Six is here-glass to a considerable extent. The Star of the West, recently seized, was also in the Yazoo, and has been plated something in the style of the Sumter. The Confederate steamer Music, which was lost in the Mississippi early during other steamers are said to be from New Orleans. The Music was also captured, and among other rebel plunder, 183 guns.

The Yazoo is a river of great importance to the Confederate rebellion, which is a perfect lock against ascending the river. It is a deep and narrow harbor on shore at that point.

A CUTTER OF A VALUABLE PRIZE.

On the 31st the United States gun-boat Juniata made a valuable capture off Wassaw Sound, Captain Craikshank, from Charleston, South Carolina, bound to Nassau with a cargo of cotton, and having on board Jacksons on the evening of July 31, and put a prize crew on board, and ordered her to New York. The Marguerite is a fine vessel of about 800 tons burden. The cargo consists of 1575 bales of sea-island cotton, and 1000 barrels of rosin.

A REBEL VIEW OF THE BATTLES BEFORE RICHMOND.

A refugee from Richmond states that it was asserted in the Richmond Examiner office in his presence that "General Lee had driven McClellan into the last ditch, and that Richmond was a success. Even the rebels seconded to M'Clellan's movement to the James River.

On the 30th of June the Examiner announced "that we were surrounded, driven into a swamp—McClellan's army was annihilated, and Richmond was safe." The Examiner said, was in his rear, Huger on his left, Hill and Longstreet on his front, and Jackson on his right flank, and the next day it was confidently expected he would be escorted through the streets in a cage. Next day the Examiner had changed, and the Examiner began its dispatches with "Our army is in full retreat." Then the news. The rebels were outgeneraled, and McClellan all right.

SALE OF REBEL RELICS IN AKRON.

Four hundred and eighteen rebel sheets bills, which had been sent to Akron, Ohio, were offered for sale out of General Beauregard, and captured in that city, were sold in Boston on the 30th ult. They weighed fourteen and a half of one hundred thousand pounds, and brought about twenty-four hundred dollars.

REBEL PRISONERS TAKING THE OATH.

It is stated that between four and five hundred of the rebel prisoners confined in Fort Delaware have voluntarily taken the oath of allegiance. The Southern Tigers were the most anxious to return to their loyalty.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

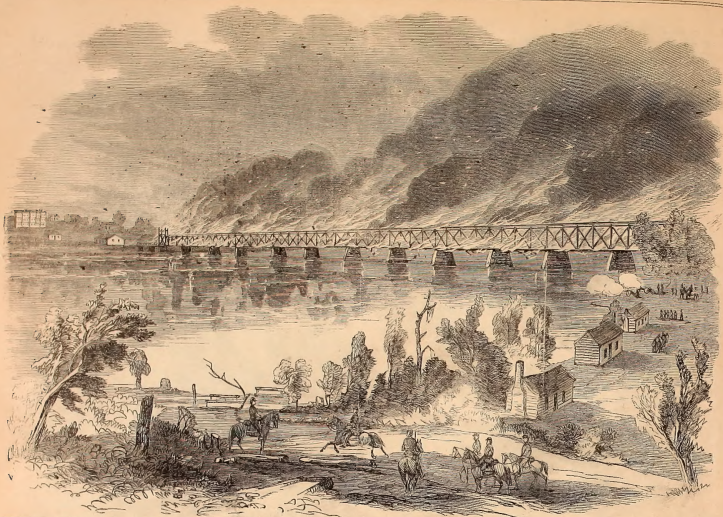
THE MOTION FOR RECOGNITION.

An important debate in the House of Commons of Commons took place on the 24th, on the question of mediation in America. Mr. Gregory moved for the papers on mediation, but after a very full discussion, in which Gregory and Lindsay supported the motion, and Palmerston, Russell, Forster and others on the part of the North, Lord Palmerston withdrew the motion. The debate was a most statesmanlike speech, and he withdrew his motion.

ARCHBISHOP RICHMOND.

A cenotaph, purporting to have come by the Glasgow, announcing the other defeat of General M'Clellan and the probable capitulation of his army, had been circulated in London on the day of the debate, and was generally credited.

THE BRITISH PROVINCES.



A NEWSPAPER-OFFICE MOBBED.

The office of the Montreal Herald, published at St. Stephens, New Brunswick, was mobbed, and the press broken, and the materials in it destroyed. The paper has advocated the Union cause.

WOMAN'S CALL TO THE MEN OF '62.

BUT a little while ago
Went brave heroes from our side,
Eager, longing for the foe—
Many for their country died.
Still that foe is marching on
Where "Old Glory" floats to-day;
Brothers, rouse ye, and begone—
Take our blessing, and away!

We, who looked so frail and weak,
Shrinking at the sight of blood:
Now we've but our word to speak,
Go! and trust your lives with God.
He who marks the sparrow's fall
Guide your footsteps in the fray
Only hear the country's call—
Take our blessing, and away!

Bless'd and honored shall ye be,
If God send you back in peace,
When our country shall be free,
And this dreary warfare cease.
But till honor is secure
Not one moment be your stay!
Prove what freemen can endure—
Take our blessing, and away!

If ye come not back again,
You shall watch us from above—
Calm and steadfast, through all pain,
Worthy of your highest love.
We have vowed a solemn vow
Ne'er to yield to rebel sway:
Only cowards linger now—
Take our blessing, and away!

"FORTUNE FAVORS THE BRAVE."

I.

THROUGH the window of Mrs. Sydney's parlor shone the last rays of the declining sun, and touched with a golden glitter the dark hair of Philip Preston, as he sat waiting the appearance of Miss Sydney.

Presently she entered, with a slight rustling of silk, and coming up to Philip, put a little white hand in his for a moment, and then sat down on the sofa near him.

"What a stranger, Mr. Preston! I'm sure it's as agreeable surprise to see you here," she said.

"You're very kind to say so, Miss Clara."

"And I? Well, indeed, you seem to have been for some time. What in the world have you been doing with yourself? Give an account of your misspent time,—I have a friend who was misspent."

"Any way my absence has not grieved you much," he returned. And he thought he had good reason to say so.

Philip and his friend, Charlie Lenhart, were both in love with Clara Sydney, and she was in love with one of them. But she was a coquette, and so equally had she favored them it was difficult to tell which she preferred. Thus matters stood when, suddenly, Charlie appeared flushed by a fitful, joyous triumph, which he seemed more than half afraid, while Philip was visibly depressed in spirits. Charlie went oftener to call on Miss Sydney, and Philip gradually ceased his visits.

While I have been telling you this Clara had said, in reply, "Well, that must be consoling to your consciences, for, if I had grieved, think how much I should have suffered before you returned to comfort me!"

And she laughed, pleasantly.

"I wonder if she knows she's breaking my heart," thought Philip. "I don't believe she does. How lovely she is!"

This was true.

Clara was dreadfully pretty. She was petite, coy, graceful. Her complexion was a brilliant blending of pearls and roses. Her lips were just the tint of ripe cherries, and her smile was enchanting. Her hair was glossy brown, and her eyes of dark hazel. Her dress of pale blue was very becoming.

Philip gulped down a sigh as he looked at her, and tried to be gay.

He made a lamentable failure.

Then he plunged at once into the business which had brought him there.

"Pardon me if I seem a little hurried, Miss Clara, but I have but a few minutes to stay. I dropped in only to say good-by."

"Good-by! You're not going to leave us?"

"You'll find the lines falling, and pleasant ones, I'm sure, Miss Clara. I hope you will. Yes, I've collected that there's something more for me than wasting my time as I've been doing. I join the army within three days."

"Impossible! You're not in earnest, Philip!—Mr. Preston, you surprise me very much!"

She stooped to pick up her handkerchief; and when she raised her head, after rescuing from the carpet that little heap of cambric and lace, her face was very pale. She was conscious of a grateful feeling for the gathering twilight, and delayed her previous intention of ringing for lights.

"And you leave within three days?" she said. "Your stay with us is brief indeed!"

A silence of some minutes ensued.

Philip felt very uncomfortable.

"I think she might show a little more regret, only for friendship's sake," he thought. "My last visit too—but why should she care?"

He rose with a bitter feeling at his heart.

"Well, I must bid you good-by, Miss Clara."

"You'll wait and see mamma, won't you?

"I'll try to call on Mrs. Sydney again. I'm in great haste."

"Good-by, then. You have my best wishes, I need scarcely say. Pray give my love to your mother."

"I will. God bless you!"

Another moment and she was alone—still standing, nautily gazing at the door whence she had seen him go, her head slightly inclined, as he had dropped it, her lips pale, and her eyes wildly mournful.

A short, sharp cry broke from her.

"Gone! Oh my poor heart! And I may never see him more!"

She caught the hand he had held and raised kisses on it. Then she dropped down on the sofa, and buried her tears and passionate sobs in its satin cushions.

II.

SOON after the departure of Philip Charles Lockhart asked Clara to marry him—asked for that same little hand the absent soldier had pressed, and she had so regretfully ever since.

She refused, almost indignantly. So another lover left her, disappointed and miserable.

And now Clara thought the days very long and weary. Nothing, save the daily papers, seemed to her worth reading. She had been wont to declare that she never could understand how people read the war news with such avidity; but she never missed a single paragraph of it now.

Meanwhile her face grew pale and thin; and her eyes had a wistful expression, as though they had long looked for something and not yet found it. When she heard the news-boys calling "Extras" in the street her heart throbbed wildly, and she could scarcely see to read the accounts of "the last great battle."

III.

SUNDAY—the first day of June.

The gallant soldiers of the Republic, scarce rested from the long fight of Saturday, are once more moving into action. The rebel aquadrons, buoyant and hopeful, are charging down on the brave troops of Heintzelman and Couch.

Triumphant on a sea of blue the Stars and Stripes stream out with the wind. The air is all alive with martial music.

Quick and sharp come the words of command.

The clouds of battle smoke.

Brave hearts and listening ears are thrilled with a terrible delight.

"Charge!"

That clarion cry rends the air into a thousand sounds of battle.

Bayonets that erewhile gleamed like burnished silver are now red and slippery; balls speed on their ravenous thirst is all unslaked, and madly plunging onward they drink up blood in floods.

Faster and faster the morning falls upon on their death-dealing mission.

And sooner grows the smoke—more woeful still the carnage.

That's the loud roar of cannon rushing with thunder-sounding tramp, that's the shock and scream of exploding shell; and that—why that's a brave heart laid low! Some tender mother's only darling.

His last sigh breathed her name—"God help mother!" he said, and died. That one name he'd all shrived and torn, gathered his expiring breath to shout "On boys, on—fight till you die!" He died; never spoke again.

There, to the left, they lie bleeding, and the wounded, undressed horses crop grass still red with the dear old flag. Never again will the little hand that so tightly clutches the round stick strike the sounds of triumph!

But who is that to the right, fighting with such fearful energy?

Though always discharging, his gun seems never unloaded, and his bayonet broken in the middle yet does great service. Who is that heroic man?—whose fat balls back he never retreats—onward, onward, still onward he goes. And now he bleeds! But he still advances.

Who is he?* some one finds time to ask, even in that dreadful hour.

And his neighbor replies,

"He? Why, that's Phil Preston. They say he's under a vow to destroy a rebel for every year in his life. By God! what a pity he's only twenty-five!" And the fighting death before them; on, still on. Oh the glory, the splendid bravery of that wild, rushing charge! And now an exultant shout that fills even the hearts of the dying with joy—for the foe have fallen back. They break—they run!

The victory is ours!

What though the bloody field is yet more thickly strewn with dead—though the list of wounded and dying is increased by hundreds?

The victory is ours!

IV.

"WHAT, Phil, old fellow! is it you? And wounded too!"

Philip Preston, with one arm hanging useless at his side and blood streaming from a cut across his temple, but all undaunted, looks down at the sound of that voice; and if a thrill, a maddening thrill of hope, sweeps to his heart and weakens him more than his wounds and all the fighting of the day, he is too noble—too generous to heed it.

On the next instant he is kneeling beside the dying soldier.

"Charlie—what! You here, Charlie?"

"Yes, Phil. Oh help me to live a few minutes yet! There's something I must tell you, Philip, before I die. You may live to see her again."

And though Charlie can see but one aim now, that's a strong one; for he lifts Charlie Lockhart with a care and tenderness like off toward the rear, where the surgeons are.

V.

PHIL has had his wound dressed, and wears his broken arm in a sling.

The surgeon says it won't amount to any thing if he is careful, and recommends patience.

And Charlie also has improved. The bullet has been extracted from his side, his wounds are slowly healing, and he is doing well.

He isn't going to die this time.

Phil is happy—happy and has, so far, refused to let him talk.

But now that he seems so much better, and declares it will do him good to say what is on his mind, this stern nurse consents.

"I don't see why you're cruel," he says, "as anxious to hear your secret as you are to tell it, Charlie. What happened? Did you and Clara quarrel?"

"Oh no, we didn't quarrel exactly."

"Then what's the trouble?"

"She refused to marry me."

"Eh? Refused? Why, what are you talking about? I thought—"

"Yes, you know what you thought. I tried to make you understand that I had Clara Sydney's promise to be my wife."

"Yes, you did. And—"

"I lied," Charlie interrupted, impetuously—"I lied. Phil, Clara Sydney loves I've said it at last. Yes, dear old fellow! I, Charlie Lockhart, have deceived you. I lied to you, and you, brave as a lion, and true as Heaven, sit there looking at me, unable to comprehend such base cowardice."

"I can only say that your confession is a shock to the honest, upright nature of Philip Preston.

His first impulse was that he had rather have lost Clara than have discovered such treachery in a friend. But that didn't last long.

"Come, Charlie, look at me—give me your hand. I swear on my soul I had sooner have died fifty deaths than to have seen such a look as that on your face. I deserve it, too; but give me your hand, Phil, and try to think well of me."

"I do love you."

"It's over; let it go," he said. "I suppose all's fair in love and war, you know."

"And I was so madly in love with her, Phil. I didn't know what I was doing. I only felt capable of loving her, and determined to win her. I lost her. Forgive me, Phil; you can afford to, for she's yours now."

"How? Mine? What makes you think that?"

"Well, you know we always agreed that she loved one of us. I would have been fairer to have asked her which, and given her the choice, but I didn't dare to do that. Once, again, there was a time when I felt persuaded I was the favorite. If I could only dispose of you I felt sure of her. The moment she knew that she had already given me her promise, and you know the result. But from the manner of her refusal of my offer, and the way she took your departure, I am convinced that she loves you, and only wants to be asked to tell you so."

"If I could only be sure of this, Charlie."

"I feel sure enough to make affidavit of it without any particular conscientious pang."

"If that be true! Charlie, why, Charlie, you're a perfect blessing. But I'm sorry for your disappointment."

"Oh, don't mind me. I don't feel so very bad now I sit over. Some pretty girl will display better taste than your Clara," he added, laughing! "Come, don't get out of the war alive. I may, what's matter? I die a glorious death, and my mother will weep for her boy."

VI.

STILL Clara read the war news. She had read it so long, and he had escaped so often, she began to hope he bore a charmed life and would escape altogether.

He would return some time—the then list would come, sure and thin; yes, he would return and claim her.

The roses came slowly back to her cheeks, the thin face rounded again, the bright hope of a young heart revived over her.

Her imagination swept forward to the day when he would return.

She caught herself thinking how he would stand before her some day a sun-burnt hero, and say at last that he had waited long to hear,

"Clara, I love you!"

The sentence of the morning paper woke her from some such morning dream one day, and she read of that famous battle of Fairoaks, where brave Philip and the brave captains did such wonders.

With a palpitating heart—for she knew his regiment had been there—she hunted for the list of wounded.

Thank God! His name was not there.

But a more terrible list is yet unlooked at.

She sickened at the thought of finding his name in it.

No, she wouldn't look—because it couldn't—oh it could not be there.

Then why need she fear to look? One struggle —one effort of those cowardly eyes, and then her heart would beat calmly, peacefully again.

Quickly she scans the dreadful column—reaches freely a great sigh of relief—then a sob, a gasp, a thrill of anguish, and three words are graven on her heart.

"Philip Preston, killed."

Could she have died in that dreadful throe of agony—could she have fainted even—it would have been a relief respite.

But she couldn't die, and she never fainted.

And there lay the paper—three words standing out like fire, and scorring her brain—

"Philip Preston, killed."

Then a deathly feeling of sickness came over her, and the light died out of her eyes—the color from her cheeks and lips.

What a weary, weary waste lay all before her! She used to feel her pulse and place her hand over her heart. Then she sighed that she had so many, many years to live; for she was young, and though the pulse was languid and heavy, and the heart ached, it was with a dull pain, like old health and latent strength were in them both.

Three weeks had dragged along—Clara hardly knew how—when tidings came more longer than the whole nineteen years that had preceded them.

Again she sat in the parlor in the gathering twilight—alone.

She was holding her little hand up before her, and sadly wondering to think how little it was—so different from the pretty white hand she had put in Philip's as he left her.

"A gentleman to see you, Miss Clara."

The gentleman entered, and the servant went away.

Clara looked up languidly. She cared nothing about seeing people now.

There he stood before her—in his handsome uniform and epaulets; his face sun-browned and his left arm in a sling.

She had uttered no cry at the announcement of his death; but now she shrieked aloud.

"Philip, Philip! Not dead—not dead! Alive, and here with me again. Alive, and I see you once more, Philip, Philip!"

Away all forms of etiquette—away all polite, conventional phrases.

Her whole heart spoke in her words, and before she realized what she had said his arm was around her, he was kissing the trembling lips and the tender words that rushed from his lips had called into life those such a color as had not graced it for twelve months.

Wasn't it worth one bitter disappointment to feel those words ringing about him, those warm lips on his own, that little hand smoothing his hair so fondly?

Philip thought so.

"And how came that awful announcement, Philip?" Clara, shuddering at the recollection.

"Did you see that, dear? I hoped you hadn't seen it. It was a mistake. One of ours—Philip Preston—was killed, and the similarity of names misled the blunder."

"Oh, Philip!"

Clara was crying softly.

"What is it, dearest?"

"Nothing—I don't know; but I am so happy. Dear, dear Philip!"

MIRIAM, THE WIFE OF BROWN.

SAT sat by her parlor window—
Miriam, the wife of Brown—
Her eyes wandered over her carpet,
Where roses and lilies and pinks just run down.

She looked at her chairs and pictures,
At her various trifles and toys;
There was no one to disarrange them,
She had no girls and boys.

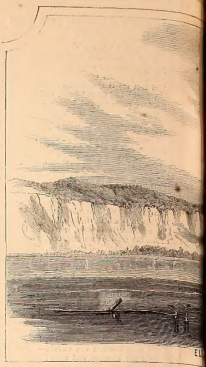
She thought of their pleasant dwelling,
Of the snug sum laid away;
And her small but generous style and study,
"We've enough for a rainy day."

Her thoughts described a circle
Whose radius was several feet;
And within it no dying soldier
And her sympathies could meet.

A step falls quick on the hall—dead—
"Tis husband! but why's he here?"
"Wife, will there's a call for soldiers—
I believe I shall volunteer."

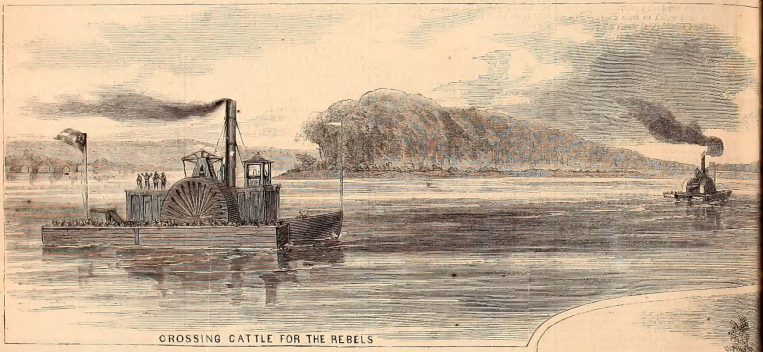
"No, never, never!" she answered;
"We've enough, and you shall not go;
There are plenty of others besides you
Who can much better, I know."

There were tears on her long dark lashes—
"I'll give it up!" said he;
"So weep no more, gentle Miriam,
For the thing shall never be."



There are numberless Miriams scattered
Up and down in our country towns;
And among our should-be defenders
May be counted a plenty of Browns.

Oh woman! stand forth in your weakness,
Look upward and learn to be strong;
Bid your loved ones go forth to their duty,
And trust Him whose mercies are ever the same.



God calls as He never has called us—
Shall we turn with irreverence away?
Shall we let the foe fall for the many?
Then shame on the men of to-day!

CHAPTER IV.

Captain Wragge and Magdalen retraced their steps until they were again within view of North Shingles Villa before any signs appeared of Mrs. Lecount and her master. At that point the housekeeper's lavender-colored dress, the umbrella, and the feeble little figure in nankeen walking under it, became visible in the distance. The captain slackened his pace immediately, and issued his directions to Magdalen for her conduct at the coming interview in these words:

"Don't forget your smile," he said. "In all other respects you will do. The walk has improved your complexion, and the hat becomes you. Look Mrs. Lecount steadily in the face; show no embarrassment when you speak; and if Mr. Noel Vanstone pays you pointed attention, don't take too much notice of him while his housekeeper's eye is on you. Mind one thing! I have been at Joyce's Scientific Dialogues all the morning, and I am quite serious in meaning to give Mrs. Lecount the full benefit of my studies. If I can't contrive to divert her attention from you and her master, I won't give sixpence for our chance of success. Small-talk won't succeed with that woman; compliments won't succeed; jokes won't succeed; ready-made science may recall the deceased Professor, and ready-made science may do. We must establish a code of signals to let you know what I am about. Observe this camp-stool. When I shift it from my left hand to my right, I am talking Joyce. When I shift it from my right hand to my left, I am talking Wragge. In the first case, don't interrupt me—I am leading up to my point. In the second case, say any thing you like; my remarks are not of the slightest consequence. Would you like a rehearsal? Are you sure you understand? Very good—take my arm, and look happy. Steady! here they are."

The meeting took place nearly midway between Sea-View Cottage and North Shingles. Captain Wragge took off his tall white hat, and opened the interview immediately on the friendliest terms.

"Good-morning, Mrs. Lecount," he said, with the frank and cheerful politeness of a naturally sociable man. "Good-morning, Mr. Vanstone; I am sorry to see you suffering to-day. Mrs. Lecount, permit me to introduce my niece—my niece, Miss Bygrave. My dear girl, this is Mr. Noel Vanstone, our neighbor at Sea-View Cottage. We must positively be sociable at Aldborough, Mrs. Lecount. There is only one walk in the place (as my niece remarked to me just now, Mr. Vanstone), and on that walk we must all meet every time we go out. And why not? Are we formal people on either side? Nothing of the sort—we are just the reverse. You possess the continental facility of manner, Mr. Vanstone—I match you with the blunt cordiality of an old-fashioned Englishman—the ladies mingle together in harmonious variety, like flowers on the same bed—and the result is a mutual interest in making our sojourn at the sea-side agreeable to each other. Pardon my flow of spirits; pardon my feeling so cheerful and so young. The Iodine in the sea-air, Mrs. Lecount—the notorious effect of the Iodine in the sea-air!"

"You arrived yesterday, Miss Bygrave, did you not?" said the housekeeper, as soon as the captain's deluge of language had come to an end.

She addressed those words to Magdalen with a gentle, motherly interest in her youth and beauty, chastened by the deferential amiability which became her situation in Mr. Noel Vanstone's household. Not the faintest token of suspicion or surprise betrayed itself in her face, her voice, or her manner while she and Magdalen now looked at each other. It was plain at the outset that the true face and figure which she now saw recalled nothing to her mind of the false face and figure which she had seen in Vauxhall Walk. The disguise had evidently been complete enough even to baffle the penetration of Mrs. Lecount.

"My aunt and I came here yesterday evening," said Magdalen. "We found the latter part of the journey very fatiguing. I dare say you found it so too?"

She designedly made her answer longer than was necessary for the purpose of discovering, at the earliest opportunity, the effect which the sound of her voice produced on Mrs. Lecount.

The housekeeper's thin lips maintained their motherly smile—the housekeeper's amiable manner lost none of its modest deference; but the expression of her eyes suddenly changed from a look of attention to a look of inquiry. Magdalen quietly said a few words more, and then waited again for results. The change spread gradually all over Mrs. Lecount's face; the motherly smile died away; and the amiable manner betrayed a slight touch of restraint. Still, no signs of positive recognition appeared; the housekeeper's expression remained what it had been from the first—an expression of inquiry, and nothing more.

"You complained of fatigue, Sir, a few minutes since," she said, dropping all further conversation with Magdalen, and addressing her master. "Will you go in-doors and rest?"

The proprietor of Sea-View Cottage had hitherto confined himself to bowing, simpering, and admiring Magdalen through his half-closed eyelids. There was no mistaking the sudden flutter and agitation in his manner, and the heightened color in his wizen little face. Even the reptile temperament of Mr. Noel Vanstone warmed under the influence of the sex: he had an undeniably appreciative eye for a handsome woman, and Magdalen's grace and beauty were not thrown away on him.

"Will you go in-doors, Sir, and rest?" asked the housekeeper, repeating her question.

"Not yet, Lecount," said her master. "I fancy I feel stronger; I fancy I can go on a little." He turned, simpering, to Magdalen, and added in a lower tone, "I have found a new interest in my walk, Miss Bygrave. Don't desert us, or you will take the interest away with you."

He smiled and smirked in the highest approval of the ingenuity of his own compliment—from which Captain Wragge dextrously diverted the housekeeper's attention by ranging himself on her side of the path and speaking to her at the same moment. They all four walked on slowly. Mrs. Lecount said nothing more. She kept fast hold of her master's arm, and looked across him at Magdalen with the dangerous expression of inquiry more marked than ever in her handsome black eyes. That look was not lost on the wary Wragge. He shifted his indicative camp-stool from the left hand to the right, and opened his scientific batteries on the spot.

"A busy scene, Mrs. Lecount," said the captain, politely waving his camp-stool over the sea and the passing ships. "The greatness of England, ma'am—the true greatness of England. Pray observe how heavily some of those vessels are laden! I am often inclined to wonder whether the British sailor is at all aware, when he has got his cargo on board, of the Hydrostatic importance of the operation that he has performed. If I were suddenly transported to the deck of one of those vessels (which Heaven forbid, for I suffer at sea!), and if I said to a member of the crew, 'Jack! you have done wonders; you have grasped the theory of floating vessels'—how the gallant fellow would stare! And yet on that theory Jack's life depends. If he loads his vessel one-thirtieth part more than he ought what happens? He sails past Aldborough, I grant you, in safety. He enters the Thames, I grant you again, in safety. He gets on into the fresh water, as far, let us say, as Greenwich; and—down he goes! Down, ma'am, to the bottom of the river, as a matter of scientific certainty!"

Here he paused, and left Mrs. Lecount no polite alternative but to request an explanation.

"With infinite pleasure, ma'am," said the captain, drowning in the deepest notes of his voice the feeble treble in which Mr. Noel Vanstone paid his compliments to Magdalen. "We will start, if you please, with a first principle. All bodies whatever that float on the surface of the water displace as much fluid as is equal in weight to the weight of the bodies. Good! We have got our first principle. What do we deduce from it? Manifestly this: That in order to keep a vessel above water it is necessary to take care that the vessel and its cargo should be of less weight than the weight of a quantity of water—pray follow me here!—of a quantity of water equal in bulk to that part of the vessel which it will be safe to immerse in the water. Now, ma'am, salt water is specifically thirty times heavier than fresh or river water; and a vessel in the German Ocean will not sink so deep as a vessel in the Thames. Consequently, when we load our ship with a view to the London market, we have (Hydrostatically speaking) three alternatives. Either we load with one-thirtieth part less than we can carry at sea; or we take one-thirtieth part out at the mouth of the river; or we do neither the one nor the other, and, as I have already had the honor of remarking—down we go! Such," said the captain, shifting the camp-stool back again from his right hand to his left, in token that Joyce was done with for the time being—"such, my dear madam, is the theory of floating vessels. Permit me to add, in conclusion, you are heartily welcome to it."

"Thank you, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount. "You have unintentionally saddened me, but the information I have received is not the less precious on that account. It is long, long ago, Mr. Bygrave, since I have heard myself addressed in the language of science. My dear husband made me his companion—my dear husband improved my mind as you have been trying to improve it. Nobody has taken pains with my intellect since. Many thanks, Sir. Your kind consideration for me is not thrown away."

She sighed with a plaintive humility, and privately opened her ears to the conversation on the other side of her.

A minute earlier she would have heard her master expressing himself in the most flattering terms on the subject of Miss Bygrave's appearance in her sea-side costume. But Magdalen had seen Captain Wragge's signal with the camp-stool, and had at once diverted Mr. Noel Vanstone to the topic of himself and his possessions by a neatly-timed question about his house at Aldborough.

"I don't wish to alarm you, Miss Bygrave," were the first words of Mr. Noel Vanstone's which caught Mrs. Lecount's attention; "but there is only one safe house in Aldborough, and that house is Mine. The sea may destroy all the other houses—it can't destroy Mine. My father took care of that; my father was a remarkable man. He had My house built on piles. I have reason to believe they are the strongest piles in England. Nothing can possibly knock them down—I don't care what the sea does—nothing can possibly knock them down."

"Then, if the sea invades us," said Magdalen, "we must all run for refuge to you."

Mr. Noel Vanstone saw his way to another compliment, and at the same moment the wary captain saw his way to another burst of science.

"I could almost wish the invasion might happen," murmured one of the gentlemen, "to give me the happiness of offering the refuge."

"I could almost swear the wind had shifted again!" exclaimed the other. "Where is a man I can ask? Oh there he is. Boatman! how's the wind now? Nor'west and by west still—hey? And southeast and by south yesterday evening—ha? Is there any thing more remarkable, Mrs. Lecount, than the variableness of the wind in this climate?" proceeded the captain, shifting the camp-stool to the scientific side of him. "Is there any natural phenomenon more bewildering to the scientific inquirer? You will tell me that the electric fluid which abounds in the air is the principal cause of this variableness. You will remind me of the experiment of that illustrious philosopher who measured the velocity of a great storm by a flight of small feathers. My dear madam, I grant all your propositions—"

"I beg your pardon, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount; "you kindly attribute to me a knowledge that I don't possess. Propositions, I regret to say, are quite beyond me."

"Don't misunderstand me, ma'am," continued the captain, politely unconscious of the interruption. "My remarks apply to the temperate zone only. Place me on the coasts between the tropics—place me where the wind blows toward the shore in the daytime, and toward the sea by night—and I instantly advance toward conclusive experiments. For example, I know that the heat of the sun during the day rarefies the air over the land, and so causes the wind. You challenge me to prove it. I escort you down the kitchen stairs (with your kind permission); I take my largest pie-dish out of the cook's hands; I fill it with cold water. Good! that dish of cold water represents the ocean. I next provide myself with one of our most precious domestic conveniences—a hot-water plate—I fill it with hot water, and I put it in the middle of the pie-dish. Good again! the hot-water plate represents the land rarefying the air over it. Bear that in mind, and give me a lighted candle. I hold my lighted candle over the cold water and blow it out. The smoke immediately moves from the dish to the plate. Before you have time to express your satisfaction I light the candle once more, and reverse the whole proceeding. I fill the pie-dish with hot water, and the plate with cold; I blow the candle out again, and the smoke moves this time from the plate to the dish. The smell is disagreeable, but the experiment is conclusive."

He shifted the camp-stool back again, and looked at Mrs. Lecount with his ingratiating smile. "You don't find me long-winded, ma'am—do you?" he said, in his easy, cheerful way, just as the housekeeper was privately opening her ears once more to the conversation on the other side of her.

"I am amazed, Sir, by the range of your information," replied Mrs. Lecount, observing the captain with some perplexity, but thus far with no distrust. She thought him eccentric, even for an Englishman, and possibly a little vain of his knowledge. But he had at least paid her the implied compliment of addressing that knowledge to herself, and she felt it the more sensibly from having hitherto found her scientific sympathies with her deceased husband treated with no great respect by the people with whom she came in contact. "Have you extended your inquiries, Sir," she proceeded, after a momentary hesitation, "to my late husband's branch of science? I merely ask, Mr. Bygrave, because (though I am only a woman) I think I might exchange ideas with you on the subject of the reptile creation."

Captain Wragge was far too sharp to risk his ready-made science on the enemy's ground. The old militiaman shook his wary head.

"Too vast a subject, ma'am," he said, "for a smatterer like me. The life and labors of such a philosopher as your husband, Mrs. Lecount, warn men of my intellectual calibre not to measure themselves with a giant. May I inquire," proceeded the captain, softly smoothing the way for future intercourse with Sea-View Cottage, "whether you possess any scientific memorials of the late Professor?"

"I possess his Tank, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount, modestly casting her eyes on the ground; "and one of his Subjects—a little foreign Toad."

"His Tank!" exclaimed the captain, in tones of mournful interest. "And his Toad! Pardon my blunt way of speaking my mind, ma'am. You possess an object of public interest; and, as one of the public, I acknowledge my curiosity to see it."

Mrs. Lecount's smooth cheeks colored with pleasure. The one assailable place in that cold and secret nature was the place occupied by the memory of the Professor. Her pride in his scientific achievements, and her mortification at finding them but little known out of his own country, were genuine feelings. Never had Captain Wragge burned his adulterated incense on the flimsy altar of human vanity to better purpose than he was burning it now.

"You are very good, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount. "In honoring my husband's memory you honor me. But though you kindly treat me on a footing of equality, I must not forget that I fill a domestic situation. I shall feel it a privilege to show you my relics, if you will allow me to ask my master's permission first."

She turned to Mr. Noel Vanstone; her perfectly sincere intention of making the proposed request, mingling—in that strange complexity of motives which is found so much oftener in a woman's mind than in a man's—with her jealous distrust of the impression which Magdalen had produced on her master.

"May I make a request, Sir?" asked Mrs. Lecount, after waiting a moment to catch any fragments of tenderly-personal talk that might reach her, and after being again neatly baffled by Magdalen—thanks to the camp-stool. "Mr. Bygrave is one of the few persons in England who appreciate my husband's scientific labors. He honors me by wishing to see my little world of reptiles. May I show it to him?"

"By all means, Lecount," said Mr. Noel Vanstone, graciously. "You are an excellent creature, and I like to oblige you. Lecount's Tank, Mr. Bygrave, is the only tank in England—Lecount's Toad is the oldest toad in the world. Will you come and drink tea at seven o'clock to-night? And will you prevail on Miss Bygrave to accompany you? I want her to see my house. I don't think she has any idea what a strong house it is. Come and survey my premises, Miss Bygrave. You shall have a stick and rap on the walls; you shall go up stairs and stamp on the floors—and then you shall hear what it all cost." His eyes wrinkled up cunningly at the corners, and he slipped another tender speech into Magdalen's ear, under cover of the all-predominating voice in which Captain Wragge thanked him for the invitation. "Come punctually at seven," he whispered, "and pray wear that charming hat!"

Mrs. Lecount's lips closed ominously. She set down the captain's niece as a very serious drawback to the intellectual luxury of the captain's society.

"You are fatiguing yourself, Sir," she said to her master. "This is one of your bad days. Let me recommend you to be careful; let me beg you to walk back."

Having carried his point by inviting the new acquaintances to tea, Mr. Noel Vanstone proved to be unexpectedly docile. He acknowledged that he was a little fatigued, and turned back at once in obedience to the housekeeper's advice.

"Take my arm, Sir—take my arm, on the other side," said Captain Wragge, as they turned to retrace their steps. His parti-colored eyes looked significantly at Magdalen while he spoke, and warned her not to stretch Mrs. Lecount's endurance too far at starting. She instantly understood him, and in spite of Mr. Noel Vanstone's reiterated assertions that he stood in no need of the captain's arm, placed herself at once by the housekeeper's side. Mrs. Lecount recovered her good-humor, and opened another conversation with Magdalen, by making the one inquiry of all others which, under existing circumstances, was the hardest to answer.

"I presume Mrs. Bygrave is too tired after her journey to come out to-day?" said Mrs. Lecount. "Shall we have the pleasure of seeing her to-morrow?"

"Probably not," replied Magdalen. "My aunt is in delicate health."

"A complicated case, my dear madam," added the captain, conscious that Mrs. Wragge's personal appearance (if she happened to be seen by accident) would offer the flattest of all possible contradictions to what Magdalen had just said of her. "There is some remote nervous mischief which doesn't express itself externally. You would think my wife the picture of health, if you looked at her—and yet, so delusive are appearances, I am obliged to forbid her all excitement. She sees no society—our medical attendant, I regret to say, absolutely prohibits it."

"Very sad," said Mrs. Lecount. "The poor lady must often feel lonely, Sir, when you and your niece are away from her."

"No," replied the captain. "Mrs. Bygrave is a naturally domestic woman. When she is able to employ herself, she finds unlimited resources in her needle and thread." Having reached this stage of the explanation—and having purposely skirted, as it were, round the confines of truth, in the event of the housekeeper's curiosity leading her to make any private inquiries on the subject of Mrs. Wragge—the captain wisely checked his fluent tongue from carrying him into any further details. "I have great hope from the air of this place," he remarked in conclusion. "The Iodine, as I have already observed, does wonders."

Mrs. Lecount acknowledged the virtues of Iodine in the briefest possible form of words, and withdrew into the innermost sanctuary of her own thoughts. "Some mystery here," said the housekeeper to herself. "A lady who looks the picture of health; a lady who suffers from a complicated nervous malady; and a lady whose hand is steady enough to use her needle and thread, is a living mass of contradictions I don't quite understand. Do you make a long stay at Aldborough, Sir?" she added aloud; her eyes resting for a moment in steady scrutiny on the captain's face.

"It all depends, my dear madam, on Mrs. Bygrave. I trust we shall stay through the autumn. You are settled at Sea-View Cottage, I presume, for the season?"

"You must ask my master, Sir. It is for him to decide, not for me."

The answer was an unfortunate one. Mr. Noel Vanstone had been secretly annoyed by the change in the walking arrangements which had separated him from Magdalen. He attributed that change to the meddling influence of Mrs. Lecount, and he now took the earliest opportunity of resenting it on the spot.

"I have nothing to do with our stay at Aldborough," he broke out, peevishly. "You know as well as I do, Lecount, it all depends on you. Mrs. Lecount has a brother in Switzerland," he went on, addressing himself to the captain—"a brother who is seriously ill. If he gets worse, she will have to go there and see him. I can't accompany her, and I can't be left in the house by myself. I shall have to break up my establishment at Aldborough, and stay with some friends. It all depends on you, Lecount—or on your brother, which comes to the same thing. If it depended on me," continued Mr. Noel Vanstone, looking pointedly at Magdalen across the housekeeper, "I should stay at Aldborough all through the autumn with the greatest pleasure. With the greatest pleasure," he reiterated, repeating the words with a tender look for Magdalen, and a spiteful accent for Mrs. Lecount.

Thus far Captain Wragge had remained silent, carefully noting in his mind the promising possibilities of a separation between Mrs. Lecount and her master, which Mr. Noel Vanstone's little fretful outbreak had just disclosed to him. An ominous trembling in the housekeeper's thin lips, as her master openly exposed her family affairs before strangers, and openly set her jealousy at defiance, now warned him to interfere. If the misunderstanding were permitted to proceed to extremities, there was a chance that the invitation for that evening to Sea-View Cottage might be put off. Now, as ever, equal to the occasion, Captain Wragge called his useful information once more to the rescue. Under the learned auspices of Joyce he plunged for the third time into the ocean of science and brought up another pearl. He was still haranguing (on Pneumatics this time), still improving Mrs. Lecount's mind with his politest perseverance and his smoothest flow of language, when the walking party stopped at Mr. Noel Vanstone's door.

"Bless my soul, here we are at your house, Sir!" said the captain, interrupting himself in the middle of one of his graphic sentences. "I won't keep you standing a moment. Not a word of apology, Mrs. Lecount, I beg and pray! I will put that curious point in Pneumatics more clearly before you on a future occasion. In the mean time, I need only repeat that you can perform the experiment I have just mentioned to your own entire satisfaction with a bladder, an exhausted receiver, and a square box. At seven o'clock this evening, Sir—at seven o'clock, Mrs. Lecount. We have had a remarkably pleasant walk, and a most instructive interchange of ideas. Now, my dear girl, your aunt is waiting for us."

While Mrs. Lecount stepped aside to open the garden gate Mr. Noel Vanstone seized his opportunity, and shot a last tender glance at Magdalen—under shelter of the umbrella, which he had taken into his own hands for that express purpose. "Don't forget," he said, with his sweetest smile, "don't forget, when you come this evening, to wear that charming hat!" Before he could add any last words Mrs. Lecount glided back to her place, and the sheltering umbrella changed hands again immediately.

"An excellent morning's work!" said Captain Wragge, as he and Magdalen walked on together to North Shingles. "You and I and Joyce have all three done wonders. We have secured a friendly invitation at the first day's fishing for it."

He paused for an answer; and receiving none, observed Magdalen more attentively than he had observed her yet. Her face had turned deadly pale again, her eyes looked out mechanically straight before her in heedless, reckless despair.

"What is the matter?" he asked, with the greatest surprise. "Are you ill?"

She made no reply; she hardly seemed to hear him.

"Are you getting alarmed about Mrs. Lecount?" he inquired next. "There is not the least reason for alarm. She may fancy she has heard something like your voice before, but your face evidently bewilders her. Keep your temper, and you keep her in the dark. Keep her in the dark, and you will put that two hundred pounds into my hands before the autumn is over."

He waited again for an answer, and again she remained silent. The captain tried for the third time in another direction.

"Did you get any letters this morning?" he went on. "Is there bad news again from home? Any fresh difficulties with your sister?"

"Say nothing about my sister!" she broke out, passionately. "Neither you nor I are fit to speak of her."

She said those words at the garden gate, and hurried into the house by herself. He followed her, and heard the door of her own room violently shut to, violently locked and double locked. Solacing his indignation by an oath, Captain Wragge sullenly went into one of the parlors on the ground-floor to look after his wife. The room communicated with a smaller and darker room at the back of the house by means of a quaint little door, with a window in the upper half of it. Softly approaching this door, the captain drew the white muslin curtain which hung over the window, and looked into the inner room.

There was Mrs. Wragge, with her cap on one side, and her shoes down at heel; with a row of pins between her teeth; with the Oriental Cashmere Robe slowly slipping off the table; with her scissors suspended uncertain in one hand, and her written directions for dressmaking held doubtfully in the other—so absorbed over the invincible difficulties of her employment as to be perfectly unconscious that she was at that moment the object of her husband's superintending eye. Under other circumstances she would have been soon brought to a sense of her situation by the sound of his voice. But Captain Wragge was too anxious about Magdalen to waste any time on his wife, after satisfying himself that she was safe in her seclusion, and that she might be trusted to remain there.

He left the parlor, and after a little hesitation in the passage, stole up stairs and listened anxiously outside Magdalen's door. A dull sound of sobbing—a sound stifled in her handkerchief, or stifled in the bed-clothes—was all that caught his ear. He returned at once to the ground-floor, with some faint suspicion of the truth dawning on his mind at last.

"The devil take that sweet-heart of hers!" thought the captain. "Mr. Noel Vanstone has raised the ghost of him at starting."

THE WAR IN NORTH ALABAMA.

We illustrate on pages 513 and 516 some interesting scenes of General Mitchell's campaign in North Alabama. Our pictures are from sketches by Mr. Hübner, of the Third Ohio, who thus describes them:

BURNING THE TENNESSEE BRIDGE AT DECATUR.

"A part of Mitchell's division, under command of Colonel Lytle, Tenth Ohio Volunteers, Third Ohio Volunteers, Colonel J. Beatty, Coldwater Battery, Captain Loomis (Michigan Artillery), were sent to Decatur, which place they held until the rebels with overwhelming forces, under command of General Price, advanced on us. We prevented the rebels from following us by burning the bridge, also the railroad dépôt. Mitchell took possession of every boat, even of the smallest skiff, for twenty miles up and down the river, so the rebels had not the slightest means to cross.

"Captain Loomis did good work. His boys are the finest set of men I have ever seen.

"The bridge was a beautiful one, built of wood and iron, and 1700 yards long.

DEFEAT OF REBELS AT BRIDGEPORT.

"After our arrival at Huntsville our gallant leader, General Mitchell, who was much pleased with our conduct, sent us immediately to Bridgeport, Jackson County, twenty-four miles above Chattanooga (a small place of about six or eight houses), where another force of the rebels, under General Ledbetter, was advancing. We drove them back, burned a small bridge, and Loomis shelled them out of their camp, which was situated about a mile from the shore of the river.

GUERRILLAS AND BUSHWHACKERS.

"On our way from Bridgeport back to Huntsville two of our men got shot by some bushwhackers, who fired on our train out of the bushes in the vicinity of Paint Rock. Colonel J. Beatty stopped the train and sent several detachments in pursuit of the rebels. One party went to the town and captured four or five of the band; another party, under command of Captain M'Dougal, Company H, Third Regiment Ohio Volunteers, went into a cave which is in the neighborhood of Paint Rock. A slave negro led the way. The entrance of the cave is not easily detected. It is half hidden by bushes and rocks. We had to walk some distance with heads bent; but soon the cave got wider and wider, and looked like a church with fine columns and arches, strange formations of the dropping limestone. The red blaze of the torches produced a strange and beautiful effect. Often it seemed to us that we saw human figures in the deep shadow, often we raised our trusty rifles, but found we were aiming at some curious limestone formation. We went about two miles into the cave, found signs of occasional visits by human beings, and the negro assured us it was in fact a hiding-place of a guerrilla band.

"We had to go back when the torches burned down. There are many side caves and abysses, and without light it is a most dangerous place. The cave is five miles long, and has several outlets.

"We went back to where our train stopped. The other party arrived with the prisoners. One of them is a captain in some rebel cavalry company. They also found some guns.

"The boys were so enraged Colonel B. could hardly prevent them from hanging the murderers immediately. Some rebel houses were burned.

"Late at night we arrived at Huntsville and delivered the traitors into jail."

SCENES ON THE LOWER MISSISSIPPI.

We reproduce on pages 520 and 521 a number of sketches by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis, representing Scenes on the Lower Mississippi. Mr. Davis thus describes his pictures:

HOARDS OF COTTON.

"The rebels, in burning the cotton of the planters, have made for themselves bitter enemies and for us strong friends. More than one planter told me that until their cotton was burned they were as good Confederate States men as any. Now they would rather give the Yankees every pound of it than have it fall into Confederate hands. They told me also that no planter had burned his own cotton willingly; and that cotton, in small quantities, was hidden in every swamp and bayou in Mississippi, it having been placed upon barges and taken, at high-water, up a then navigable bayou, which may only now be reached by canoes.

"Of the quantity of cotton destroyed I think we have but little comprehension. I was told in Memphis that, some time previous to the occupation of the place by our troops, there started from that city a lawless band of poor whites—bacon-eating scoundrels, who had never owned a pound of cotton in their lives. These visited the Mississippi on either side, burning and destroying. Up the Arkansas, the Red River, and the Yazoo, not a bale of cotton that they could find escaped the flames. They returned to Memphis, after an absence of five weeks, and reported the destruction of 800,000 bales of cotton.

CAPTURE OF RED BILL.

"For a long time after the occupation of the city of New Orleans there appeared to be a hesitancy among the people known to be Union, in coming forward and expressing their sentiments.

"The reason for this was soon found to be a fear of a band of desperadoes calling themselves Thugs. They had been in the habit for some years of murdering the citizens of New Orleans whenever and wherever they pleased. These men General Butler at once set about catching, for the purpose of trying, convicting, and punishing them for their crimes. Adams, the two Du Pratts, M'Niel, Leggett, and others, were soon in durance vile at the forts. There then remained but one of the desperadoes uncaptured, Red Bill, and he was soon discovered to be lurking near Lake Salvador, and parties were daily dispatched in quest of him, but for a long time were unsuccessful in their search.

"More definite intelligence reaching the parties in search, a party set out from New Orleans, disguised as fishermen, for Lake Salvador. Arriving at the lake they commenced hauling their seine, and were joined by another party of fishermen, and soon after by Red Bill. On leaving them he was tracked to his lair. At midnight, by creeping, they surrounded his couch, seized, and bound him. On searching his bed, two pistols and a hatchet were found under his pillow. He told his captors that he had seen the different parties sent to capture him—had talked and drank with them. General Butler will mete out a just punishment to this last of the Thugs, so that he will be no more a terror to the denizens of New Orleans.

CROSSING CATTLE FOR THE REBELS.

"A large portion of the supplies for the rebel army of the Valley of the Mississippi have come from Texas. The mouth of the Red River is the great crossing-place for these supplies. In the sketch two steamers, having barges laden with cattle in tow, are conveying them across the river. This favorite crossing-place is now, however, broken up, as one or more gun-boats are constantly stationed there. The Hon. H. Webb and the Music are now, with the exception of the Arkansas, the only rebel craft on the river. The two former are close prisoners on the Red River.

GRAND GULF.

"Of what was formerly the pretty little town of Grand Gulf there remains now a few chimneys standing. After two warnings not to fire into our transport vessels, and those laden with sick soldiers, which warnings were disregarded, a passing gun-boat took the matter in hand, and demolished the town. Since that event there has been no firing into our vessels, except from Vicksburg.

ELLIS CLIFF.

"Ellis Cliff is probably the strongest position on the river below Vicksburg. The river seems surrounded on three sides by a towering cliff, from 250 to 300 feet in height. From this place our vessels have been frequently fired into by light batteries which are kept on the move from place to place.

THE MORTAR FLEET.

"The mortar fleet of Commodore Porter has, by its wonderful efficiency and management, proved itself to be of immense value. I have watched the shells thrown from these vessels to a distance of over two miles, and two out of five shells would be sure to lodge in the earth-works being thrown up by the rebels. It hardly seems possible that a mortar should be capable of such accurate firing. The vessels are concealed in the most ingenious manner, every portion of the spars and rigging being carefully covered with branches of trees and shrubbery; so that at the distance of a mile and a half or two miles it is impossible to see the vessels, moored as they are near the thickly-wooded banks of the river.

"For the information of the many who may not be entirely au fait with the manipulation of the mortar and the mode of working it, I will give a short description of it: The mortar, by means of a mathematical instrument, is pointed at the exact elevation of 45 degrees. A wooden bar, or sight, with a spirit-level attached, is then firmly screwed to the trunnion, and the exact position of the mortar at its elevation of 45 degrees is marked upon it. With the distance to be fired varies the charge of powder, each charge being carefully weighed and placed in the mortar loose, instead of in cartridge. When the distance fired is very great, and the charge of powder in consequence large, the men—to avoid the effect of the heavy concussion—stand on tip-toe and with mouths open. The open mouth allows the sound to reach the inside of the ear-drum, reduces the effect of the concussion, and renders the shock much less severe."

A third picture shows us the Sharp-shooters of the Fleet lying behind the bulwarks on the look-out for rebel sharp-shooters ashore.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We continue in this number our series of illustrations of the Army of the Potomac, from sketches by Mr. Alfred R. Waud. Mr. Waud writes respecting the illustrations on pages 516 and 517:

THE RIGHT WING FALLING BACK.

"This was a scene to be remembered. It occurred at two A.M. on Sunday, 29th June. The clearing was filled with wagon-trains, shown up by the glare of fires lighted for the destruction of such stores as it was impossible to convey with the army. Among these the artillery and infantry steadily moved to take up positions for their defense. By the dull glow of the fires guns in position came into sight formed across the field; and occasionally, when a box of cartridges or other inflammable material would explode, the whole scene would be illuminated brightly in all its detail: artillery moving; guns in battery, with the tired cannoniers sleeping around them; wagon-trains forming for a move; soldiers burning stores, con amore, that 'Johnny Reb' might not profit by them; stragglers and sick working their weary way along, and much more, making a scene of the most dramatic character.

RELIGIOUS SERVICES AT HEAD-QUARTERS, HARRISON'S LANDING, VIRGINIA.

"Every Sunday morning an open-air service is held in the camp of head-quarters, at which General M'Clellan is a punctual attendant. Seated around may be seen generals, with members of the staff, and other officers of the army; sometimes a naval officer, and a few outsiders of various denominations. The attention displayed must be gratifying to the chaplains who officiate, though the gentlemen who represent the Church here are not generally its most brilliant lights. The scene is not without its suggestions. The groups of officers and soldiers, so lately grimed with dust and battle-sweat, and gaunt with fatigue and hunger, refreshed by rest, show few signs of their recent struggles. The sentries, leaning their heads upon their keen sabre-bayonets, join in the hymns—real Ironsides these. The military band takes the place of the organ, preluding and accompanying the hymns, in which few join, and playing for opening and closing voluntaries selections from Traviata. Down below rolls the placid yellow James, and from it arises other sounds: the hoarse roar of letting off steam; the rattling of a cable as a gun-boat or transport comes to an anchor; the shouts of drivers leading their horses splashing into the river to drink; and the spiteful, high-pressure puffing of a propeller looking after its tow. M'Clellan sits or stands calm and thoughtful through the service, the presence of a stranger drawing one quick, searching glance from him—a look which a sensitive individual would not care to encounter as a delinquent. In dress the General is, of all present, least ostentatious—a plain undress sack without shoulder-straps, pants without a stripe, gaiters, and a gray shirt comprising all. Yet none could fail to see at once in him the commander."

BAYONET CHARGE OF THE SECOND EXCELSIOR REGIMENT AT FAIROAKS.

Regarding the illustration on page 524, Mr. Waud writes:

"I send this under the direction of General Sickles and Colonel Hall (his was the only regiment of the Excelsior Brigade that charged). The locality is correct. The line of the men is correct, and the enemy's skirmishers as Hall found them. No hand-to-hand desperate work by demoniac individuals in Zouave dress and caps—the Excelsior Brigade wears the infantry uniform with felt hats. I could not send this at the time as I was flat on my back."

THE CONFLICT.

There are sounds of fearful meaning struggling through the steadfast pines,
And the pale earth shudders weakly to the tramp of battle lines,
And the bayonets flash defiance where the bright sun on them shines.

Months have gone since first this warning chilled with woe the south wind's heat:
"You have wronged us! you have trampled every right beneath your feet!
And no more with brothers' greetings, hands fast locking, will we meet!"

Then went down the flag of Sumter, and our young men, brave and strong,
Dropped the hands of dancing maidens, closed the lips of jest and song—
Paler grew the mothers' faces, gazing on the eager throng;

And from some the cry went upward, "Oh, my parted household band!
In the fearful hour of conflict face to face my sons shall stand,
God forbid that Death should find one guided by the other's hand!"

Oh the days that lie before us! who shall speak with steady tongue
Of the time when foul Disunion to the breeze its banner flung,
While the writhing, loathsome Hydra, hissing to its standard clung?

Many an old man's lips shall quiver when some fair child at his knee
Asks about his soldier father, dead beside the Tennessee;
"Grandpa, when the Union soldiers came, what made the generals flee?

"Mother says they fled one morning, riding swiftly down the hill,
And they made my darling father go with them against his will,
Else he might have been beside us, with his strong arms round me still."

Many a young man's hair shall whiten with the memory of that day
When he floated down the river, awful in its war array,
And beheld the white smoke curling where last morn his homestead lay.

Yet our soldiers smile right bravely, and with faces toward the foe,
Say, "Oh, let us hear the drum beat and the wild war bugle blow,
Darker glooms the doubt-veiled safety than the danger that we know.

"And the banner left by freedom unto North, South, East, and West,
Still shall lift o'er every city proud and high its eagle crest,
Though from every loyal fireside steps a hero to his rest."

BAYONET CHARGE OF THE SECOND EXCELSIOR REGIMENT, COLONEL HALL, AT THE BATTLE OF FAIROAKS, JUNE, 1862.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 533.]

THE PIRATE "SUMTER."—[Drawn by Mr. Theodore R. Davis.]

THE CRUISE OF THE REBEL SHIP "SUMTER."

[From the Private Journal of one of her Officers.]

New Orleans.—June 3, 1861.—This morning the Sumter went into commission. The Confederate tricolor with its eleven stars, each star representing a sovereign State, was raised at the peak of the vessel, and duly honored by a salute from her guns. For the past fortnight strenuous exertions have been used to get her ready to receive her armament, ammunition, stores, coals, etc., in order that she may get to sea before the mouths of the Mississippi are sealed by the blockading fleet of the United States Government. Already reports reach New Orleans that two ships of the enemy—the Brooklyn and the Powhatan, both steamers, and represented as having powerful batteries and being uncommonly swift—are lying off the mouths of the Mississippi. In the face of these discouraging rumors the commander of the naval station and his subordinates have at length completed the repairs on the Habana, and christened her the Sumter—a cherished name to every Southron. Who knows but that this little steamer may bear the Southern flag to distant seas, and win for herself an immortal name? Much is expected of her. Her model is perfectly symmetrical, her masts are long and raking, her spars slender and nicely proportioned. She is a propeller, bark-rigged, carrying five guns—four 32's, and one 68 on a pivot. Her complement of men is 114. She is to be commanded by Captain Semmes, a veteran officer of the old navy. All who know him represent him as being a skillful seaman, a good tactician, an excellent diplomatist, and a brave man.

June 13.—The Sumter's trial trip took place to-day. As the ship was cast loose from her moorings, and steamed out into the stream, the river's banks were crowded by an applauding multitude. When about ten miles above the city the guns were tested with satisfactory results.

June 17.—Sailing orders are momentarily expected. We may sail to-night. How the people flock to see her as the time draws near for her departure!

June 18.—The ship is under sailing orders, and the executive officer is instructed to permit no one to go ashore.

June 19.—Arrived here (opposite Forts St. Philip and Jackson) to-day. On the way to this place stopped at the Barracks to take in powder. Will remain here a while to perfect the men in their exercises at the guns. After which—why, probably an attempt will be made to run the blockade!

June 24.—(Head of the Passes.)—After remaining anchored a week between the forts, the welcome order was at length given to heave anchor and get under way. Never was an order more cheerfully obeyed! It is a matter of wonder how human beings can live there. The mosquitoes are greater torments than the ten plagues of Egypt combined! Here, at the Head of the Passes, it is a comparative elysium. The gentle breezes from the Gulf are most refreshing. The mast-heads of the ships composing the blockading squadron can be distinctly seen from aloft. How the Sumter will ever get out is a mystery.

June 25.—An officer was sent to-day to reconnoitre the position of the enemy. He and his commander afterward landed at the light-houses at Pass-à-l'Outre and South Point, destroyed the buildings, and turned adrift all the oil. This daring feat was accomplished under the very eyes of the enemy—the Brooklyn and Powhatan lying not more than two miles off.

June 29.—Since the Sumter left New Orleans the little steamer Ivy has acted as her tender. This morning she went down the river to reconnoitre, and soon returned and reported that the coast was clear. Immediately the vessel's anchor was hove up, and she was got under way. In less than half an hour she was at the bar. Before crossing it the huge hull of the Brooklyn was seen just behind a point of land not far off, with her top-gallant masts housed. She being too close to render the attempt to run the blockade safe, the Sumter's prow was turned in the direction whence she came, and soon afterward anchored at the Head of the Passes. Here she will wait, as did Micawber, for something to turn up. After all, who knows but that the wicked little Ivy brought a false report on purpose to create a little excitement—merely to prevent the boys dying of ennui?

June 29.—To-day a field howitzer—a 12-pounder —was brought down by the Ivy from Fort Jackson and added to the armament of the Sumter.

June 30, 4½ P.M.—The Sumter has run the blockade at last! She is now bounding over the blue waters of the Gulf of Mexico; and if she does not soon slacken speed she will ere many days be in the Caribbean Sea. Every thing was managed admirably. At two o'clock in the morning the steamer Empire Parish dropped alongside laden with coal, 200 barrels of which were transferred to the Sumter's bunkers before daylight. The Empire Parish then steamed down the river, returning about eleven o'clock—just as all hands had been piped to muster—with the welcome intelligence that the blockading squadron had disappeared. The Sumter was got under way in double quick time. Directly after crossing the bar the Brooklyn was seen in chase of a sailing vessel, which chase she soon abandoned and shaped her course for the Sumter. At this time the latter ship had no sail on, but soon a favorable breeze sprung up, and the order was given to unfurl. The Brooklyn followed her example, spreading every yard of canvas that would draw. The speed of the two ships seemed to be about equal, and for more than two hours it was doubtful whether the little "rebel" would come out victor or vanquished. She was sadly out of trim, being too much down by the head, which caused her to plunge greatly, keeping the forecastle continually covered with spray. To remedy this the field howitzer and about 1500 gallons of water were thrown overboard. Up to this time the Sumter carried only 18 pounds of steam; suddenly the hand of the steam-gauge indicated that it had been increased to 27 pounds. It soon became evident that the Sumter was gaining on the Yankee. The Brooklyn's hull gradually sank beneath the horizon, but still she continued the chase, until nothing could be seen of her save her white sails—of which she carried a huge quantity. After a chase of four hours her commander saved the credit of his ship as a fast sailer by turning back! As soon as the enemy wore ship the Sumter's crew manned the rigging and cheered ship most heartily.

July 2.—The Sumter has steadily continued on her course southward. It is a great relief to be rid of all bustle, and be thus quietly cruising along.

July 3.—This afternoon, about three o'clock, the look-out reported a sail. As it was the first one seen her appearance was greeted with pleasure. Chase was given; but she proved to be, not a Yankee, but a Spaniard. Her papers were found correct, and she was permitted to continue on her course. Immediately afterward another sail was descried—the American ship Golden Rocket—a fine vessel of about 1000 tons burden, bound from Havana to Cienfuegos, in ballast. She being a lawful prize her crew was transferred to the Sumter: her spare sails and a portion of her stores were taken out of her, and then she was consigned to the flames. The Rocket's sails were all set, and the flames leaped into them, dancing a wild fantastic dance from rope to rope. As the fire spread and took a firmer hold of the doomed ship the heavens were illumined gloriously. But it was indeed a sad sight to witness the destruction of such a splendid vessel. When last seen she was a mass of flame from bowsprit to taffrail—enveloped in a winding-sheet of fire.

July 4.—This is the anniversary of the birth of freedom in the Western World; and on this day we, seamen of the Confederate States, captured the American brig Cuba. First sending on board a prize crew, we took her in tow. Soon afterward, however, the tow-line parted, when instructions were given to the prize-master to permit none of his men to go aloft, lest an attempt might be made to recapture her, the old crew being still on board. Late this afternoon another vessel—the brig Machias—was captured, and given in charge of a prize crew.

July 5.—The sound "Sail ho!" is becoming familiar to our ears. It was heard twice to-day, and each sail was a prize. The names of the vessels are the Ben Dunning and Alibert Adams, both brigs, and both from Cuban ports, laden with the productions of the tropics. If the Sumter continues capturing at this rate, she will soon be compelled to go into port to leave her prizes and get back her men who are in charge of them. It is likely she will put into some Cuban port, near which coast she now is.

July 6.—Success still attends us. Yesterday the bark Louisa Kilham, and the brigs West Wind and Naiad, were captured. This is doing a wholesale business. The Sumter is as attractive to Yankee ships as the light of a candle is to the fire-fly, and equally as fatal. After the capture of the last-named vessel we shaped our course for Cienfuegos, Cuba, and anchored near the outer fort, about four o'clock this afternoon. We waited outside until all our prizes, except the brig Cuba, which has not yet made her appearance, sailed in; the Sumter then followed in their wake, like a mother watchfully protecting her children. All the prizes brought into this port will be taken charge of by the Cuban authorities, subject to the order of the commander of the Sumter. This is cheering. The Northerners predicted that no nation with which they were on terms of amity would permit any vessel belonging to the Confederate States to enter their ports.

July 7.—Finished taking in water and coal, and sailed this morning.

July 17.—Arrived off the harbor of St. Anne, island of Curaçoa, yesterday evening, and this morning steamed in. The men are attired in their best clothes, the officers in full uniform, while the Confederate flag is flying, and the commander's whip-like pennant gayly fluttering at her main. Thousands of people are assembled on the quays to see the little stranger. Amicable relations have been established, and the Sumter is quite "a lion." She is in need of a few repairs, which will be made before we sail again.

July 24.—The Sumter sailed from St. Anne this morning. As she passed the guard-ship cheers were given, which were caught up by the multitudes assembled on either side of the inlet. Not the least gratifying part of this ovation was the waving of handkerchiefs by some of earth's fairest daughters. These friendly manifestations were duly appreciated, as we proved at the time.

July 25.—The old, familiar sound "Sail ho!" is heard once more. "Star-spangled banner, long may it wave!" Francis Key never uttered this prayer more fervently than do the Sumter "rebels;" for they know that wherever "floats that standard sheet" they are sure of a prize. This one is the Abby Bradford, a pretty little schooner, hailing from Portland, State of Maine. As she has a full cargo, a prize crew has been put on board, who will take her into the nearest port, the Sumter accompanying her.

July 26.—Anchored to-day outside the harbor of Porto Cabello, Republic of Venezuela. Owing to the commander's refusal to comply with a certain port regulation the authorities would not grant either the Sumter or her prize permission to enter the harbor.

July 27.—Being still unable to gain admission into the harbor the Sumter and her prize left Porto Cabello this morning. Not long afterward the bark Joseph Maxwell, of Philadelphia, was captured. Her cargo being very valuable, and selected with a view to its sale in the West Indies, or the Spanish Main, the Sumter returned with her to Porto Cabello. The authorities refused to admit either vessel, but a portion of the crew of the Maxwell was allowed to land, being taken charge of by the United States consul. Thereupon the Sumter and the Maxwell left the port; and when out at sea a prize crew was sent on board with orders to sail for Cienfuegos. At the same time the Abby Bradford was dispatched to New Orleans by way of Berwick's Bay.

July 30.—Arrived about noon at Port of Spain, Island of Trinidad.

August 1.—A great number of persons have visited the Sumter here. They can not conceive how it was possible for her to have run the blockade at New Orleans. They had read all the proclamations of the President of the Northern Republic, and believed he would make good his threats; and again, they believed that the Northern navy was sufficiently numerous to sweep from the seas every ship of the Southern Confederacy.

August 3.—The British steamer Cadmus arrived to-day. She is a stanch-looking vessel, carrying twelve guns. The most friendly intercourse exists between the two commanders and their officers. The remark was made, "The English here treat us more like princes than plain Republican Americans." No tidings have been received of the prize brig Cuba, captured off Cienfuegos. The journals make no mention of her arrival there; and fears are entertained that ill has befallen her.

August 5.—Sailed from Port of Spain.

August 16.—Arrived off the harbor of Cayenne, French Guiana. The commander being unwilling to comply with one of the port laws relative to war-vessels the Sumter left during the afternoon. Some of her officers, however, went ashore, and learned that two days before a United States gun-boat had been there looking for the Sumter.

August 18.—After leaving Cayenne the vessel's course was shaped for Paramaribo, Dutch Guiana, off which port she signaled for a pilot until sundown; none having arrived at that hour she came to anchor. About twilight a sail was seen in the distance approaching the Sumter. It was soon apparent that she was a steam war-vessel. Steam was raised, the anchor hove up, all hands beat to quarters, the guns manned, the old charges drawn and fresh ones put in their places. By the time all these preliminaries had been arranged it was ascertained, by the aid of the night telescope, that the strange vessel had anchored. The Sumter followed suit; but a vigilant look-out is kept upon the movements of our supposed enemy.

August 19.—Early this morning the look-outs had reported that the steamer outside was under way. Slowly she steamed toward the Sumter, seeming to have made every preparation for attack. She had not yet hoisted her flag, neither had the Sumter—each commander being apparently desirous of learning the nationality of the other first, and of letting him know, by a death-dealing broadside, that an enemy was at hand. The stranger looked like an American-built vessel, having long mast-heads and a sharp overhanging bow. Yes, there was no mistaking her—she must be one of the gun-boats sent in search of the Sumter. When she was near enough for the number of her guns to be determined, we were glad to find that she carried but one gun more than the Sumter, and that the disparity was no greater. Slowly and cautiously the vessels neared each other. When not more than a cable's length off, our first lieutenant hailed her in a loud voice, "Ship ahoy!" "Hallo!" was promptly answered. "This is the Confederate States steamer Sumter—what vessel is that?" After waiting about half a minute, which seemed an age, the enemy replied: "The French steamer Abbeville!" Here was a disappointment—after all this preparation for mortal combat, to find at last that the supposed enemy was a friend! There was not a single man who would not freely have relinquished all the prize-money then due to him could he have transformed the Frenchman into a Yankee. She was nearer the equal of the Sumter than they ever expected to meet again, and the Sumter had captured so many merchantmen that it might be said she did not care to meet any other class of vessels. After the Frenchman had given his name he was asked if he had a pilot. He answered in the negative; and added that it was his intention to go in without one, as he knew the channel well. He did so, and we followed him. Soon after the Sumter anchored one of the Governor's aids came on board to welcome our commander. Several Yankee vessels in port, as soon as the Sumter arrived, ran up the Stars and Stripes.

August 28.—No one belonging to the Sumter has cause to complain of the treatment he has received here. Not a day has passed since her arrival but what some demonstration of sympathy for the cause of the South, or of respect and friendship for the commander of the Sumter, has taken place. . . . . Late advices from Cuba announce that the crew of a small vessel, previously captured by a Southern man-of-war—name not given—had overpowered and murdered the prize crew. It is feared that the "small vessel" alluded to is the brig Cuba.

August 29.—We received intelligence this morning that a gun-boat, bearing the flag of the United States, had been seen cruising off the mouth of the Surinam—the river on which Paramaribo is situated. If this is true, this vessel is no doubt one of the fleet of cruisers sent in search of the Sumter.

August 30.—The Sumter steamed out of the harbor, followed by the most cheering evidences of the friendship of the people.

September 5.—(Maranham.)—After five days' pleasant sailing from Paramaribo, the Sumter arrived, without any thing having occurred worthy of note, in the domains of the Emperor of Brazil. Found in port two Brazilian men-of-war—between which, and right abreast of an immense fort, she is now at anchor.

September 14.—The Sumter has been ready to sail for several days, but has been detained on account of the non-arrival of the mail, which was received yesterday. Its advices confirm the recapture of the brig Cuba. The prize crew consisted of two sailors and two marines, the prize-master being Midshipman Hudgins. One of the sailors, Davidson, informed the captain of the brig, who, although a prisoner, was allowed to remain on board the Cuba, that he and the other sailor, Spencer, were willing to lay down their arms and surrender the vessel to him, provided he would guarantee them pardon from the President of the United States. Captain Stroud promised to use his influence to that end, whereupon the sailors delivered up their arms, and tried to persuade the marines to follow their example. They refused, and informed Mr. Hudgins of the treachery of the two sailors. By this time Captain Stroud, having taken measures for regaining possession of the brig, ordered Mr. Hudgins to give up his weapons. He declined to do so, whereupon Captain Stroud made a signal, which was answered by his own men and the renegades. In the mean time Mr. Hudgins climbed a mast, from which he fired repeatedly at the party on deck, wounding several men, one fatally; however, he himself was wounded in turn, and thus compelled to descend. The two marines gallantly seconded their commander, but were soon overpowered and put in irons—a punishment that was afterward accorded to the two traitors.

September 15.—Sailed from San Juan de Maranham, Brazil.

September 25.—The Sumter has now ceased to exercise her vocation so long that the Yankee shippers doubtless think she has bidden farewell to the Spanish Main. If Captain Briggs, of the Joseph Park, entertained any such opinion he was undeceived to-day. About three o'clock this afternoon a rakish-looking little bark hove in sight; it was Briggs's brigantine. We were soon alongside of her. When her first-mate made the unpleasant discovery that his neighbor was an armed Confederate vessel he attempted to give his bark more sea-room; but his efforts availed him not, though he handled his vessel in a very seamanlike manner. The Joseph Park, too, was remarkably swift. However, the captain thought it best to heave-to and haul down the once glorious Stars and Stripes.

September 27.—For the past two days the Sumter and her prize have been cruising along under easy sail, both vessels displaying lights at night, and keeping within sight of each other during the day. To-day, however, the Sumter dropped alongside of the Park, and after the transfer of the prize crew and a portion of her stores to the steamer, she was first used as a target, and then made a bonfire of.

October 22.—Nearly one month has elapsed since the capture of the Joseph Park, and not a single sail has been seen during that time. We think of the Yankees' boast, that their sails whiten the ocean!

October 24.—A sail at last! It is a pleasure to see one occasionally, though it may not be one of the kind we are in quest of. To-day a French brig was boarded. The captain being asked the news from the States, replied, "Before I left home I heard they were fighting in America, but I did not learn who were the belligerents, what they were fighting for, or which was the victorious party!" This Gaul certainly takes very little interest in other people's affairs.

October 28.—The cruise of the Sumter, during the last month, has been attended with so little success that it seemed her guardian angel had flown; but to-day she has shown her face again. The blessing she has bestowed on us this time is a pretty little schooner, the Daniel Trowbridge, crammed with every thing in the eating line we could desire.

October 29.—Early this morning a boat was sent off to the prize for a supply of fresh provisions and returned with sheep, pigs, potatoes, and an abundance of fowl—luxuries we had not indulged in for a long time. During the excellent dinner we enjoyed to-day many thanks were expressed for the kindness of Uncle Abe, in thus remembering us in our hour of need—of fresh provisions.

October 31.—Since the capture of the Trowbridge every body has been busy. A portion of the crew has been employed on the prize, breaking out in the hold, to get the provisions required for the ship's use; while another gang has been making room for the reception of new stores. During this time her decks have looked liked a compromise between a provision wareroom and a slaughter-house. Such was the condition of the Sumter when, this morning, at eight o'clock, a sail was descried. Preparation was immediately made for the chase. The prize crew was recalled from the schooner, with instructions to fire her before they left. We had become tired of the routine of the past three days, and were glad of the opportunity for a change. What a pleasure it is to be in chase of a ship, especially if her captain is a plucky fellow and a good seaman, as was he of the Danish brigantine Eliza? After boarding this ship we proceeded on our course.

November 1.—At half past three o'clock this morning a very large and brilliant light was seen from the deck of the Sumter. On nearing it, it was discovered to be the burning wreck of the Trowbridge. The Sumter's course had been changed since she left the schooner in the morning, which accounts for the second meeting of the two vessels—one trim and rakish in appearance, her decks crowded with happy devil-may-care fellows, to whom it mattered not in what direction the prow of their craft was turned; the other a miserable wreck, abandoned to the mercy of the wind and wave, and sending up to heaven masses of smoke and sheets of flame.

November 2.—No fewer than three sail have been overhauled to-day, all carrying the flag of Great Britain. One of them reported the capture of the "pirate" Sumter, off Charleston Harbor, after a most determined resistance, in which she was dismasted, and lost more than half her crew.

November 5.—We meet so many vessels under British colors that the question arises—Are not many of them Yankees in disguise? When we were at San Juan de Maranham it was positively asserted that many Yankee skippers had effected, at that port, a bogus sale of their vessels to English merchants, so that when they sailed they would be under the protection of the British flag! How humiliating it must be to be compelled to resort to these shifts! To-day we boarded the British brigantine Rothsay, the French brig Hélène, and the British ship Plover. The captain of the Plover asked the boarding officer if he was in search of the Sumter—having mistaken her for a Yankee gunboat. The officer, believing the skipper to be in jest, replied affirmatively. "Then," said the skipper, "it will take a smarter-looking craft than yours to catch the Sumter; and even if you find her you can't take her!"

November 7.—Boarded another vessel bearing the British flag—no evidence, nowadays, that she is owned by British subjects: also a French brig.

November 8.—Still another Britisher! The shipbuilders of Albion must have been busy lately.

November 9.—This morning the Sumter arrived at Port Royal, island of Martinique. Astern of us is the French gun-boat Achéron, whose captain paid his respects to the commander of the Sumter soon after she anchored.

November 10.—We have learned, since our arrival here, that the United States gun-boat reported cruising off the mouth of the Surinam River was the Keystone State. The commander made diligent inquiries respecting the whereabouts of the Sumter. On learning from one of the pilots that she was up the river at Paramaribo he immediately put to sea. He acted wisely: for the Keystone State is not more than a match for the Sumter. In trying to capture her he might have lost his own ship.

November 12.—Our stay in Port Royal will be an era in the cruise of the Sumter. The crew were permitted to go ashore, and seemed to have enjoyed themselves in the style peculiar to old salts. It has been hinted that the Sumter boys are strong advocates of temperance, inasmuch as they strove to put down every beverage that would intoxicate. They had many furious encounters in endeavoring to enforce their abstemious principles, for several came aboard minus various very necessary articles of wearing apparel. One of them, to show his love of pure cold water, jumped off the wharf and attempted to wade to the ship. Had not a boat been promptly sent to his assistance he would never more have answered to the muster-roll. After being fished out of the water and deposited in the boat he attempted to jump out of it, and it required the combined efforts of the crew to prevent it. Seeing that there was danger of the boat being capsized, the commander of the Achéron kindly sent his gig to tow the boat alongside of the Sumter.

November 13.—(St. Pierre.)—We arrived here about noon, having left Port Royal in the morning. Being unable to procure coal at the latter port it was necessary to come hither. As there are so many Yankee cruisers around the West Indies the Sumter will not prolong her stay here. A few days before the Sumter reached Port Royal the United States war steamer Iroquoise put in there, but staid only long enough to inquire after the Sumter. She was described as a gun-boat of the largest class, carrying guns of the heaviest calibre.

November 14.—The Iroquoise has arrived! When first opening the harbor she was disguised; her yards were braced every way, the Danish flag flying at her peak. But this ruse did not deceive us, for many of us had seen her before. Having taken her position in front of the harbor she hoisted the Stars and Stripes, while some of her crew set to work at something on her forecastle—doubtless mounting the forward pivot gun, a 120-pounder. The Iroquoise is a magnificent-looking craft, bark-rigged, carrying six heavy guns. As soon as she hoisted the United States flag crowds of people collected on the quays to get a good look at her, some of them even expecting that she would give us battle then and there. Preparations were immediately made for this event. Our ship was cleared for action. The carpenter's gang were set to work making shot-plugs. At twilight all hands were mustered on the quarter-deck, where small-arms were served out; and look-outs were doubled fore and aft.

November 15.—Last night about 11 o'clock the Iroquoise was seen slowly approaching the Sumter. Immediately all hands were called with as little noise as possible. No drum beat to quarters; but "Boys, rouse up, the Iroquoise is alongside ready to grapple us!" was sufficient to clear the gun-deck of hammocks in a remarkably short space of time. The gun-deck, being already cleared for action, was properly lighted; the guns were manned, the magazine was opened, and the surgeon and his assistant "stood by." Our big pivot-gun bore directly on the Iroquoise; and her crew (the picked men of the ship) made a picture not easily forgotten, as they stood about her, every man with a revolver in his belt and a cutlass at his side. It was thought that the Iroquoise would undertake to board us in boats. Had the attempt been made the Yankees would have met with a warm reception. Captain Palmer went ashore directly after his arrival, and boasted that as he had been sent after the Sumter he intended to take her. He even had the assurance to ask permission of the authorities to capture her in the harbor. To this modest request he received for an answer: "The Sumter can remain in our port and receive the protection of our flag during the pleasure of her commander; but if she, or the Iroquoise, violates the neutrality of the port the guns of our forts shall be turned against her." From this we inferred that Captain Palmer might endeavor to carry his point by stratagem. The boys knew that once in the hands of the Yankees they could not expect any other than the most brutal treatment, and, remembering the fate of the Savannah's crew, resolved never to give up the ship. Death is preferable to capture.... Seeing that the commander of the Sumter and his little crew were as wide awake as himself, Captain Palmer wisely concluded to defer the attack. As the Iroquoise wore round and stood out to sea our men were ordered to leave their quarters. Some of them took their hammocks below to finish their night's sleep; others turned into the hammock nettings, or lay upon the deck, all with their arms girded on them or within reach. A few loitered about, discussing the probability of another visit from our friends. The Iroquoise dropped alongside of us about one o'clock, and again at three o'clock in the morning, but attempted nothing. ——The French gun-boat Achéron, 8 guns, arrived to-day from Port Royal. The commander paid his respects to our captain, through one of his officers, soon after she came to anchor, which courtesy was reciprocated. It is understood that the Achéron will have no communication with the Iroquoise, nor permit her to communicate with the shore, otherwise than by signals, until she anchors.

November 16.—The Iroquoise dropped anchor to-day. Thereupon the commander of the Achéron sent an officer on board to confer with Captain Palmer. The result of the conference is that the Iroquoise must come to anchor, or else must go three miles outside of the harbor. Immediately after the departure of the officer the Iroquoise hove anchor for a cruise in the harbor.

November 17.—The time having arrived for the Iroquoise either to anchor or leave the harbor, she chose the latter alternative, and is now three miles outside.

November 19.—The Iroquoise still hovers about us. The harbor, like that of New Orleans, is crescent-shaped, but the points are more clearly defined than those of the Crescent City. Between these two points of land, about three miles apart, the Iroquoise has taken her position, and is continually steaming from one to the other. It reminds one of a big bully swaggering in front of a little man's door, and daring him to come out and fight.

November 22.—The Sumter raised steam late this afternoon to test the repairs that have been made on her machinery. Seeing the smoke the Iroquoise, after dark, came in much nearer than usual. We learned to-day that several of the crew of the Joseph Park and Daniel Trowbridge, put ashore at Port Royal by the Sumter, but afterward sent to this place by the United States Consul, are now serving on the Iroquoise. Before they left the Sumter they all spoke gratefully of the treatment they had received, and solemnly swore not to take up arms against the Confederate States during the present struggle.

November 23.—The Sumter is once more in blue water! Every preparation having been made, the ship being in good sailing trim, a portion of her stores placed on the spar-deck, to be hove overboard to lighten her in case it was necessary, precisely as the eight o'clock gun was fired she slipped her anchor and steamed slowly out to sea, keeping close under cover of the land. Scarcely had her propeller revolved a dozen times before a blue light appeared at the mast-head of the only Yankee ship in port. Then a second signal was displayed on shore, and then another. The engine was stopped. The Sumter was now abreast of the French war steamer, which was under the guns of the fort, but nothing could be seen of the Iroquoise. The engine was again started; our ship moving very slowly, and still closely hugging the land. When nearly opposite the southern point the Iroquoise was seen bearing down on us; but as we were so completely under cover of the land, it was not likely that she saw us. The Sumter's prow was turned in the direction of the other point, but afterward she ran closer into the harbor, all the time watching every movement of the Iroquoise. Seeing that she was still watching the southern point, the Sumter shot across to the northern point at her fullest speed. Just before she reached the point a vessel was seen a little ahead of her. The engine was again stopped to determine the character of this craft. The darkness was so intense that it was impossible to make her out at first. A blundering quarter-master pronounced her to be an armed steamer; after a minute of anxious suspense she was transformed into a sailing frigate, lying broadside on; and finally, while we were in momentary expectation of attack, she proved to be a harmless little fore-and-aft schooner. About a quarter of an hour was lost in making out this vessel. The engine was again set in motion, and in a few minutes the Sumter was rounding the point. After she passed Diamond Rock she gave the land a wider berth, heading for the open sea. Even at this moment we could scarcely realize that the wide-awake Captain Palmer could be foiled so easily. Did he wait until morning watching the southern point? or did he give chase to an imaginary Sumter? It will be hard to convince him now that the rebels did not leave St. Pierre either by the overland or the underground route..... The Sumter passed the Island of Dominique at 10.35. Allowing for the detention at the point, she made the thirty miles in two hours; this is good time, considering that she encountered a head wind and a rough sea. The boys refuse to call this running the blockade; they say it was merely a little Saturday night's frolic, and it would be nothing but right to return and give Captain Palmer another chance of promotion. It should have been stated that a large and brilliant light, which was placed astern of the Sumter, in the window of a building near the Cathedral, every night after the arrival of the Iroquoise, was hauled down as soon as the former got under way. Four lights, seemingly on a flag-staff, were placed one above another, on a house-top, supposed to be that of the United States Consul; after being displayed about five minutes they were put out, one at a time. The vessel that raised a blue light to her mast-head was the same one that hauled down the British flag, which she had flown ever since the Sumter had been in port, and hoisted her proper colors, the Stars and Stripes, as soon as the Iroquoise arrived.

November 25.—To-day we captured the ship Montmorenci, of Bath, Maine, with a cargo of 1800 tons of coal, consigned to British residents in St. Thomas. Her captain executed a bond to the value of the ship in favor of the commander of the Sumter. After taking from her her papers and colors she was permitted to continue on her course.

November 26.—Captured and burned the schooner Arcade, of Portland, Maine.

December 3.—Early this morning a large ship was overhauled—the Vigilant, bound to Sombrero Island for guano. Her crew, all blacks, were terribly frightened at seeing the Sumter. When the prize-crew boarded her the negroes could hardly be prevented from jumping overboard, and when they came aboard the Sumter they acted as though their hour had come. Some of them verily believed that they would have to walk a plank. The Vigilant was stripped of every thing we wanted and then fired. We took from her a 9-pounder rifle-gun, which is mounted on the forecastle, in place of the one hove overboard in running the blockade of the Mississippi.

December 8.—Maine has given us three ships this week; now it is the turn of the old Bay State. A bark, fitted out for a three-years' whaling voyage, was made a bonfire of to-day. She was fourteen days out from New Bedford. She had sprung a leak, which kept the men continually at the pumps; some of them were in an almost exhausted condition. The approach of the Sumter was hailed with joy.

December 14.—For several days past we have had rough weather; and last night it blew a perfect hurricane. Early in the evening all the hatches were battened down, and the guns secured—precautions which were taken not a moment too soon. At midnight the gale raged with extraordinary violence. Winds and waves seemed to have entered into a league to destroy us. At one o'clock this morning a sea struck her forward, staving in the bulwarks on the starboard side of the gun-deck, and carrying away one of the stanchions to which the bow guns were partly secured. The gun, a 32-pounder, finding itself adrift, started off on a cruise on its own account. It was soon captured, however, and carried back to its old quarters. The hole in the ship's side was temporarily repaired, by which time the flying jib-boom was sprung; however, we got it rigged in, and all the gear and the jib were saved in good condition. Just before daylight the storm began to abate, but even now (11 A.M.) the ship is pitching terribly, showing her keel to the skies and her decks to the fishes. The Sumter, in passing through this ordeal, proved herself a much better sea-boat than many of us even hoped to find her.

December 25.—Christmas! In the South, this year, Christmas is not likely to be celebrated as in the old days. It will probably be turned into a day of fasting and mourning, and prayers will ascend for the repose of the souls of those who have fallen in battle, and for the safety of the thousands of fathers, husbands, and brothers whose lives are staked for their country's cause. We, here in the Western Ocean, have passed a sad day—a miserable imitation of Christmas.

December 28.—The British bark Rouchabuctoo, of Aberdeen, was boarded to-day. She brought intelligence of the burning, in the British Channel, of the American packet-ship Harvey Birch, by a side-wheel steamer carrying the Confederate flag, and supposed to be the Nashville.

December 29.—In the track of vessels again. To-day the Southern flag exchanged courtesies with the shipping of many nations—British, French, Dutch, Prussian, etc.—twenty-seven sail in all. Out of this number not a single Yankee! If the terrible Nashville has captured them all on this side of the Atlantic, the Sumter will have to return to her old cruising ground in the Caribbean Sea.

December 30.—The Sumter has been half a year out from New Orleans to-day. Since that date she has run two blockades, and evaded the vigilance of the fleet of gun-boats which have been searching for her all over the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea. She has captured sixteen valuable prizes; visited ports in Cuba, Curaçoa, Trinidad, Martinique, Venezuela, Dutch and French Guiana, and Brazil. A still more creditable feat is that of crossing the Atlantic in the dead of winter; for the Sumter is any thing but a stanch ship. What a reflection it is on the vaunted efficiency of the United States Navy, that a little bark of less than 500 tons, with a crew of only 114 men, should for six months prey upon its shipping without having once to fight for it! Her success in running the blockade of St. Pierre may be attributed to a lack of vigilance on the part of Captain Palmer. In fact, it was the stupidity of his friends on shore that deceived him. He would have done well by imitating the Sumter in muffling his lights. He should have remembered how that mighty warrior of olden times, Gideon, with only 300 men, put to flight the hosts of Midian: it was merely by the judicious use of lights!

January 3, 1862.—Several vessels have been seen, but the sea was too rough to overhaul them.

January 4.—We have arrived at Cadiz. We steamed in without a pilot, though one towed astern, and gave directions as to the channel, not daring to venture on to her decks until she had been boarded by the health officers. These gentlemen have ordered the Sumter into quarantine for three days.

January 5.—This morning our commander was ordered to leave the port within twenty-four hours. He refused to obey this strange order. The Sumter is not in a sea-worthy condition, being very leaky. It is a flagrant violation of international law to withhold succor from a distressed vessel, even though she belongs to an enemy and in time of war. If any doubt existed as to whether an attempt would be made to enforce this mandate, it is now removed. Toward nightfall a large frigate steamed down from the inner bay—the rendezvous of the Spanish war vessels—and anchored near the Sumter. It is madness to expect that the Sumter would be the victor in an engagement with her. Notwithstanding this our commander will not leave this port until his vessel is repaired.

January 6.—The hour fixed for our departure has come and gone. This morning the authorities informed us that the Spanish Cabinet had refused to sanction their action, and therefore the Sumter would be permitted to remain in the port of Cadiz. Soon afterward the frigate hove anchor and left. Thus ends this miserable farce. Our commander is destined to be popular with the Spaniards: they invariably honor those whom they can not bully.

January 7.—This afternoon the prisoners captured on board the Arcade, the Vigilant, and the Eben Dodge—forty-three in all—were sent ashore, the captains of the respective vessels having previously made arrangements with the United States Consul for sending them away. We heartily wish them a pleasant passage home.

January 12.—Steamed about fifteen miles up the inlet to the Government navy-yard, where the Sumter is to be thoroughly overhauled for repairs.

January 14.—The ship has been carefully inspected, and as she is not so much in need of repairs as was anticipated, she will haul out of dock to-morrow. She looks no less beautiful out of the water than in it. Her great length, in proportion to her beam, gives her the appearance of a much larger vessel than she really is.

January 15.—Hauled out of the dry dock and were towed down to the city.

January 16.—Seven of the crew have deserted here; and so the commander, hearing that much discontent existed in the ship, ordered all hands to be assembled, and addressed them as follows: "I have had you mustered to tell you that I have just received a dispatch from our commissioner in London. He has sent us money and clothing, which are on the way, and will be here in a few days. When they come to hand you will get liberty and money, and will have your run on shore as heretofore. I have endeavored to make you as comfortable as the circumstances of the ship would allow. I am deeply grieved that any of my crew should feel themselves so ill-treated or badly provided for as to desert their colors; not only desert, but to basely sell themselves to the enemy. I will now read to you the law of the Confederate States navy for the punishment of desertion." After reading the clause making desertion punishable with death, he continued: "If I catch any of those deserters I will execute them at the yard-arm. The law leaves me no other alternative. I thought the Sumter had acquired some little reputation that would attach her crew to her. The enemy have been chasing you hither and thither. They have been searching for you all over the world; this fact alone should teach you the importance the enemy attach to your capture. You are well thought of by our own Government and throughout Europe. Almost every newspaper I see contains some flattering notice of the Sumter; and the time will come when it will be thought no little credit to have served on her. Now, any of you who wish to leave can do so. I will not send officers in the boats to watch you. I do not wish to command a prison ship. I would much rather a man would desert our flag now, in port, than desert his gun in time of action. I will not have such men: I can dispense with all such dross." Then, after calling upon several of the men, upon whom he conferred rates for their good conduct, he ordered all hands to be piped down. The captain's address was delivered with deep emotion, and evidently had the effect of buoying up the spirits of those who were dispirited, if any there were. The United States Consul offers tempting inducements to all who will desert the Sumter. He has runners who besiege every boat we send ashore, and who employ every means (except force) to persuade the men to leave.

January 17.—Owing to our inability to procure what we required in Cadiz we sailed thence to Gibraltar, only eighty miles distant, which we will reach to-morrow. The conduct of the Spaniards toward us has been so vacillating as to be the source of much annoyance. The day after the arrival of the Sumter objection was made to her remaining longer than twenty-four hours. To the order to leave our commander answered that the Queen's proclamation did not apply to vessels in distress; that he would not endanger the lives of his command by going to sea in the condition his vessel was then in. In order to force him to respect this mandate a mammoth frigate was menacingly stationed near the Sumter. When the hour for our departure came the Spaniards magnanimously granted us permission to remain. Next she was hauled into one of the Government docks, the officials as polite as Parisians, and seemingly fearful of their inability to pay sufficient deference to our commander. After undergoing slight repairs the Sumter was towed down to the city. Here she procured a supply of water, but not a bucket of coal, the sale of it being positively forbidden. The commander was again ordered to leave within two hours. Six hours thereafter the authorities notified him verbally that he could remain and get every thing he required. He replied that he desired nothing from the Spaniards, and would have no further intercourse with them. The written permission of the authorities was promised and declined. Soon after the messenger had left the ship we got under way. When abreast of the outer port the Sumter was hailed by a row-boat, the oarsmen bending to their work as though their lives depended on the delivery of the huge papers held aloft by an official in the bow of the boat. Great must have been his astonishment on learning that this document was not worth stopping for!

January 18.—We are under the guns of Gibraltar the impregnable. We did not make the harbor until after nightfall, having been detained overhauling a couple of Yankees—the barks Neapolitan and Investigator. The crew of the former were transferred to the latter, when, after taking from her her papers and colors, she proceeded on her voyage. The Investigator's cargo was consigned to English merchants—hence her release. While we were taking from the Neapolitan what was necessary for the ship's use we drifted within three miles of the coast of Morocco, where she was burned. Soon after we anchored the senior naval officer of this station sent off a boat tendering his respects, and inquiring if he could be of any service to the commander of the Sumter.

January 19.—We have received numerous visitors from the British steam-frigate Scylla. They expressed surprise that so small a craft should create such a noise in the world. The old saying, that birds of a feather will flock together, is well exemplified in the visits of men-of-war's men to each other.

January 21.—The bark Investigator, after she was released by the Sumter, on the 18th, put into this port and landed the crew of the Neapolitan. She sailed to-day for Liverpool. As soon as the Sumter arrived the commander was notified that he would not be permitted to land any prisoners of war. As passengers, however, there was no objection to landing them from the bark!

February 12.—The United States gun-boat Tuscarora, which for several weeks has been watching the Confederate States steamer Nashville at Southampton, made her appearance here about noon. She is sent hither to watch the Sumter, and is now at anchor about half a mile astern of us. She is a new vessel, nearly three times the size of the Sumter, and carries nine guns, two of them of the heaviest calibre known to the Northern navy. However, she is not too big to be eluded.

February 13.—The Tuscarora has steamed over to the Spanish side. This Captain Craven no doubt considers a shrewd move, for, being in Spanish waters, he will have the right to leave at the same hour that the Sumter does.

February 21.—The paymaster of the Sumter left here in a French steamer, on the 18th, for Cadiz. He was accompanied by a Southerner, who was formerly United States Vice-Consul at Cadiz, but resigned on the inauguration of the rail-splitting President of the Northern Confederacy. The steamer stopped at Tangiers, in Morocco, and these two gentlemen went ashore, when they were arrested by a posse of soldier-policemen, and dragged to the residence of the United States Consul, where they were incarcerated in irons, as though they were guilty of a heinous crime. With Morocco, as with most Mahommedan countries, Christian powers have stipulated that their citizens and subjects shall not be amenable to the laws of the Moslem, but remain under the jurisdiction of the representatives of their respective Governments. These gentlemen had, of course, no suspicion that such an act could be perpetrated in the territory of a neutral power, notwithstanding the existence of this custom, or they never would have exposed themselves to the treatment they have experienced.

February 22.—A letter has been received from the paymaster, announcing that he had made his escape, but was afterward recaptured. He states that his treatment is of the harshest kind, and is rendered still more unendurable by many indignities.

February 23.—We raised steam to-day to go alongside of a coal-ship. While the vessel was being unmoored an accident occurred to one of the boilers, of so serious a nature as to compel us to postpone taking in our supply of coals for a few days. The boilers are well-nigh worn out.

February 24.—By the last steamer from England we are in receipt of the London Times of a recent date, containing statements made by Captains Smith, Minott, and Hoxie, whose vessels—the Arcade, Vigilant, and Eben Dodge—were captured and destroyed at sea on the Sumter's passage across the Atlantic. They complain of the filthy condition of the vessel, and of their being messed with the petty officers. Now the truth is that they messed with the warrant officers, whose mess-room, although situated forward, on the orlop deck, was as comfortable and commodious as the size of the ship would allow. For obvious reasons they were not quartered in the cabin or ward-room. When the Eben Dodge, Captain Hoxie's ship, was captured, she was in a sinking condition. Her men were so worn at the pump that half of them were helpless, and their health was as carefully attended to by our surgeon and his assistant as that of our own men. Captain Hoxie also complained that his crew were robbed of all their clothing except one suit. The Eben Dodge had an outfit of clothing for three years. This clothing was the property of the owners of the ship, put aboard to be served out to the crew as they might require it, and to be charged to their respective accounts. The Dodge, when captured, became the property of the Confederate States, with all her tackle and stores; nevertheless, the crew were permitted to retain two suits besides those they wore at the time of capture.

February 28.—Several days ago a large sailing war-vessel made her appearance off this harbor. She bears the Stars and Stripes, and appears to be heavily armed. She sailed to-day.

March 1.—The unknown war-vessel spoken of above is the United States sloop-of-war Ino, 23 guns. When she left yesterday she sailed across the strait to Tangiers, and took aboard the paymaster of the Sumter. She afterward returned and anchored in Spanish waters, off Algeciras, whence she sailed to-day for the States, leaving to the Tuscarora the pleasant duty of looking after the Sumter. The Ino is said to be a merchantman transformed into a war-vessel. The intention of the shrewd Secretary of the Northern Navy was to send her into the Mediterranean, where she would be likely to encounter the Sumter. The Sumter, of course, would drop alongside of her, thinking her an ordinary merchant ship, when the batteries of the Ino would open on her, and, with a single broadside, blow the Sumter into a million of pieces.

March 10.—There has been considerable movement among the Northern war-vessels in these and adjacent waters during the past few days. The Kearsarge, Commander Pickering, seven guns, which arrived at Algeciras on the 7th, steamed over and anchored astern of us on the following day. Being ordered to leave yesterday, she returned to the Spanish side. Her guns were all run in, and the ports closed, but at every air and light port a dozen heads could be seen, every eye strained to catch a glimpse of the little blockade-runner. The Kearsarge may be a stronger ship, and better armed and more numerously manned than the Sumter, but we can beat the Yankees singing. Our old friend the Tuscarora now lies just outside the neutral ground in Spanish waters, having been ordered away from this side. The Flambeau is at Tangiers, and another Northern war-vessel, name unknown, is reported cruising about the mouth of the Mediterranean.

March 14.—After nightfall yesterday an armed sailing-vessel, flying the Stars and Stripes, in attempting to enter the harbor of Algeciras, was fired at twice. She then wore ship, and stood over to this side of the bay and anchored near the neutral ground. This morning she sailed over to Algeciras. The supposed cause of her being fired on is her violation of the port regulation forbidding the entry of vessels after sundown.

April 3.—By late advices from the United States we learn that a general naval court-martial had been convened in the Federal capital, and among the cases tried were those of the commanders of the Brooklyn and Keystone State, the offense of the first being his permitting the Sumter to leave the Mississippi River and go to sea while his vessel was stationed there to blockade one of the mouths of that river. It was proved in evidence that the Brooklyn was in an unseaworthy condition; that her boilers were unsafe under a full head of steam; and that she was in chase of another vessel at the time the Sumter made her escape. If the Brooklyn was not sea-worthy, why was she retained as one of the blockading fleet? It is a well-known fact that the Brooklyn was one of the strongest and fleetest vessels belonging to the Northern navy, and was, on the 30th of last June, in complete order in every respect. The commander of the Keystone State was not so fortunate. It was proved that he was in possession of authentic information respecting the whereabouts of the Sumter; that she was at the time lying at anchor in the Surinam River, near Paramaribo, Dutch Guiana; that she was poorly armed, and not fully manned; and that there was no excuse whatever for his not meeting her and giving her battle. The commander of the Keystone State was sentenced to be cashiered accordingly.

April 8.—Owing to the Sumter's boilers being completely worn out—they having been patched so often that no reliance can be placed in them—our commander has determined to disband and pay off his crew, and lay up the old ship until the expiration of the war. This news is received on all hands with great joy. We are heartily sick of the life of inactivity we have been leading for the past three months, though much regret will be felt at leaving the old ship which has carried us over so many miles of ocean and through so many perils.

April 9.—Paying off and disbanding the crew was commenced to-day. A portion of the crew was sent ashore this afternoon, and the balance will follow them to-morrow. In leaving the Sumter many pleasant associations are broken up—many cherished friends are separated. There is not a single man on her but who entertains for our old commander a sincere respect, and would be willing to follow him any where.

April 10.—Yesterday the paymaster finished paying off the crew, with the exception of eleven men who remain on board to take care of the ship.

SILENTIA.

SOFTLY the shadows come and pass
As the birds go lightly by,
Like waving blots on the shining grass
Or against the bright blue sky—
And I know that birds sing heavenly songs,
For in days now past and gone
This ear, that gives no sound or thrill,
Drank in each liquid tone.

In solemn silence, dark and deep,
Life's current slowly flows,
Its course as still, no echo breaks
The changeless, drear repose.
I see the eye grow quickly bright
And smiles on the faces dawn,
I thank my God for the gift of sight,
But a voice I never hear.

No footfall tells that friends are nigh,
For they come and go like ghosts—
Appear beside me quick as thought,
And as swiftly they are lost.
When a skilful hand sweeps over the chords,
Then I see the harp strings thrill;
But the wave of music finds no shore
To break on—all is still.

Then I think of Him, whose potent touch
Unstopped the deafened ear,
Thankful of heart, through Him I know
In the better land I'll hear—
When the angel sings through the ranks resound,
And the harpers' praises swell,
On "the shining shore" will the tide come in,
And the breakers say, "All's well!"

THE MURDER OF GENERAL ROBERT L. M'COOK.

WE illustrate on page 541 the brutal and cold-blooded murder of GENERAL ROBERT L. M'COOK, who was assassinated by miscreants calling themselves guerrillas, near Salem, Alabama, on 5th instant. The correspondent of the Philadelphia Press thus recounts the outrage:

Nashville, August 7.—Midnight.

The city is in a perfect uproar of excitement over the details of the death of the brave General Robert L. M'Cook, of Ohio. His gallant record in active service, and his love lying at the Commercial Hotel.

I write this at midnight, and therefore am unable to send you as full particulars as I could wish. On Tuesday last General Robert L. M'Cook, who was sick, for the time very sick, was in an ambulance near Salem, Alabama, on his way to his brigade. The ambulance was traveling over the usual military road, and about ten o'clock in the morning it arrived at a plantation where there was an abundance of water. After refreshing themselves they started on their journey again. Shortly afterwards the driver, whose attitude and position was quickly described, is supposed, for before the ambulance had proceeded three miles the driver discovered that a bullet was pierced in his breast.

It was impossible to think of flight, and General M'Cook's gallantry exhibited any idea of recreating him. The guerrillas leader ordered the ambulance to stop, the assassins at the same time surrounding it. The vehicle was then upset, and the sick officer turned into the road. While on his knees, helpless and sick, he was shot in the left ear, back, and shot through the side.

The wound was fatal, General M'Cook surviving it but a few hours. He bore his suffering heroically, and to the last manifested the undaunted courage, the true heroism which characterized his brother, General Alexander McDowell M'Cook, who fell at the head of his division like a true soldier and hero.

When the news of the murder became known among the camps, the excitement was intense. The Ninth Ohio, M'Cook's own regiment, on learning of the assassination, marched back to the scene of the occurrence, burned every house in the neighborhood and laid waste the lands. Several men who were implicated in the murder were taken out and hung to trees by the infuriated soldiery.

General Robert M'Cook was one of seven brothers who are or were in the Union service. One of them was killed at Ball Run. Another, the eldest, is General Alexander McDowell M'Cook, who was one of the most distinguished officers in the West. The father of these gallant men is a paymaster in General Buell's army. The whole country will feel that General Robert M'Cook has roused the West to a pitch of ungovernable fury.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 23, 1862.

THE BATTLE OF CEDAR MOUNTAIN.

THE Army of Virginia has drawn blood. A Confederate force, under Jackson and Ewell, from Gordonsville, on August 9, General Banks's corps—about 7000 strong—encountered some 15,000 of the enemy, under Jackson and Ewell, and fought them till nightfall. The battle did not lead to any substantial results that day. But on Sunday the rebels fell back toward the Rapidan, and sent in a flag of truce for permission to bury their dead. At that time heavy reinforcements were pouring in from the other corps composing Pope's army, and Sigel was in the front.

This may be deemed an auspicious commencement of the new campaign in Northern Virginia. We do not know, and if we knew would not publish, the number of General Pope's army. But it is no secret that, when assembled together, it is too strong for the force with which Jackson has been operating, and that its strength is being increased day by day. Troops are moving forward to reinforce it in very large numbers indeed. In the course of a couple of weeks it will require the bulk of the rebel army before Richmond to resist its onward march. The moment that army goes out to fight Pope, M'Clellan will move, and the result then will be a mere matter of time.

Our generals are thus carrying out to the letter, though in a different locality, the precise plan which General M'Clellan formed six months ago for the defeat and destruction of the rebel army in Virginia. According to that plan, while he moved up the Peninsula through Yorktown and Williamsburg, M'Dowell, with 40,000 men, was to come down on the rebel flank from Fredericksburg. But this scheme been fairly carried on, Richmond would probably have been in our possession in June last, and Joe Johnston's army would have been where Pope's now is.

With the circumstances which overthrew this plan every reader is familiar. Taught wisdom by experience, we are not likely to fall into again on a grander scale. Pope is moving down upon Richmond by way of Culpepper, while M'Clellan is making ready to leave you or one or both banks of the James River. In the course of a short while each of the two armies, M'Clellan's and Pope's, will be too strong to be kept in check by any thing short of the entire rebel army. When that moment arrives the game will be a forced one, as that of the crown.

But our armies must be reinforced, and that largely and promptly. By the time this paper is read troops should be pouring into Washington at the rate of several regiments a day: and though they will be raw recruits, not fit to meet veterans in the open field, they will be very well for garrison duty at Washington, and by brigading them with older regiments may, in the course of five or six weeks, be ready for good account in the armies. There should, however, be no tenderness about drafting; no listening to idle promises of more regiments by October; no swerving from the policy of the order of August 4th. If this rebellion is to be put down at all, it must be put down by arms and not sympathy developed. By October we must have 900,000 or 1,000,000 men in the field. If we have them, we shall have peace in the spring. If we have more blunders or changes of purpose prevent their being raised by that time, the war may last a couple of years longer.

THE CASE OF THE BORDER PROVINCES.

THE Prime Minister of Great Britain has followed the lead of the London journals in sneering at the British North American Provinces. Canada is a great country, he said in effect, but was not fool enough to raise and support a standing army of 50,000 men for the purpose of fighting battles in which she had no part, and have no possible interest, she is an ungrateful dependency of Great Britain, and not worthy of British protection. Such is his view of the case. Since, possessing a territory compared to which the British Islands are a mere speck in the ocean, and with resources in the mines of the United States, are accused by the leading statesmen of England of stupidity, meanness, and ingratitude because they do not spend their money in supporting armies to menace a friendly neighbor whom England, through manufacturing, commercial, and political rivalry would like to see ruined.

Our Canadian contemporaries are well able to answer these unjust libels in the fitting language. The sensible action of their Parliament, in refusing to raise an army which Canada did not need, is their best vindication. But when Lord Palmerston arrogantly notifies the Canadians that they must expect no more protection from the mother country if they not be wanting voices in the Province to assure his Lordship that Canada is abundantly able to protect herself, not only is there a lack of a discreet and liberal foreign policy which seeks no quarrels, provokes no attack, and aims to make friends, not enemies. This is a policy which Lord Palmerston never did and never will understand; but there are men in Canada, if we mistake not, who are capable of mastering and acting upon it.

At an early stage in the present civil war we took occasion to state that one of the most obvious consequences of the conflict which at present desolates this country would be a change in the political condition of the British North Provinces. The people of the United States have learned by doing what the past year to perceive that they can never be safe and prosperous as European Powers holds territory on this continent. So long as Great Britain can collect armies and launch gun-boats on the Great Lakes and on the western States will never be safe. And it is idle to say, as Canadians do, that we can collect armies and build gun-boats as well. Bombarding Toronto would not console us for the bombardment of Chicago or the capture of Kingston for the surprise of Detroit. Fighting, bombarding, and capturing cities is not the business we want to prosecute. We want peace—steady, perpetual peace—which can not be broke at the whim of a crazy politician or through a fury of an excited mob. To secure peace we must have material guarantees, and the only guarantee that we can obtain, or that ought to satisfy us, is the Independence of the British Provinces.

For many years prior to the present war it was taken for granted by the more reasonable class of statesmen in this country that we had nothing to fear from England; because her rulers and her people were, on the whole, friendly to us, and we were united to her by so many ties of relationship and commerce. This delusion has been dissipated by the experience of the past year. The Trent affair showed that Great Britain is ready to avail herself of any pretext and any safe opportunity to ruin that country, for the sake of destroying a commercial rival; and the same time demonstrating the failure of democratic institutions. This discovery must henceforth govern our foreign policy. We want neither England England nor our enemy; lying in wait for us, and seeking to destroy us whenever opportunity offers. We must forget all the old gas about a common origin, a common tongue, and so forth, and simply realize that Great Britain will be upon us if ever we give her the opportunity. We must either protect ourselves by building great fleets of ironclad vessels, and enlarging our canals so as to give them access to the lakes, at an enormous expense, or we must negotiate England out of Canada. The latter will be by far the simplest, most effectual, and most economical method of securing peace on this continent.

Whenever the political relations between Canada and Great Britain are discussed in this country, a certain class of Canadian politicians and papers begin to squeal lustily that the Yankees are going to annex them. Let these innocuous souls take heart. There is no party in this country which is anxious to annex Canada. If the Provinces come to this country, on the land, to be for admission to the Union, Congress would be much divided in opinion on the subject. It would be a long time in our history that if ever to have the British Provinces in the Union; but in many others it would be a decided detriment. The admission of the French Province of Lower Canada would add seriously to our dangers, and would be violently opposed by a large section of people in this country. On the other hand, while Canada would, in the event of annexation, gain much by becoming part of a great and powerful nation, she would at the same time lose something by surrendering her separate nationality; and it is not easy for a foreigner to decide which consideration would be more conclusive to her interest. If, after establishing their independence, and taking their place fairly among the nations, the people of the British Provinces felt that it would be to their interest to unite their destinies with ours, the subject would receive full consideration, and we should be a large party here who would welcome their admission to the Confederacy. But the application would have to come from Canada. When, in 1849, a large number of Canadians, comprising the bulk of the wealth and intelligence of the Province, petitioned for annexation for the open and avowed purpose of securing annexation, they received no encouragement from here. The people of the United States waited. They were in no hurry.

For the sake of seeing the British Provinces independent, and consequently no longer a menace to us, and no longer liable to be used as cat's-paw by our commercial and political rivals across the ocean, the United States would give and sacrifice much. Circumstances can be imagined under which they would go to war to achieve this end. But to force Canada into the Union no American will ever shoulder a musket or draw a sword.

THE LOUNGER.

VIGOR AND RIGOR.

THE spirit and unanimity of our national salvation may be stated in two words: vigor and rigor. The peculiar circumstances which fully justified the slow and tentative policy of the early war exist no longer. For the same reason that the Government was slow then, it should be rapid now. When it knew not upon whom to count; when there were neither men, money, nor material; when it was questionable whether the Border States were for us or against us; and it was doubtful whether the rebellion were not successful before it should fail, then the Government was compelled to temporize and delay. But now when the conspiracy is full of years, when it is manifest that the nation must hopelessly conquer the rebels, or that they will utterly subjugate the nation; and when the call for immense armies and vast armaments are prepared upon both sides, upon the war in a gigantic scale, to delay, to hesitate, to vacillate is ignominious, doubt is dangerous, delay is fatal.

What is the vital necessity of our situation? To strike the rebellion heavily upon every side; to weaken it at all points; to crush it everywhere, it, but entirely to uproot and annihilate it. If a fire seizes our houses we do not cover it up, we put it out. If a pestilence falls upon the citizens we do not only cure them, we change the very condition of the atmosphere which breeds and nourishes death. If a poisonous reptile in the garden, or a wild beast in the woods, threatens our children, we do not drive them away merely, we pursue them, seize them, drag them into day, and kill them beyond pendulousness of recovery. The vital necessity of the nation is, that rebellion shall be utterly destroyed in all its symptoms and its essence; and that the colossal and unsparing result purchased by the enormous expenditure of every thing precious to man in this war, shall be the absolute release of the country from the slightest risk of any return of the terrible conflict.

Father, mother, why have you given your son to the chances of civil war? Brothers all, why have we said good-by with smiles and heard of a death of our brave and beautiful without a tear and with only a quicker beating pulse? Friends, why stand we ready to-day to leave wife and child, if it must be so, and die in battle or of wasting sickness? Is it that things may be smoothed up for a little while? Is it that the next generation, that the children for whom we fight, may have the fighting to do all over again? Is it that the terrible injustice which bred the war shall have new chances to be untangled in our political life? Is it that the illusion and the development of Liberty? It is not the Government, but what the Government is for. The Government is a political organization to secure Liberty; and this war is here because that organization has been used to subvert Liberty. We preserve the Union, but what is the Union? It is a loaded power to secure the results contemplated by the Government.

Let us take care then that the conspiracy does not abide in the Union to subvert it step by step. Let us take care that it is Slavery, and not Liberty which is to be the result. By the speed and vigor of rebels to arms, the direct power of rebellious Slavery is given to the Commander-in-chief. By the unanimous spirit with which they rise to arms, the necessity of ending it is manifest. Energy, energy, energy—as it all that is asked of the Government. Danger to the Government is to delay, longer to wonder what Mr. Wickliffe will think, and what Mr. Vallandigham will say. Danger to the Government and to betray the hope of humanity. They may be good men and true, of that we do not speak. But they are not true if they take other men, and the conditions they impose are simply the means by which they use the opportunity. A policy as great, as generous, and as intelligent as the people, is the only policy that can save the nation. Timidity in the Government knows no music but vigorous; but does it sufficiently remember that rigor is essential to vigor? If it can not take risks, the rebels can and will.

THE BOOT ON THE RIGHT FOOT.

A GOOD test of our secret opinion of the real loyalty of certain papers and persons is to ask the question whether we would interfere the safety of the nation to them in the present crisis.

There are papers and persons of whom Mr. Wickliffe in his proposed resolution is to read that terrible diatribes you would fancy that a dark and desperate band of conspirators had laid their hands upon the throat of the nation and were swore to have its life-blood; were marshaled in battle-array and moving upon the very capital of the Government, justly exciting the ferocity of feeling with which they are denounced, and which is only equaled by the Abolitionists: while certain of our fellow-citizens had fallen into error, not without great reason, and were misled rebels.

"Let us suppress the Abolitionists," cries some timorous lover of order, "and the rebellion will end." Of course it will, you dear soul! and if all your fellow-citizens had been of your calibre and kidney there would have been no rebellion, and no fear of the tyranny of the Stuarts. If Otis and Patrick Henry had been Democrats "Hurrah for writing and the stamp act!" there would have been no bloody revolution. If Mirabeau and the French people had been Democrats "To be sure the people must have been annihilated, every liberty destroyed, and a few rich and remorseless people would have governed France; but there would have been no difficulty, except moral rot and general national decay."

"Let us suppress the Abolitionists!" But suppose you begin at the beginning. First subdue the common sense of the loyal people of the country: then you may subdue those who influence it. It is not what you call with an amusing paradox of abolitionism that has caused the war, but the opening of the eyes of the people so that they saw the nature of the conflict which a long period of the slavery is at the bottom of this rebellion. If there had been no slavery there would have been no rebellion. If there would have been no abolitionism. The temperance movement springs from drunkenness; and drunkenness was once said to kill his wife, don't you think that the tee-totalers are responsible for it?

Slavery is trying to kill the country. It had almost succeeded. "Watch! watch!" shouted the Abolitionists. "Watch!" shouted the people as crime was discovered, shot and stabbed right and left. "There! there!" cry the sensible Wickliffe Democracy—"Watch! watch!" cry the people. The Watch! Why the devil can't you hold your tongues? Let us suppress those fellows that cry Watch! watch! and all will be quiet again!"

Certainly: a dead dog or a dead nation are both very quiet. And a watch-dog is very annoyed, with its own consent, by a slave system like ours, is the deadest and meanest of all dead dogs.

A LITTLE COMMON SENSE.

IT is constantly said by those who resist an energetic prosecution of the Abolitionists that the freedom of the blacks would overrun the North with laborers, and take the bread from the mouths of our working men. The Irish laborers especially are told that to enlist for this war is to fight for men who are their direct rivals; and every possible appeal is made to their prejudices and ignorance by newspapers and politicians that care to pander to the basest passions of human nature.

It can not, therefore, be too constantly and earnestly repeated that the blacks live in a part of the country where they were born, to which they have the strongest attachment, and in which if cessarily prefer to live: that they naturally like the climate which is kindest, and the labor to which they are accustomed, and that the population is so much that they are wanted where they are, every man of them, and as many more, and twice as many more. The only reason that they do not say this is that they are not free men.

Why do we not send negroes to the South? Because they would not better themselves. Why do the slaves come North? Because they can better themselves by coming. If, therefore, any laboring man wishes to stay at home let him vote for what their interest to stay, and they won't trouble any body here at the North. If the slaves of the cotton-fields at the South were as free as those who cultivate the corn-fields at the North, they would not be forced to come here.

"But you don't mean to say that those fellows are equal to us?" says an indignant gentleman. Well, that is as it happens. Any man who believes himself a better man than he who doesn't, a man who gets drunk, and beats his wife, and curses his children, and is an ignorant, brutal sot, and public pest and nuisance, is no better man because his nose is red and his cheek dirty white. Robert Small is a much more honorable man than Robert Gamble, however dark the complexion the latter person may be.

And if the blacks are not equal to the whites—whatever the word equal may mean—then what? It is a universal law that the influx of the poor reinforces the vigor of the good one. The emigration of unskilled laborers from Europe to this country has promoted the native American laboring man to be of profit. If a race is inferior, a superior race need not be afraid of it. If God has made it inferior it will remain so, and you need not bother your brains about keeping it so. If it is made inferior, you may treat it with the utmost justice and charity, and still it will not become superior.

But if it is made inferior is still a human race, with the attributes and instincts of other men, and if you treat it with infamous injustice and call it tutelage, and outrage and degrade it out of humanity and call it Christianity; it may remain slavish and motionless; but God does not sleep, nor his justice slumber, and suddenly or unexpectedly as the superior races will fall into the most sanguinary civil war, because injustice to any man affects all men, and because man and man are more like, be human still.

If we want to keep the peace all round let us be just to every man. If you want the black laborer to stay at the South, do all you can to make him want to stay. Give him the same security there that we all have here, and he will trouble us less than a good many white men that could be named.

A PATRIARCH.

In his last book Gasparin warns us of probable trouble with Europe. "End your war," he says, "or you will have more war with Europe to-morrow for." Meanwhile our particular friend Atherton seems to be in no hurry. He remembers that the nation used to say, "When your enemy is eating himself up, keep off, he is doing your work for you pretty well." The English Government evidently thinks that we are in articulo: that a very few months will see our final decease; and that Great Britain will have nothing to do but to pick our bones at her leisure. The learned Spence, who does the secession for the London Times, sits in his arm-chair, bent eyes, lifts his admirable hands, and exclaims "There! you see it is impossible to subdue that gallant, kind-hearted, noble people." Meanwhile the bad and noble heroes who are fighting so hard to feast an open market for children and a shambles for human flesh.

Meanwhile, also, the feeling in this country that we must patiently relegate crime to the world which John Bull, is, at least, ceasing to be amiable. That benign old gentleman is wonderfully quiet. That benign old gentleman is wonderfully quiet. Instead of "Bull in a China Shop," as the bottle-green Patriarch. The Patriarch is a fat, elderly person, with a very sandy head, and very sandy hands, which he is always rubbing with an air of such complacent good-will to mankind that if you would think you beheld brotherly love embodied. He wears a spotless suit of bottle-green broadcloth, and turns his great face from side to side, showing what you think is a beaming expression, until you see that the bland smoothness is only the fleshy horizon cape of a monocle-cliff, and that the great lump of man twiddling his fingers with such infinite regard for the luxury of the process, and scrolled old hunks, who grinds the face of the poor and bloats into fatness upon the tears, and agony, and despair of the imbecile and weak and unfortunate.

This country will frankly own that it has been taken in for a long time by the bald pate, and the big paunch, and the beaming smoothness of John Bull. It has trusted him with a heart as big and surly, generosity. It believed him capable of one high emotion. It knew him to be capable of a bull, but it confided in his bellowing sound at the core. It saw in his history the steady, though bloody and difficult, development of great principles of free government, and it supposed he understood and valued them. That country finds him hoping unreasonably for its destruction; in every mean and stealthy way helping the assassins who are trying to steal to its throat; laughing at its misfortune, taunting it with an early and terrible doom; jeering, sneering, scolding, and spitting upon it—and the blandly rubbing his hands with a slight shrug of sanctimonious horror, wondering that he should be thought unfriendly.

With John Bull, as with every other bully, the question is, "Shall I gain or lose by sailing into this quarrel?" His action depends entirely upon that. Nor will he contemplate it precisely as we do. We may prove to our complete satisfaction that he has nothing to gain by it, and just as our proof is complete he may take a step into it. Let us end the war, therefore, before he has a chance to join in. One at a time. Is it worth while to drag on until we have another nation or two to fight as well as bull? Does not every day we wait only serve to spare any stroke that will end it soon and triumphantly?

OF ETIQUETTE.

WHAT a pity it would be, cries a recent writer, if this epitaph should be written for the nation, that it lost its own liberty in trying to free others!

This is a current platitude, and ought to be checked.

In the first place, if such an epitaph were written, there would be a nobler one than ever any nation in history. That of Rome [illegible] Here is a nation that lost its life in trying to steal the life, erty of other people." That is not a very pleasing epitaph. Or how would the writer like to have it said, "Here lies the nation that lived and flourished by depriving other people of their rights?" It would be a good and true epitaph of Rome. But the writer in question does not think so, but it would not be a very glorious account of this nation. Moreover, it is the truest form of words we can speak, to think that if Lafayette had died at the battle of Brandywine, where he was wounded in fighting for the liberty of another people, he would have died a fool's death or have left an inglorious memory? Could there have been a nobler, a more exquisitely Christian epitaph than this: "Here lies a Frenchman who died for the liberties of America!"

In the second place, this war is not the struggle of one people to free another. It is the effort of a nation to maintain the foundation of its own life and existence, which is the guarantee of ultimate liberty to every inhabitant of its soil.

But it is a natural and proper exercise of that war, it should, by the way and as a means of sure and speedier success, to free the slaves. Because the world believes its political and social system of the incessant cause of irritation, would it to an event of this war, that if the South, in the end, it were still unable to conquer, and its own civil liberties sank under the same system which destroyed the personal rights of other men, would it be better that the effort had not been made?

Which is the nobler cause? "Here lies a people that lost its life in trying to save that of another"? or this, "Here lies a nation that died because it would not help another to its life?" Death is not the worst catastrophe either for a man or a people. But to die of fear is inexpressibly ignominious.

HONORARY DEGREES.

COLLEGE degrees have this year acquired a new importance. Many of the best soldiers in the country have complimented with the degree of Doctor of Laws the two men in Europe who in most truly and steadily and ably defended the American question. Harvard confers the honor upon the English historian, John Lothrop Motley, and upon the Frenchman, Count Gasparin. It is interesting also that the Wesleyan University at Middletown has conferred the title upon Bishop Iowa, Bishop Ames.

This is the resolution upon the part of the representatives of educated America of the sympathy of thoughtful Europe. All men of a certain height of mind are in sympathy with every step in human development. Such men form but one party in all countries and times. The intellectual Republican party is not necessarily American. In England, for instance, while Lord Palmerston has a majority in the House of Commons, the intellectual leaders are following, John Stuart Mill is almost alone in the tone of his philosophy of the spirit of the time, and Motley is almost faithfully represents the tendency of the best English thought, and of that ideal England which symbolizes to the world the nation the perfection of Saxon development.

English civilization is to be estimated by such men as Mill and Motley, and Carlyle and the editors of the Times. France is to be judged by Gasparin, by Count Montalembert, by Laboulaye. In America, in the same way, is to be contemplated in a very few thinkers, not in the general talk of the country, which is always more or less that of ignorance and prejudice. If Palmerston were the best that England could show to-day, then would England be when to-day becomes history. If the words of those who point the inevitable and glorious tendency of our present struggle are forgotten, what kind of spectacle would these days of ours offer to the Future?

But the degrees conferred upon Mill, and Gasparin, and Ericsson, the United States clasp hands with the noblest spirit of the contemporary world.

HUMOR OF THE DAY.

SIDNEY SMITH, the celebrated wit, and a good many other people, was in the habit of saying that a hearty laugh was the best thing in the world. Dr. Abernethy engaged in a suit of venerable body, and he thought that a hearty laugh got to be a thing, going, and a bad, a bad, going?" when he saw the learned gentleman's patient with a lot of glass-cases, glass-pipes, carpets, pots, and perfumery, and finally this let me knock down."

"Go—go!" said Smith, gazing at the smiling counsel.

"What! Golly?" said the stranger, "I don't know what's he why you, then?"

"Why, I'll bet you bid on the lot," said Smith.

"Bet! Dey no bet if I don't," said the stranger.

"Why, did you not wink, and keep winking?"

"Wink—wink! Well, I did, and I did not, at me. I thought you were winking as much as to say 'Keep dark, I'll stick somebody into that lot of stuff;' and I winked as much as to say, 'I'll be hanged if you don't, mister!'"

"Walk with the Beautiful" is the title of some verses which have been going the round of some of the papers. Old Stuckly attempted to follow the advice, but after a considerable walk with the Beautiful, found she was met by an indignant wife. He says he will take the advice next time he puts a sweet on.

Make the best of every thing. If you have the impudence, exult that you have a genius prospect before you.

INDIAN OUTRAGE.—"Julius, I understand your aunt is dead." "Yes, Tom, and you would be dead, too, if she had of course." "Julius, she left me a big fortune at my death." "Tom, I'll be at the will read." "It will didn't read—a man read it." "I mean, what did she leave you? said brother?" "Why she left him de inside ob de house, an' me de outside."

A man of property, whose health happened to give way under long-continued intemperance, consulted Dr. S——, who said, "I can cure you if you will do as I tell you." His patient promised obedience. "Now," said the doctor, "you must drink no more." "Ye—yes man must drink no more. You will be arrested, convicted, and placed in a situation where you will be compelled to drink water, and in a short time your health will be perfectly restored."

"What is your fare, coachee?" said a stout gentleman, stepping from a cab-door in the rain.

COACHEE. "One shilling, Sir."

GENT. "One shilling! What an imposition for so short a distance!"

COACHEE. "Well, I'm sure it can't be any proper fare."

GENT. "Why, I'll give you a crown." [He is magnanimous.]

COACHEE. (Coachee is sworn.) "There, then, that's the full-blooded Britishest act I've known."

But let any man proclaim that he has got a new religion for you, and you will all Fill be bound there would be such a getting up stairs as you never did see.

Some years ago, one of the guards of a Liverpool coach, who had a peculiar way of telling a particular story along the railroad, called out to the driver as he left, "Jem, what's the name of that gentleman at that 'ere jug-ha'? Come, can't you tell me up on a gallop?"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

A BATTLE NEAR CULPEPPER.

GENERAL POPE and Stonewall Jackson have met at last, and a fierce battle has been fought, apparently without any decided advantage on either side, save that our advance held the ground on which the battle was fought, equivalent to a victory. On Friday General M'Dowell's cavalry had the extreme advance, near the Rapidan River, and were engaged in skirmishes all day, taking some prisoners. Saturday morning with a slight fog. Sunday morning, while a large rebel force was endeavoring to surround and cut him off, General Banks came up with four regiments of cavalry, and delayed the rebel advance. Sunday afternoon the battle commenced in earnest. Both under Jackson and Ewell, at a place about six miles south of Culpepper Court House. At first the contest was almost entirely by artillery, but at 6 o'clock the infantry became engaged, and a determined fight began. The rebels were in the woods—our men in open fields. General Banks right, under General Williams, suffered severely. At this time the rebels were joined in full force by Ewell's corps. General Pope arrived on the field accompanied by General M'Dowell and a staff of his corps. Then the fight was exhaustingly over, General Banks holding his original ground. The artillery on both sides was engaged until nearly 11 o'clock, the night being very clear, with bright moonlight. The rebels then withdrew, and our men lay on their arms. Monday morning a sudden attack on our left was made to take them, but failed. The fire of the rebel batteries was very destructive, but our losses were under arms and in position all night. General Banks is highly praised for his personal gallantry and the excellent conduct of his troops. The total loss is estimated at 2000 to 3000 killed and wounded on both sides. The rebel General Ewell were both in the battle, and General A. P. Hill came up with Ewell, and therefore there is definitely known at this time our men arrived. There was some skirmishing on Tuesday morning, but no general battle, and this troops in much exhausted that no general engagement was fought.

IT WAS A VICTORY FOR US.

On Sunday the rebels fell back on Gordonsville, and rent in a flag of truce for permission to bury their dead.

THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Secretary Stanton has issued two important orders, in the extension of the draft, and in keeping out of the operations of the lines. The first forbids all those persons liable to draft from leaving the United States or any other State or country, upon pain of arrest; and in all such cases the bonds of sureties are forfeited. The other is that no consigns all parties saying or doing any thing to obstruct the draft, or to give aid or comfort to the rebels, by order of any United States officer, State officer, or policeman.

NEW YORK'S QUOTA.

General Morgan, Governor of the State of New York, has announced the quota of the State, for the draft call, to be 63,233 men. The quota of the city of New York is 17,000. The quota of Brooklyn is 6,000. The quota of the Fifth Assistant-General, but officially stated that "abatements and deductions will be made from the quota to be offered by a State, any time before the draft is actually made, which will be equivalent to 63,233 men." Deductions and credited upon the draft as a proportionable reduction."

DESTRUCTION OF THE "ARKANSAS."

The following is from the Richmond Examiner of Thursday:

RICHMOND, August 6, 1862.

A dispatch from General Van Dorn to Secretary Mallory states that the ram Arkansas, after passing the Yankee fleet and Vicksburg, had been destroyed. She left Vicksburg on Monday morning, and passed through Yazoo Pass. After getting into the Mississippi, she was fired by the crew, and they then before the draft is actually made, which will be equivalent to 63,233 men." Deductions and credited upon the draft as a proportionable reduction."

GUERRILLAS BEATEN IN THE WEST.

A dispatch from Brigadier-General Schofield to General Halleck, dated St. Louis, 14th inst., states that Marmaduke's and Colonel M'Neil, with one thousand men, beat Porter-Price's guerrillas, numbering two thousand men, at Black River, on the 7th, and again near Stockton on the 9th inst. Several hundred rebels were killed and wounded in both engagements.

A "HERRIMAC" AT SAVANNAH.

The rebels on the Savannah River have created a sensation at Savannah. She has been stirred from the British steamer Fingal, which was purchased by the Secessionists last fall by the Fingal, which was purchased by the Secessionists last spring, and, it is said, is now quite a formidable engine of destruction. She is covered with a heavy coating of iron, has eight Columbiads, four 80-pound rifle guns, and two 24-pounders for stern guns. She is to be fully equipped as the Merrimac in shape and form, with a sweeper beak at her stem. She is expected to be ready for action in a week. The plan of the rebels is said to be: first, to destroy our fleet, and then to run down the Fingal and sink her at the mouth of the river, and thus bottle up the fleet. Should they succeed, they would be able to raise the blockade—blow up Hilton Head, Beaufort, and Port Royal, and, in fact, to recapture all the Secession strongholds on the coast.

DISASTERS AT THE NORTH.

Some extraordinary developments of latent treason have been made in the city of Chicago. A secret league, by the name of the United States District Court of that State, at Indianapolis, in May last, and established a secret organization, called the "Knights of the Golden Circle," whose purposes are declared to be treasonable. The Grand Jury found that there are 15,000 members of an order directly in league with the secessionists of Dixie. They have done so by a sworn oath to aid the rebels in their efforts to overthrow the Government. They have also been in the habit of holding secret meetings. The indictments have been found against the leaders, and the Copperhead Convention has since been bombarded—arrests were said. Many of those found have been indicted—absent from the session.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

REBEL SYMPATHIZERS ARRESTED.

FORTY merchants and ship-owners of Liverpool memorialized Earl Russell to prevent the fitting out of vessels of unlicensed law by the Federal cruisers in the Bahama waters, and Lord Russell has issued a circular to them justifying the proceedings of the cruisers, saying to the owners of vessels that they must not complain if the vessels of running the blockade.

The Queen has issued a proclamation, which prohibits British subjects taking letters of marque or general struggle.

FRANCE AND MEXICO.

A debate occurred in Parliament on the 12th ult. upon the defeats of Generals Forey and Bazaine, and the end England has now sent all the troops she could to Canada, and it rests with the Canadian people if further preparations to protect the colonies from invasion.

Lord Palmerston declared that he could not see why any immediate danger at any invasion of Canada. He believed that the people of Canada, whatever of authority taking such a course, would resist the invasion without the interference of British troops. He was sure that the people of Canada would not submit to be conquered by the United States. He could not see any reason for an act complimentary to Canada—that the Canadian people had been induced to believe that the maintenance of their independence was of the greatest importance to England, and that they ought to show them that they do not care a farthing about their adherence to England.

THE "TUSCORORA" AT WORK.

The United States steamer Tuscorora, which arrived at Queenstown on the 31st of July, has caused a new English excitement by her capture of the Confederate steamer Sumter. She really left Queenstown with a war cargo for the Confederates, but, as is England, where all her dealings shipped crew deemed best.

RACHEL GREENOUGH'S BOON.

SUNSET on the East River—and a lovelier stretch of sky never gladdened the eye of beauty-seeking poet! A warm little music-box of an April sunset was dimpling the turbid tides like the dances of invisible fairies, and the shining sheets of gold, melting away to wreathe themselves about the arch of a shadowy rainbow, whose subsun splendor glimmered with the heavens, were transformed into so many tiny kaleidoscopes, as the level sun streamed impartially through the prisms of the great city. Involuntarily the passers-by on all thronged to the rough wooden guards of the ferry-boat, and the usually stolid-looking ticket-taker, for the first time in a sudden thrill at his heart as the sky and all else seemed to dance with delight, and even suggested sun-threw down his ticket-punch, and with blind fury of tremulous waves: if he hadn't, he would have been an iron man indeed! When nature speaks in some instinctive tone, she is sure to interpret her language and how before it!

Rachel Greenough leaned over the guard-gazing intently at the bright sky, her lips apart, and a rush upon her generally colorless cheek. She was not a beauty, but she was a lady, and as she passed up the streets you would not have cared to look her twice. She was merely a nice-looking girl, rather tall, with black hair growing low on her forehead, and gray, thoughtful eyes. But the stalwart young man at her side firmly believed her to be a sweeter or truer face in all the wide world; and he ought to know, for hadn't he known her ever since they sat side by side on the broad-backed seat of the old red-school-house under the hill? Hadn't he dealt all his first written twaddle of the Old Poplar Farm which Rachel's father used to own?

"Isn't this a splendid shower, Rachel? How delicious the air is! Why, Rachel, you're not crying, are wistfully up into his face.

"Don't it remind you of the April rains that used to patter on the brook, where the wild honeysuckles and the hazel bushes grew, Charles? Oh, how I long to escape from the city, and smell the trees, and feel the sweet country winds upon my brow!"

"So do I, Rachel," he answered; "you can't imagine how beautiful it looks at the old farm—the violets are all blue upon the meadows, and the robins are the borders where you planted the crocuses look as they were edged with gold!"

"I wish I could see them!" murmured Rachel, with clasped hands.

"Then, dearest," urged the young man, eagerly, "why not accept my offer at once? Why need you stay here, working brain and health away, when I would so gladly for both? Rachel, don't you know how warm a welcome my mother would give you at the old homestead? Be my wife, dear, and the rose of the spring-time will be brighter to us than ever blossomed before!"

"Not yet, not yet, dear Charles," she said, in a low voice, but one which was too decided to admit of appeal. "My mission is still unaccomplished."

"Rachel," said the young man, "I won't deny that your language is beyond my comprehension. You always were too good and wise for me, darling; but I'll wait your own time, even if it should be a hundred years!"

She put her little hand in his, with a confiding gesture that made his manly heart leap with gratified pride.

"I don't wonder you are tired of the city, Rachel," he went on, basking in the sunshine of her blessed embarrassment: "for even I, who have only been here a week, feel as if I should die in the whirlpool. And you have lived here—let me see—"

"Ten years," said Rachel, quietly. "See, Charles, the boat has stopped: we are at the New York pier. And now, good-by!"

"And please tell me you again?"

"I don't know, dearest—in Heaven's own good time. Until then, good-by!"

Charles Harford stood on the crowded pier, heedless of hurrying passengers and shouting carmen —stood, in fact, as one who is in a dream, and is dazed from the level sunshine with one hand, watching the slender little figure of Rachel with its simple straw bonnet until it had disappeared in the swaying crowd. And then he turned slowly away, feeling as if he would encounter what was to be a boy again, with a boy's privileges of "crying out" his grief!

The April shower had tinkled out its brief tune, and floated away, through the golden archway of sunset, to surprise the flowers in other regions. On the narrow panes of the little city window the lingering rays yet sparkled like diamond-points, and all along the western horizon great ridges of luminous cloud-pearl lay heaped in fantastic piles and drifts. How it had rained and rained for a faint, sweet odor there was in the moist atmosphere!—a smell of springing grass, of wet earth, of budding and moss-patches, sending up aromatic incense through layers of brown, fallen leaves. Even in the city streets the April Greenough had a fresh, sweet charm, and stretched his gray head out of the window, like a captive who looks through prison-bars, and vainly yearns for his native fields.

"Come, father, tea's ready!" said his budding little brother-half, who, with one eye on the clock and one on the singing tea-kettle, had spread the round cloth-topped table, setting forth the cups and saucers of brilliant blue flowers, and the old-fashioned, elaborately disposing the rarity of the season—a bumdled of lingering cowslips, which she arranged in their necks in clear cold water—in the centre of the small feast. "I hear Rachel's footstep on the stairs; and here's your big cushioned chair, all ready for you. And I've bought the nicest radishes, and—why, father, what's the matter?"

Mrs. Greenough's cheerful, chirping tones had changed to an accent of grieved surprise as her eye fell on her husband's face.

"Oh, wife, wife!" groaned forth Abel, limping to his chair with rheumatism-cramped limbs, "it does seem as if I couldn't live, nohow, in this shutup hole. I don't mind it so much in the winter; but when it comes to be this time o' year I feel as though I was perishin' for a sight of the green that used to blow from the old pine woods under the Poplar Farm!"

Rachel's soft step, as she came into the room, with a fresh color in her cheeks and lips, interrupted him; but as she went on to give him his usual kiss of greeting he resumed:

"What's the use of all your book-learnin', and your ground-and-lofty work, daughter? It can't give me back the old meadows and pasture land that was my birthright, and it can't prop me into even our daily bread for us, and you are a good, dutiful child, but what's the use?" Livin' ain't livin' at this cramped-up, smoky place, and I'm only a might as well starve to death as pine to death! Why don't you speak, Rachel? Haven't you got a hand a chance, and leave the poverty-stricken old folks to take care of themselves?"

Rachel pressed her head close to her father's burning brow. "Father, you are tired. You will feel better by-and-by."

But the old man, softened by those gentle tones, clasped his arms about his daughter's neck with a moment of repentant sobs and tender caresses.

"Late that night Rachel sat at her writing, the shaded gaslight throwing its little circle of brilliance upon the pale, pure face of the fair young person, which had been her companion for so long.

"Yes, I can write it now," she said, musingly, and the old lady, who was nodding in her chair, having long since laid aside the silver-bowed spectacles, and also borne testimony to the fact that she had borne her company during the earlier part of the evening.

"I know it, mother, but I must work some time yet. Don't sit up for me!"

"Why, what are you to buy about?"

"Mother," said Rachel, leaving her work to come and kneel down in the dark, formed by the head resting on the lap that had been her refuge in so many childish troubles, "I am writing a book, and it is nearly completed."

"A book? dear me, child; won't it take you years?"

"Not quite," said Rachel, smiling; "but particularly with it to be a secret for the present."

"Well, then, I'll say nothing about—not even to father. But don't work yourself to death, darling!"

Rachel kissed the withered forehead, and went back with renewed vigor to her toil.

A year had come and gone since then a year, and the May days were growing longer and sweeter, when Rachel came home one evening earlier than usual.

"Father, would not you like to take a long ride tomorrow, with somebody else?"

"A ride?" repeated the old man, mechanically, "a ride into the country? Oh yes, let us go!" I should enjoy it amazingly, and perhaps the old eyes more good than all the rose-water in the world!"

The next day came, and as the carriage rolled through fragrant country roads, where the banks were starred with the wild-flowers of early spring, and the gnarled old apple-trees shook their coronals of pink blossoms overhead, Rachel Greenough's heart beat with the glad feelings he had not known for so long, long ago!

"Rachel, this is something like living! But isn't this the Wayseborough road we are turning into? Do you mean to visit the Old Poplar Farm?"

"Would you like to, dear father, father?"

"Would I like it, daughter?" repeated Abel, almost overpowered with joy.

Rachel leaned over to clasp the old man's tremulous hand.

"Dear father, you shall see it!"

There it lay in the mellow noonday sunshine, the stately pyramidal poplars, the orchard-trees, gay of old, in front of the portico, and the grove of dark cedars still casting eldritch shadows on the velvet green at the northern end of the house. The summer sucks waved its clusters of bloom around the porch-pillars, as if each day had elapsed since the Greenoughs passed out beneath them with a breaking heart; and the brown-breasted robins, darting in and out of the cedar-trees, and every-where, even the new-comers shyly, as if uncertain whether they were friends or foes. Not a patch of ground in the grove but was green and roof—not a prayer stain on the antique well-sweep, so clearly outlined against the blue sky, but what it might have been polished it yesterday.

"But, Rachel," said the old man, uneasily, "why is no one stirring about the place? Why does it look so deserted?"

"Father, I bought it a few days since, father, and it has been vacated, ready for the new occupants."

"And where are they, daughter?" he question-ed, as he stood on the sunshiny porch looking wistfully about him.

"Here, dearest father!" said Rachel, throwing her arms about his neck. "We are the owners of the dear old farm once more. I bought it, and paid for it yesterday. Will you take it as a gift from your own little Rachel?"

"Father, it is for this that I have been toiling during the last eleven years. My work is done at last—tell me that you are happy!"

But ere Abel Greenough could make a full figure darted from the wall of cedars, and Charles Harford caught the old man's prostrate form.

"Mysterious little riddle! And I should never have known it but for the letter accidentally revealed the name of the anonymous purchaser of the Old Poplar Farm! But, Rachel, am I right in concluding that the mission you have so often spoken of is at length fulfilled? Rachel, is the time come at last—tell me that you are my little wife?"

Nobody could ever assert distinctly just what Rachel answered to this appeal, but it certainly seemed "Yes." For when the purple-and-gold-winged butterflies swarmed in early June around the snowy blooms of the great white rose-tree under the southern windows, every bud was gathered to deck the bridal-wreath of a quiet bride whose dress of moonlight-colored silk was scarcely more spotless than her heart.

Old Abel Greenough was in his glory that night, welcoming once more to his home the friends and neighbors from whom he had been long ago, and never weary of telling how it was that he had come back to them.

Charles, he said, as the handsome young bridegroom came to tell Rachel that the clergyman was waiting—and it strange one last time—was now but in her hair, "I should almost grudge my little one to any one else than you. Take her, my son, for she is worth half a gold a wife as she has been a daughter, you've got a treasure worth all the diamonds of Golconda!"

And so Rachel Greenough was married at last under the peaceful roof of the Old Poplar Farmhouse.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We continue our series of illustrations of THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, from sketches by our artist, Mr. A. R. Waud. On page 532 we give a general view of

HARRISON'S LANDING.

Mr. Waud writes: "From the top of the old Harrison Mansion a good view can be obtained of the opposite shore, from whose thickly-wooded banks peeped till recently the old Rufin House, now destroyed by the Union troops, in retaliation for the attack upon them that locality on our crossing the river is, as usual, lively with shipping of all kinds, large and small; around the dock, near the middle of the picture, the craft belonging to the Sanitary Commission is clustered, taking off the sick. On the left is the dock, formed by about twenty barges, for the distribution of forage. Here there is always a crowd of wagons waiting to be served; and on the barges numerous tents of all conceivable shapes are raised for the convenience of the wharfmen and contrabands. In the foreground the tents of the principal hospital of the army appear partly in what was once the garden of the Harrison Mansion.

BERDAN CHECK.

"Herron Creek, near Kinsman's Landing [of which we give an illustration on page 533], winds through a soft, oozy marsh, covered with rank and luxuriant grass, and bordered by a dense row of which bit a soldier last week so severely that he died. It makes a feature in the landscape quite picturesque, and reminds the sight of our line unpregnable.

KIMMIDGE'S CREEK.

"Kimmidge's Creek [which we illustrate on page 533] forms the defense of the extreme left, and is an impassable one. The creek on the right. It is a savage-looking hollow, filled with felled and burned trees, dense shrubbery, marsh and small-coal-pens. Our line is bounded on the one in the James; as also in Herron Creek, on the right wing.

"Much as could be said at the North may affect to despise mud digging, it does not detract from the comforts—such as they are—of camp to know that the Army of the Potomac has made the position impregnable.

"This sketch will readily explain why the rebels have not found it in their hearts yet to attack M'Clellan. Frowning forts rising in embrazured tiers above the high-pits behind solid earthworks, mounted with heavy guns, and defended by the Army of the Potomac, are a formidable front which the Chivalry care to butt their heads against."

THE BALLOON AT WORK.

On page 541 we illustrate the departure of one of the Army Balloons, on board a river steamer, for a reconnoissance toward Richmond. The unwieldy mass sways gently on the breeze, and presents a very remarkable appearance as it moves up the river.

THE BURNING OF RUFFIN'S HOUSE.

We illustrate this affair on page 540, from a sketch by an officer of the Mahaska. On 31st July the rebels opened fire upon our transports and troops at Harrison's Landing, from field batteries on the opposite side of the river. The Tribune correspondent describes the affair thus:

"The river opposite the landing is narrower than at any other part opposite the ground on which our army is encamped, there being only about half a mile wide. More than three-quarters of this is occupied by a long, narrow island in the river. Directly opposite Harrison's Landing is the rapid flanks of the rebel guns, while the broad arm of the river is filled with a number of shot and shell, bursting and whizzing in the most lively manner, accompanied by our whole camp, and giving the enemy a 'rale shew' at us.

I had a good chance of observing the position of the rebel batteries, as they were then in number, one being directly opposite the mail-boat landing, another about a mile further up, and a third about a mile further down the wharf. I should think each battery consisted of about ten guns, all of which, I and 12 pounders. They were worked well and had the range nearly exact, but most of their time-fuses were cut too short for us.

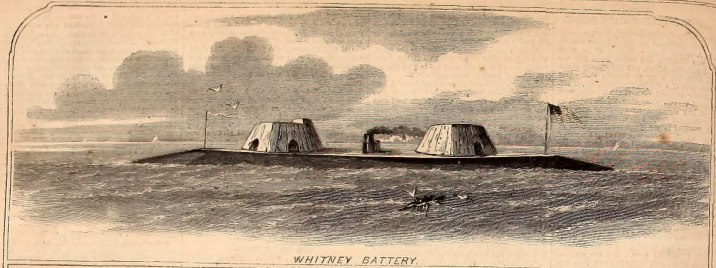
The whole of our gun-boats except one were away up the river some miles above the mouth of the Herrick Creek, Yorktown. The one that was there was ordered down to us in that direction; the best thing we could do was to endeavor to silence the guns, so we up and engaged the battery opposite to the mail-dock. Its splendid rifle guns were soon getting into the swash. Soon after the gun-boat opened fire on the rebel batteries, our guns were their blazing contents into the cowardly foe that never showed himself to the enemy. Now the gallant gunmen of the First Connecticut Artillery (Colonel Tyler) were not to be outdone in their determination to silence half a mile away. There was only a guard left over the guns, the men being crowded the above distance from them, and in a few seconds the 32-pounders and the splendid Whitworth blazed away at the rebels, producing an electric effect, and in a few rounds completely silenced the rascals, who ran for their lives miles away out of range.

On the following day two regiments of regulars from General F. J. Porter's corps, crossed the river under cover of the guns of the Mahaska. As there was no landing-place it took them a long time to effect a landing. Squads of the enemy's horse were seen riding along the river banks some time previous, and much excitement was manifested while our troops were crossing. A landing is effected by the two regiments at six o'clock, and in a short time after dense clouds of smoke were seen issuing from the houses of the secesh, which were about one mile from the banks of the river. Ten houses—among others that of the Hon. Edmund Ruffin—were burned down by our troops. They landed under the protection of our gun-boats. Cheers rent the air as the fire was observed breaking out on the other side. When all was consumed our men returned.

OUR NEW IRON-CLADS.

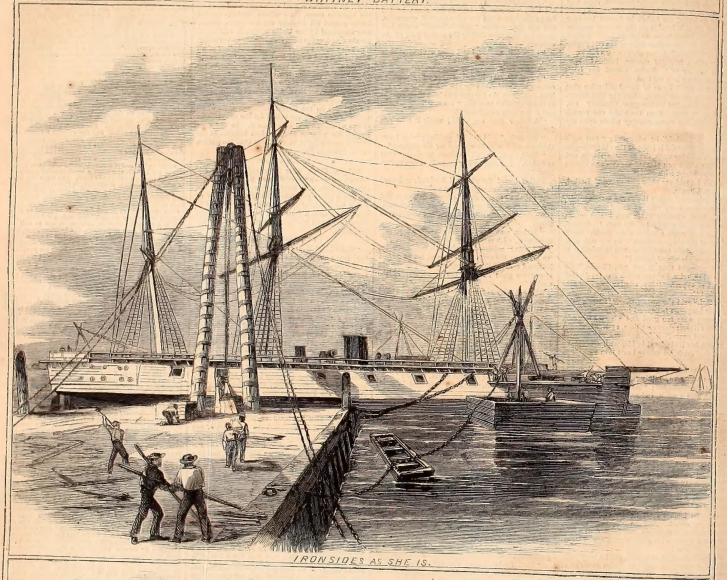
On page 536 we give illustrations of the new iron-clad frigates Ironsides, which is being constructed in this city, and the Monitor, at the Novelty Works; and the Whitney Battery, which has just been completed at the Navy-Yard at Sackett's Harbor, in this city. The following descriptions will add to the value of the illustrations:

THE "IRONSIDES."



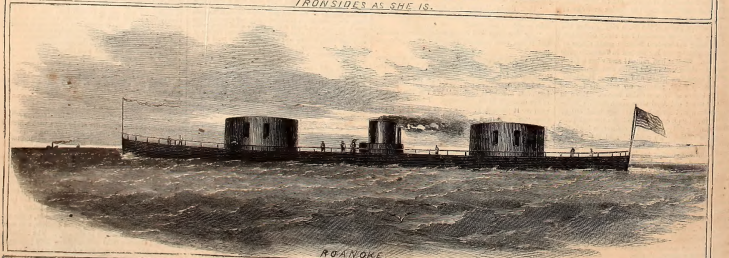
This splendid vessel is a model from the yard of William Cramp, Philadelphia, on the 5th ult. She is the first iron-clad vessel constructed in Philadelphia, and her name was duly sung over and Philadelphia in ship-launching style—"Miss Ironsides." Her dimensions are the same as those of the Merrimac, and she is built upon the model of the Ironsides into her native element. She is the first iron-plated war-vessel ever built in this city by the United States Government, and is constructed from plans and specifications presented to the Navy Department last September by Merrick & Sons, of Philadelphia, who are the sole constructors with the Government. She in turn contracted with Cramp & Sons; also with the Bridesburg Rolling Mills, for the plating. For the hull-plating, receiving to themselves the construction of the machinery and the screw-propeller, with the several parts. The contract is dated October 15, and the vessel is to be delivered complete in all her parts, ready for service, in 150 days from that date. She is a full-rigged ship, and Naval Constructor Henry Hoover, her builder, says that she will be fast 6 knots under sail. She has been, being 2250 tons, and having a berth, gun, and spar deck, the latter being 180 feet. The bulwarks are of iron, filled in solid and caked, and the average thickness of the deck is about one foot below. The living compartments are a point four feet below her water-line, and extends to her spar-deck. The armament consists of four horizontal direct-action steam-engines, with cylinders of 50 inches diameter and 24 inches stroke, fastened directly to the revolutions per minute, and drive a brass 4-bladed propeller of 14 feet diameter and 18 feet pitch. The rudder is also in number (horizontal tubular), and is 25 feet long from the top to the bottom, and 5 feet 6 inches in thickness. The armament consists of 10 Dahlgren 11-inch Dahlgren guns on the gun-deck, and two 100-pounder Parrotts guns on the spar-deck. The vessel is to be fitted for iron shutters five inches thick, worked from the inside. At the bow is an ample steam windlass, and at the hull an steam, she will have three masts, and be bark-rigged, her topmasts and topsail yards to be housed when they are lowered, and leave simply the three lower masts in view. When in action all the sails will be carried previous then shot or shell, and are below the spar-deck; the compartments of the vessel are to be divided by a strong shot-proof iron bulk-out, which rises above the spar-deck, and runs within the vessel from one side to the other. This signals communicate with the officers of all the compartments, and in case the vessel can carry a large crew, sufficient to fill all the guns, and to work the vessel, unable to shot and shell, she will seek close action, and lie across of her enemy's spar, or by the use of her ram, disarm her opponent. Her light draught of water, 16 feet, will enable her to go in shore where a large vessel of 24 feet keel into and Sumter can be visited by her, and she may be able to make an impression on Charleston before they are repossessed by the United States.

THE "MONITOR."



She is to be clothed amidships with iron plates ranging from three and a half inches to four and a half inches thick, and will be so caused four feet below her water-line. She is to have two revolving turrets, each of which will contain but one gun on the Monitor, with a powerful ram on her bow. The plating on the ram will be about 12 feet below thick and twenty feet long, thus giving her a wedge on her bow of twenty feet. Each of the turrets will be twenty feet diameter inside, the plating of which will consist of three courses of inch iron. Each plate for a turret is also feet in length by forty inches wide. Two courses of iron bolts are placed in each, and they are of steel, solid, in a powerful hydraulic press. The bed plate of the turret is of a circular form, and the deck is also of a circular form. A plate to be bent in placed, upon the centre bed plate of the turret, and the plates are then to be ground forms up into the centre, and the bolts driven home. The plates are to be driven against the top block. The pressure is to be on each plate is about 100 tons. In the upper curve, is three and a half million pounds. By this means the plates are to be brought to a perfect uniformity and accuracy secured for the whole. The bending of the plates is done for the use and also for a barrel is also fast in length by forty inches wide. Two courses of iron bolts are placed in each, and they are of steel, solid, in a powerful hydraulic press. The bed plate of the turret is of a circular form, and the deck is also of a circular form. A plate to be bent in placed, upon the centre bed plate of the turret, and the plates are then to be ground forms up into the centre, and the bolts driven home. The plates are to be driven against the top block. The pressure is to be on each plate is about 100 tons. In the upper curve, is three and a half million pounds. By this means the plates are to be brought to a perfect uniformity and accuracy secured for the whole. The bending of the plates is done for the use and also for a barrel of the frigate is quite a different and difficult operation to perform compared with the bending of armor plates. Each plates time has to be bent to the proper curve to suit the very particular position in the vessel's side it is to be bent into, but the edges also, must be bent to suit the particular position they are to occupy. The compartments are to be furnished by several compartments, and will be divided by iron bulk-heads. When they arrive they resemble huge shallow iron pans, varying in depth from the centre to the curve foot, and in breadth from twenty-two to twenty-four inches. The plates are to be about one inch and a half inches. One of sixteen and a half feet in length and twenty-two inches in breadth and two hundred pounds, one of twenty-two feet in length, for the ram, weighs over four tons. Each plate is to be tested before they are bent, and the operations connected with bending them are necessarily slow and tedious, requiring the most extreme greatest care and skill to conduct properly. Of course it is impossible to bend each plate exactly to the curve required, at first bend to nearly a white heat, and then, with a movable arched bed, the plate is forced to the curve required to conform to the curve. To prove for bending is quite different from the bending of the gun-plate.

THE GUNS.



On page 537 we give a series of illustrations representing the manufacture of the guns with which the Ironsides and the new Monitors are to be armed. They are known as the called Dahlgren guns, having been first made by Captain Rodman, of the artillery, who afterwards called in the aid of Mr. Dahlgren in the service. Their peculiarity consists in their size, which is far greater than that of any other guns in the service. The interior or bore-space of water is poured through the muzzle, coming out at the vent, so that the gun is cooled from the inside, thus obviating flaws. There are being cast of these guns at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, quite a large number, some 15-inch, some 20-inch, and we hear of some even larger in the bore. The 20-inch guns will throw a solid ball weighing 1500 pounds, which would go through the side of any vessel ever constructed, or batter down almost any wall. It is designed to arm the new Monitors and all our coast fortifications with these guns.

CHAPTER V.

WHEN Magdalen appeared in the parlor, shortly before seven o'clock, not a trace of discomposure was visible in her manner. She looked and spoke as quietly and unconcernedly as usual.

The lowering distrust on Captain Wragge's face cleared away at the sight of her. There had been moments during the afternoon when he had seriously doubted whether the pleasure of satisfying the grudge he owed to Noel Vanstone, and the prospect of earning the sum of two hundred pounds, would not be dearly purchased by running the risk of discovery to which Magdalen's uncertain temper might expose him at any hour of the day. The plain proof now before him of her powers of self-control relieved his mind of a serious anxiety. It mattered little to the captain what she suffered in the privacy of her own chamber, so long as she came out of it with a face that would bear inspection and a voice that betrayed nothing.

On the way to Sea-View Cottage Captain Wragge expressed his intention of asking the housekeeper a few sympathizing questions on the subject of her invalid brother in Switzerland. He was of opinion that the critical condition of the gentleman's health might exercise an important influence on the future progress of the conspiracy. Any chance of a separation, he remarked, between the housekeeper and her master was, under existing circumstances, a chance which deserved the closest investigation. "If we can only get Mrs. Lecount out of the way at the right time, whispered the captain, as he opened the lane's garden gate, "our man is caught!"

In a minute more Magdalen was again under Noel Vanstone's roof; this time in the character of his own invited guest.

The proceedings of the evening were for the most part a repetition of the proceedings during the morning's visit. Mr. Noel Vanstone vibrated between his admiration of Magdalen's beauty and his glorification of his own possessions. Captain Wragge's inexhaustible outflows of information — relieved by delicately-indirect inquiries relative to Mrs. Lecount's character — perpetually diverted the housekeeper's jealous vigilance from dwelling on the looks and language of her master. So the evening passed, until ten o'clock. By that time the captain's ready-made science was exhausted, and the housekeeper's temper was forcing its way to the surface. Once more Captain Wragge warned Magdalen by a look, and, in spite of Mr. Noel Vanstone's deplorable protest, wisely rose to say good-night.

"I have got no information," remarked the captain, on his way back. "Mrs. Lecount's brother lives at Zurich. He is a bachelor; he possesses a little money; and his sister is his nearest relation. If he will only be so obliging as to break up altogether he will save us a world of trouble with Mrs Lecount."

It was a fine moonlight night. He looked at the sky, and at the trees, and at the house, to see if her intractable depression of spirits had seized on her again.

No! her variable humor had changed once more. She looked about her with a flaunting, feverish gayety; she scoffed at the bare idea of any serious difficulty with Mrs. Lecount; she mimicked Noel Vanstone's high-pitched voice, and repeated Noel Vanstone's high-flown compliments, with a bitter enjoyment of turning him into ridicule. Instead of running through her part as before, she sauntered carelessly by her companion's side, humming little snatches of song, and kicking the loose pebbles right and left on the garden-walk. Captain Wragge hailed the change in her as the best of good omens. He thought he saw plain signs that the family spirit was at last coming back again.

"Well," he said, as he lit her bedroom candle for her, "when we all meet on the parade to-morrow, we shall see, as our nautical friends say, how the land lies. One thing I can tell you, my dear girl—I have used my eyes to very little purpose if there is not a storm brewing to-night at Mr. Noel Vanstone's domestic atmosphere."

The captain's habitual prudence had not misled him. As soon as the door of Sea-View Cottage was closed on the parting guests Mrs. Lecount made an effort to assert the ascendency which Magdalen's influence was threatening already.

She employed every artifice of which she was mistress to ascertain Magdalen's true position in Noel Vanstone's estimation. She tried again and again to lure him into an unreserved expression of the pleasure which he felt already in the society of the beautiful Miss Bygrave; she threw herself in and out of every weakness in his character as the frogs and efts twined themselves in and out of the network of a fishing-net. But she made one serious mistake which very clever people in their intercourse with inferior intellectual interests are almost universally apt to commit—she trusted implicitly to the folly of a fool. She forgot that one of the lowest of human faculties — cunning—is exactly the capacity which is often most largely developed in the lowest of intellectual natures. If she had been honestly angry with her master she would probably have frightened him. If she had opened her mind plainly to his view she would have astonished him by presenting a chain of ideas to his limited perceptions, which they were not equal enough to grasp; his curiosity would have led him to ask for an explanation; and by practising on that curiosity, she might have had him at her mercy. As it was, she set her cunning against his, and the fool proved a match for her. Mr. Noel Vanstone, to whom all large-minded motives under heaven were inscrutable mysteries, saw the small-minded motive at the bottom of his housekeeper's conduct with as instantaneous a penetration as if he had been a man of the highest order. Mrs. Lecount left him for the night foiled, and knowing she was foiled, left him with the certain sense of her opponent, and a low-lived longing in her elegant finger-nails to set them in her master's face.

She was not a woman to be beaten by one defeat, or by a hundred. She was positively determined to think, and think again, until she had found a means of checking the growing intimacy which had arisen at once between Miss Bygrave and her master. Her own reputation, the absolute security of her own position, were both at stake. Her very livelihood depended on the success with which she could oppose the conspiracy that was now forming against her. Under these circumstances, what was the safe course to take with her master?

If she suddenly told him, when they met the next morning, what had passed through her mind that night, her knowledge of Mr. Noel Vanstone warned her that one of two results would certainly happen. Either he would be angry and disputatious; would ask for proofs; and, finding none forthcoming, would accuse her of alarming him without a cause to serve her own jealous ends of keeping Magdalen out of the house—or he would be seriously startled, would clamor for the protection of the law, and would warn the Bygraves to stand on their defense at the outset. If Magdalen only had been concerned in the conspiracy this latter consequence would have presumed so great importance in the housekeeper's mind. But seeing the deception as she now saw it, she was by no power a woman to foil in defeating the captain's inexhaustible fertility of resource at its very outset. "If I can't meet this impudent villain with plain proofs to help me," thought Mrs. Lecount, "I may open my master's eyes to-morrow morning, and Mr. Bygrave will shut them up again before night. She raised a playing-card with all his own cards under the table, and he will win the game to a certainty if he sees my hand at starting."

This policy of waiting was so manifestly the wise policy—the wily Mr. Bygrave was so sure to have provided himself in case of emergency with evidence to prove the identity of Miss Garth and his niece had assumed for their purpose—that Mrs. Lecount at once decided to keep her own counsel the next morning, and to pause before attacking the conspiracy until she could produce unanswerable facts to help her. Her master's acquaintance with the Bygraves was only an acquaintance of one day's standing. There was no fear of its developing into a dangerous intimacy if she merely allowed it to continue for a few days more, and if she permanently checked it, at the latest, in a week's time.

In the interval what measures could she take to remove the obstacles which now stood in her way, and to provide herself with the weapon which she now wanted?

Reflection showed her three different chances in her favor—three different ways of arriving at the necessary discovery.

The first chance was to cultivate friendly terms with Magdalen, and then, taking her unawares, to entrap her into betraying herself in Noel Vanstone's presence. The second was to write to the elder Miss Vanstone, and to ask in the same alarming terms for putting the question) for information on the subject of her younger sister's whereabouts, and of any peculiarities in her personal appearance which might enable a stranger to identify her. The third chance was to penetrate the mystery of Mr. Bygrave's seclusion, and to ascertain at a personal interview whether the invalid lady's real confidante might not possibly be the motive agency for keeping her husband's secrets. Resolving to try all three chances in the order in which they are here enumerated, Mrs. Lecount was aware by Magdalen on the day that was now already at hand, Mrs. Lecount at last took off her dressing-gown, and allowed her weaker nature to join with her for a little sleep.

The dawn was breaking over the cold gray sea as she lay down in her bed again. The last idea in her mind before she fell asleep was characteristic of the woman—it was an idea that threatened the captain. "He has trifled with the sacred contempt of my husband, and caught the Professor's widow. "On my life and honor I will make him pay for it!"

Early the next morning Magdalen began the day—according to her agreement with the captain—by taking Mrs. Wragge out for a little exercise at an hour when there was no fear of her encountering the public visitors. She pleaded hard to be left at home; having the Orient Cashmere Robe still on her hands, and thought it necessary to read her directions for dress-making, for the hundredth time at least, before (to use her own expression) she could "screw up her courage to put the scissors into the stuff." But her companion would take no denial, and she was forced to go out. The one guileless purpose of the life which Magdalen now led was the resolution that poor Mrs. Wragge should not be made a prisoner on her account—and to that resolution she mechanically clung, as the last token left her by which to know her better self.

They returned later than usual to breakfast. While Mrs. Wragge was up stairs straightening herself from head to foot to meet the morning inspection of her husband's orderly eye, and while Magdalen and the captain were waiting for her in the parlor, the servant came in with a note from Sea-View Cottage. The messenger was waiting for an answer, and the note was addressed to Captain Wragge.

The captain opened the note and read these lines:

"DEAR SIR,—Mr. Noel Vanstone desires me to write and tell you that he proposes enjoying this fine day by taking a long drive to a place on the moors, called Dead Man's Cross, and that he intends to have the pleasure of a carriage airing given him the pleasure of your company, and Miss Bygrave's company on this occasion. I am kindly permitted to be one of the party; and if I may say so without impropriety, I would venture to add that I shall feel as much pleasure as my master if you and your young lady can favor us with your company.

"SHE LOOKED EVERY YEAR OF HER AGE AS SHE MIXED THE SPIRIT WITH WATER."

"I remain, dear sir, your obedient servant, all connect to join us. We propose leaving Aldborough and, if given a clear stage, [illegible]

"Believe me, dear Sir, your humble servant,
"VINCENT LECOUNT."

"Who is the letter from?" asked Magdalen, as, making a change in Captain Wragge's face as he read it, she saw that they want with us at Scot Cottage?"

"Pardon me," said the captain, gravely, "this requires consideration. Let me have a minute or two to think."

He took a few turns up and down the room—then suddenly stepped aside to a table in a corner, on which his writing materials were placed.

"I am not sure, Magdalen," said he, taking the pen, speaking concisely to himself. He winked his brown eye, took up his pen, and wrote the answer.

"Can you speak now?" inquired Magdalen, when the captain had left the room. "What are you like letter say, and how have you answered it?"

The captain placed the letter in her hand. "I have accepted the invitation," he replied, quietly.

Magdalen read the letter. "Hidden enmity to discovery," she said, "and open friendship to-day. What does it mean?"

"It means," said Captain Wragge, that Mrs. Lecount is even sharper than I thought she was, if she found you out."

"Impossible!" cried Magdalen. "Quite impossible in the time!"

"I can't say how she has found you out," proceeded the captain, with great composure; "she may know more of your voice than we suppose she know. Or she may have discovered you in retrospect, rather a suspicious family; and my thing suspicious, in which a woman was concerned, may have been in my mind back in the morning call of years in Vauxhall Walk. Whichever way it may be, the meaning of this sudden change is clear enough. She has found us out, and she wants to put her discovery to the proof by slipping in as unsuspected a person as ever cover of a little friendly talk. My experience of humanity has been a varied one, and Mrs. Lecount is not the first by many dozen in petticoats whom I have had to deal with. All the world is divided into two parts—and out of the scenes on our little stage is shut in from this moment."

With those words he took his copy of Joyce's Scientific Dialogues out of his pocket. "You've done with already, my friend!" said Magdalen, recognizing his useful information a farewell smack with his hand, and looking it up in the cupboard. "Such is human popularity!" continued the indomitable vagabond, putting the key cheerfully in his pocket. "Yesterday I was in favor—to-day I am not. To-day I don't care that for him!" He snapped his fingers and sat down to breakfast.

"I don't understand," said Magdalen, watching at him angrily. "Are you leaving me to my own resources for the future?"

"My dear girl!" cried Captain Wragge, "can't you accustom yourself to my dash of humor yet? I have done with you for the time, since, simply because I am quite sure that Mrs. Lecount has done believing in me. Haven't I accepted the invitation to Limmeridge in her mind easy. The help I have given you already counts for nothing—remember that. The help I am going to give you now. My honor is concerned in bowling out Mrs. Lecount. This last move of hers has made it a personal matter between us. The woman actually thinks she can take me in!!!" cried the captain, striking his knife-handle on the table in a transport of serious indignation. "By Heavens, I never was so insulted before in my life! I forget my character in to the table, my dear, and give me half a minute's attention to what I have to say next."

Magdalen obeyed him. Captain Wragge cautiously lowered his voice, and began as follows:

"I have told you all along," he said, "the one thing needful is never to let Mrs. Lecount catch you with your wits unsteadied. I say the same, after what has happened this morning. Let her suspect you! I will not have the slightest of foundation for her suspicions unless to help her. We shall see to-day if she has been foolish enough to betray herself to Noel Vanstone before she has any facts to support her. I doubt it. If she has, we shall have the clearest proofs of our identity with the Bygraves on his feeble little head till it absolutely aches with conviction. We have two things to do on this occasion. First, to distrust every word Mrs. Lecount says to you. Secondly, to watch her for fascinations, and make sure of Mr. Noel Vanstone, during from to-day. I will give you the opportunity when we leave the cottage, and take our walk at Dunwich. Wear your hat, wear your smile; do your figure conscientiously light; put on your neatest boots and brightest gloves; tie the miserable little wretch to your apron-strings—in short, leave the whole future management of this matter after that to me. Steady! here is Mrs. Wragge; we must be doubly careful in looking after her now. Show me your cup, Mrs. Wragge! show me your shoes! What do I see on your upper lip? Dirt! You don't have spots! Take it off after breakfast and put on another. Pull your chair to the middle of the table—more to the light—more still. Make the breakfast."

At a quarter before eleven Mrs. Wragge (with her own entire concurrence) was dismissed to the back-room, to bewilder herself over the sacrifice of dressmaking for the rest of the day. Punctually as the clock struck the hour Mrs. Lecount and her master drove up to the gate of North Shingles, and found Magdalen and Captain Wragge waiting for them in the garden.

On the way to Dunwich nothing occurred to disturb the enjoyment of the drive. Mr. Noel Vanstone was in excellent health and high good-humor. Lecount had apologized for the little misunderstanding of the previous night; Lecount had petitioned for the excursion as a treat to herself. He thought of these concessions, and looked at Magdalen, and smirked and simpered without intermission. Mrs. Lecount acted her part to perfection. She was motherly with Magdalen, and tenderly attentive to Noel Vanstone. She was apparently interested in Captain Wragge's conversation, and meekly disappointed to find it turn on general subjects to the exclusion of cures. Not a word or look escaped her which hinted in the remotest degree at her real purpose. Never was there a more consummate diplomacy and propriety; and she was the only one of the party on that sultry summer's day who was perfectly cool in the hottest part of the journey.

As they left the carriage on their arrival at Dunwich, the captain, who was walking next after Mrs. Lecount's eye was off him and fortified Magdalen by a last warning word.

"Wear the oil!" he whispered. "She will show her claws on the way back."

They left the village and walked to the ruins of a convent near at hand—the last relic of the once-populous city of Dunwich which has suffered the destruction of its place successively by the all-devouring sea. After looking at the ruins they sought the shade of a little wood between the village and the low sand-hills which overlook the German Ocean. Here Captain Wragge appointed time to let Magdalen and Noel Vanstone advance some distance in front of Mrs. Lecount and himself—took the wrong path, and immediately got lost in the most consummate dexterity. After a few minutes' wandering (in the wrong direction) he found an open space near the sea, and politely opening his camp-stool for the housekeeper's accommodation, proposed sitting down where they were till the missing members of the party came this way and discovered them.

Mrs. Lecount accepted the proposal. She was perfectly well aware that her escort had lost himself on purpose, and that Magdalen was equally disturbing influence on the smooth amiability of her manner. But a day of opportunities had now at last not come yet—she merely added the new item to her list, and availed herself of the camp-stool. Captain Wragge established himself in a romantic attitude at her feet; and the two determined enemies (grouped like two figures in a picture) fell into as easy and pleasant a conversation as if they had been friends of twenty years' standing.

"I know you, ma'am!" thought the captain, while Mrs. Lecount was talking to him.

"I know you, sir!" was written in my ready-made science, and you wouldn't object to drown me in the Dreadful Hollow."

"You villain with the brown eye and the green!" thought Mrs. Lecount, as the captain caught the drift of conversation and said, with "thick as your skin is I'll sting you through it yet." He was quite ready to oblige Mrs. Lecount: they talked fluently on general subjects, on public affairs, on local scenery, on society in England and abroad, on climate, on health, on climate, books, marriage, and money—talked without a moment's intermission, and without understanding on either side for nearly an hour before Magdalen and Noel Vanstone strayed that way and made their appearance on the sand-hills.

When they reached the Inn at which the carriage was waiting for them, Captain Wragge proposed refreshment in undisturbed possession of her master and signed to Magdalen to drop back for a moment into the rear with him.

"Well?" asked the captain in a whisper; "is he fast to your apron-strings?"

Magdalen nodded, and said to foot as she answered.

"He has kissed my hand," she said. "Does that tell you enough? Don't let him sit next me on the way home! I have borne all I can bear already for the rest of the day."

"I'll put you on the front seat of the carriage," replied the captain, "side by side with me."

On the journey back Lecount verified Captain Wragge's prediction. She showed her claws.

The one journey back Lecount verified Captain Wragge's prediction. She showed her claws.

The circumstances could hardly have favored her more. Magdalen's spirits were depressed; she was tired; she was out of temper. Even the naturally opposite the housekeeper—who had been compelled to submit to considerable fatigue in the midst of honor next her master. With every facility for observing the slightest changes that occurred over Noel Vanstone's face, Mrs. Lecount her first experiment by leading the conversation to the subject of Combe-Raven, and to the various advantages offered to residents by the various quarters of the metropolis on both sides of the river. Noel Vanstone listened with interest. His attention sooner than she had anticipated, and interposed impatiently with the question, "Where is Vauxhall Walk, ma'am," thought the captain; "I'll get there before you."

He entered on what was a purely fictitious description of the various quarters of London in which he had himself resided, and advised Noel Vanstone to establish himself in one of them, saved Magdalen from the sudden question relating to Vauxhall Walk, and, by thus leading the conversation, gave her good starting her to begin with. From his references he passed smoothly to himself, and to the part he had played in saving the life (the charge of Mr. Bygrave) into the housekeeper's care —not forgetting his brother's grave in Honduras, with the monument by the self-taught negro artist, and his brother's hugely overpaid widow, on the ground-floor of the boarding-house at Cheltenham. As a means of giving Magdalen time to compose herself this narrative of autobiographical information attracted Mrs. Lecount, but it answered no other purpose. Mrs. Lecount listened, without being imposed on by a single word the captain said to her. He merely confirmed her conviction of the hopelessness of taking Noel Vanstone into her confidence before she had facts to help her against Captain Wragge's otherwise unassailable position in the identity which he had assumed. She quietly waited until he had done, and then returned to the charge.

It is a coincidence that your uncle should once have resided in Vauxhall Walk," she said, addressing herself to Magdalen. "My aunt has a house in the same place; and we lived there before we came to Aldborough. May I inquire, Miss Bygrave, whether you know any thing of a lady named Miss Garth?"

This time the gag the moment before the captain could interfere. Magdalen ought to have been prepared for it by what had already passed in her presence; but she had not had been shaken by the earlier events of the day, and she could only answer the question in the negative, almost before she had time to control herself. Her hesitation was of too momentary a nature to attract the attention of any unsuspicious person. But it lasted long enough to confirm Mrs. Lecount's private convictions, and to encourage her to push the matter further.

"I only asked," she continued, steadily fixing her eyes on Magdalen, steadily disregarding the efforts which Captain Wragge made to join in the conversation, "because Miss Garth is a friend of mine, and I am curious to find out what I can about her. The day before we left Vauxhall Walk, a person who presented herself under the name I have mentioned, paid us a visit under very extraordinary circumstances."

With a smooth, ingratiating manner, with a refinement of courtesy that was little less than devilish in its ingenious assumption of the language of pity, she now boldly described Magdalen's appearance in disguise, in Magdalen's own presence. She slightingly referred to the master and mistress of Combe-Raven as persons who had always annoyed the elder and more respectable branch of the family; she mourned over the family quarrel, and pursued Magdalen, openly betraying herself, if Captain Wragge had not checked her in full career by a loud exclamation of surprise, and a sudden attack at Magdalen's wrist.

"Let me thousand pardons, my dear madam!" cried the captain. "I see in my niece's face, I feel in my niece's pulse, that one of her vicious attacks of headache has come on again. Oh, my dear girl! Why hesitate among friends to confess that you have a pain? What mistaken delicacy was! Her face shows she is suffering—doesn't it, Mrs. Lecount? Darting pains, Mrs. Vanstone, darting pains in the left side of the head. Pull down your veil, my dear, and lean on me. Our kind friends will excuse you for the rest of the day."

Before Mrs. Lecount could throw an instant's reflection on the appearance of the incredible attack her master's fidgety sympathy declared itself actively in the manner best anticipated, in the then active manifestations. He stopped the carriage, and insisted on an immediate change in the arrangement of places—the comfortable back seat for Miss Bygrave and her uncle, the front seat for Lecount and himself. "Will that do?" he asked, anxiously. "Excellent creature! Let her give it directly to Miss Bygrave, and let her be comfortable as well as ill!" The coachman shook Miss Bygrave he should not have a halfpenny for himself. Momentum was frustrated, and the journey began.

In these cases, Mr. Noel Vanstone ran—with brief intervals for breathing-time—in a considerably ascending scale of sympathy and self-importance throughout the drive home.

Mrs. Lecount accepted her defeat with a composure which, during the moment when Captain Wragge interrupted her her thin lips closed, and opened on the other side of the carriage. The warmest expressions of her master's anxiety for the suffering young lady produced from her no other demonstration of anger. She took as little notice of him as possible. She had no attention whatever to bestow on the consoling considerations for his valuable health which the housekeeper's own hard black eyes looked out of the window. She opened one, and with her eyes closed and her veil down. It was only when the carriage stopped at North Shingles that Captain Wragge, in handing Magdalen out, that the housekeeper at last condescended to notice him. As he smiled and took off his hat at the carriage-door the strong restraint she had laid on herself suddenly gave way, and she flashed one look at him which scorched up the captain's politeness on the spot. He turned at once, with a hasty acknowledgment of Noel Vanstone's last sympathetic inquiries, and took Magdalen into the house.

"I told you so!" he said, in a low voice, to her. "It is not my fault that she scratched you before I could stop her. She hasn't hurt you, has she?"

"She has hurt me to some purpose," said Magdalen—"she has given me the courage to go on. Say what must be done to-morrow, and trust me to do it." She sighed heavily as she said those words, and went up to her room.

Captain Wragge walked meditatively into the parlor and sent directly on to consider. He by no means so certain as he could have wished of the most prudent course for the part of the enemy after the defeat of that day. The housekeeper's farewell look had plainly informed him that she was at the end of her resources yet, and that the unfortunate fish the full importance of preparing himself in good time to meet the attack which she took in advance. He lit a cigar, and bent his wary mind on the dangers of the future.

Mrs. Lecount ordered a cup of tea, shared her writing-case, and began the rough draught of a letter to Mr. Noel Vanstone. Her habitual exasperation at the failure of her first attempt to expose the conspiracy had not blinded her to the necessity of making a second effort before Noel Vanstone's growing infatuation got beyond her control. The waiter set for Magdalen having failed, the chance of entrapping Magdalen's sister was the next chance to try. Mrs. Lecount ordered a cup of tea, opened her writing-case, and began the rough draught of a letter to Mr. Noel Vanstone the elder by the morrow's post.

So the day's skirmish ended. The heat of the battle was yet to come.

"PARVULI."

STREAMETH the sunset through the pane,
Glitter the drops of summer-rain,
That, soothing, fall in sparkling shower
Upon the couching Passion-flower.

As pensive, but not sad, I muse
Upon—one single gate of these!
A ting white-laced frock. Ah! well,
I love the pretty "bagatelle!"

A cradle-couch beside my knee,
A tiny head—a curly fleece—
The little fingers in their clasp
The coverlet unconscious grasp.

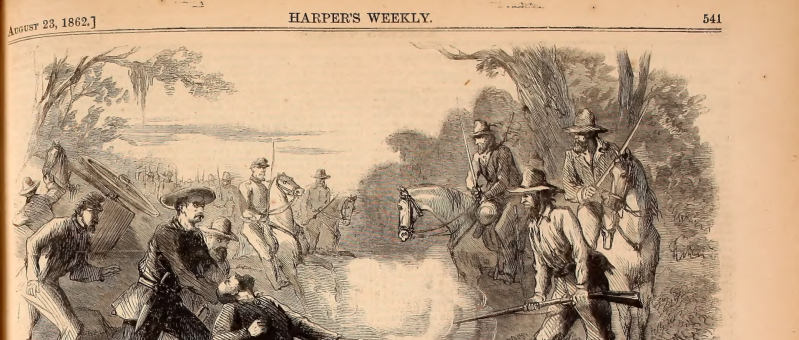
As yet unwaked, the soul within
Her Chrysalis lies slumbering.
The fate that in the morning rose—
Who dreams what in the casket grows?

A solemn trust!—and yet how dear!
Ah! but for children blooming here
This earth a joyless world would be,
And life itself a vacancy!

'Tis little fingers mould us all,
'Tis little voices heavenward call,
'Tis little hearts that heaven prepare,
And little angels lead us there!

WAR MEETING AT WASHINGTON.

ON page 529 we give an illustration of the GREAT WAR MEETING which was held at Washington on the 6th inst. It was a very large and most enthusiastic meeting, and the feeling in favor of the thorough prosecution of the war was unanimous. The President was present, and took in compliance with the earnest request of the crowd, made a few remarks as follows:



"FELLOW-CITIZENS,—I believe there is no precedent for my appearing before you on this occasion—[applause]—but I see no reason why I should not avail myself of the privilege. I am now to hear you, and not to speak. I have no patriotic remarks—[applause and laughter]—which I can offer upon this occasion. I have not even any suggestions. I have found nothing in the circumstances around me which I have not known, or which, however, have an impression that there are possibly some things which I know better than you. No, no; none can do better than yourself; you have been meeting your military commanders, as I will or could, and therefore I propose but to detain you a moment longer. [Cries of "No, no," "Go on," "Encourage the rebels!"] I am very little inclined on any occasion to say any thing unless I have the pleasure to be called by it. [A voice—"You do that. Go on!"] The only thing I think of just now which ought to be better said than it has been said is a matter in which we have heretofore had some difficulty. [A voice—"What is it?"] There is, my friend, [A voice—"What is it?"] there is a want of unity of purpose between the General-in-Chief and the Secretary of War. Now, I cannot go into the particulars of the case, but I suppose I occupy a position that enables me to understand it better than anybody else. [Laughter.] I am sure that neither of these gentlemen would be willingly wrong, but I know he does not think of them together no more than any of the rest of you. [Laughter.] Some of them think Mr. [Cries of "Stanton and other"] Well, Secretary Stanton. [Cries of "Bravo!"] Disputes about how many men General McClellan has, and how many he ought to have, and how he has had a very large number, and those who would have given him the control of War and left him to do it would dispense him talk if the grand total of peace and war men, and how many he ought to have, and how he has not, and how many he ought to have had, and how he has had those at present fit for duty. [Laughter.] The Secretary of War did not think that General McClellan was not to blame for asking give him. General McClellan is not to blame for asking for what he wanted needed, and the Secretary of War is not to blame for not giving what he had none to give. [Laughter.] Now, and ever since the [Cries of "Good, good!"] and I [Applause.] so far at least, the Secretary of War has withheld no one thing at any time in my power to give him. [Cries of "Good!"] Now, I will explain—[Cries of "No, no!"] I will explain, and a voice.—"Give him enough to-day!] I have no accusation against him. I believe he is honest, and able too—[applause]—and I am willing to justify myself, and I am willing to justify myself what has been quite me to do, to take upon myself what has been done by him. [Applause.] So far as withholding from him—I have indeed [Cries of "Good!"] and now I avail myself of my privilege of saying so much.

STEINWAY'S PIANOS.

We publish below two illustrations of STEINWAY'S PIANOS, made by Steinway & Sons, of Walker Street, New York City, which received a first prize medal at the London Exhibition, having been characterized by the jurors as "Powerful, fine, brilliant, and sympathetic tone of piano, with excellent workmanship shown in grand and square pianos."

In order to show how widely these pianos are appreciated abroad, we subjoin a few extracts.

The London News of the World (illustrated) says of these pianos:

"Their magnificent pianos, manufactured by Messrs. Steinway & Sons, of New York, are without doubt the most powerful instruments in the room. They possess a rich and full tone, both round and brilliant, of great power, and combine the qualities of brilliancy and great power without the slightest approach to harshness. We will describe, as well as we are able, the peculiarities belonging to them. The bent-covered strings are carried over and over the lower steel ones. By adopting this plan the bridge on which the covered strings rest is in the middle of the back part of the sounding-board, which naturally gives them a greater amount of vibration than if the strings were placed on one side of the sounding-board, as in our English pianos. The manner in which the metallic bars and bars are arranged is very excellent, the whole rising out in one piece, by which means all possibility of the sounding-board frequently cracking when the weather or climate may be changed, is entirely avoided. Messrs. Steinway's patent overstrung action is another great feature in these pianos, for although it produces a repeat of the most perfect kind, it has a check that is firm and unvarying, and of a most ingenious character—the whole thing is so ordinary simple that it can be understood almost at a glance by any ordinary piano-forte tuner; and we feel bound to add that they have an elasticity of touch and firmness of action that we have rarely, if ever, seen surpassed.
